PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

ENERGY

Coal Industry Dispute

1. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the strike by some miners.

3. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the latest situation in the coal industry dispute.

5. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a further statement on the dispute in the coal industry.

6. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on recent events relating to the coal industry dispute.

8. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the coal industry dispute.

10. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current situation in the coal mining industry.

11. Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the coal dispute.

16. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make a statement on the coal strike.

18. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a further statement on the mining industry dispute.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): Of the 174 pits, there are now 148 with men present and 66 of these are producing coal. Coal production is at its highest level since the dispute started. Since 5 November more than 16,500 miners who were on strike have reported for work. Coal stocks at the power stations remain at a similar level to what they were in August.

At a meeting with representatives of the Trades Union Congress last Friday, I expressed the Government's regret that the compromise proposal put forward by the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service, and the detailed agreement reached with NACODS, had not provided proposals acceptable to the leadership of the National Union of Mineworkers. With two of the three mining unions not on strike, and with the one third of the NUM which had a ballot voting overwhelmingly against strike action, the Government regret that the two thirds of the NUM continuing on strike have been deprived of the opportunity to express their views through a national ballot.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for the encouraging news about the number of men who are working and the number of pits that are remaining open. In view of his slightly alarming remarks last weekend about being available for further discussions, will he assure the House and the working miners that further talks between the NUM and the National Coal Board will not take place until there is genuine evidence of a fundamental shift in the attitude of the NUM to uneconomic pits?

Mr. Walker: I have told the TUC and the mining unions that I am willing to have talks with union leaders or the TUC at any time. That is the correct position for me to take. In my talks with the TUC I made it clear that it would be impossible to end the dispute so long as there was a totally unreasonable demand that every pit, no matter how uneconomic, should be kept open until the last ton of coal was extracted. That is the reality of the scene.

Mr. Davies: Notwithstanding those figures, does the Secretary of State accept that in parts of the mining industry the strike is solid and there is no prospect of breaking it? In view of that fact and the increasing doubt being cast over the Government's accountancy figures, most recently by the London Business School, does the Secretary of State appreciate that there must be negotiations? Would it not be helpful if he instructed Mr. MacGregor to withdraw his weekend statement about preconditions and took the necessary steps to get the parties involved back round the negotiating table?

Mr. Walker: I remind the hon. Gentleman that there have been seven rounds of negotiations. In the one at ACAS, ACAS came forward with a compromise proposal. At the end of seven rounds of negotiations Mr. Scargill is constantly on record as saying that he has not moved his position since 6 March. If the hon. Gentleman wants a settlement to the dispute, he should put pressure on Mr. Scargill.

Mr. Hamilton: Since it is clear day by day that there can be no winners and no losers in the contest—we are all losers, including the miners—will the Secretary of State take an initiative and agree to call together all those involved in the dispute so long as they undertake, before they start discussions, that there will be flexibility on all sides?

Mr. Walker: My difficulty in replying to that question is that in July one side suggested a range of new proposals which showed considerable flexibility, and, at the behest of another miners' union, went to ACAS and agreed a compromise proposal. On Friday the TUC told me that negotiations must take place between the two parties concerned. Until the one party which has refused to move since 6 March moves, there will not be the negotiated settlement which we all want.

Mr. Chapman: Regretting the intransigence of Mr. Scargill, but recognising that some striking miners understandably fear that there will be no other employment in the mining communities, may I ask my right hon. Friend to report progress on NCB (Enterprise) Ltd., which was set up to encourage alternative industries in uneconomic mining areas?

Mr. Walker: As I reported to the House, the company was set up with an initial capital of £5 million. Immediately there were a substantial number of inquiries and applications, and I agreed to double the capital of the company. I have informed the National Coal Board that the Government would be happy to finance an extension of its activities so that that important work can be carried out.

Mr. Strang: Why does the Secretary of State not facilitate negotiations without preconditions between the NCB and the NUM? Is it not clear that the Government are more concerned to inflict a defeat on the NUM, as part of their assault on the trade union movement, than to secure a negotiated settlement in the interests of the mining industry? How much damage will be done to the economic and social fabric of the country before the Government recognise that the vast majority of miners will return to work only after a negotiated settlement?

Mr. Walker: The tone of the hon. Gentleman's remarks is very different from the tone of the remarks that I heard in my talks with the TUC on Friday. There have been seven rounds of negotiations without preconditions, one under the auspices of ACAS, which came forward with a compromise proposal. I have heard no criticism of that compromise proposal by the TUC or the Labour party, and it is time that they tried to persuade Mr. Scargill to accept it.

Mr. Proctor: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the real long-term damage to the coal mining industry has been caused during this dispute by the closure of coal faces in economic pits and the loss of contracts to the industry? Will my right hon. Friend comment on that?

Mr. Walker: It is true that 23 producing faces have been lost during the dispute, which is a tragic loss to the industry. As my hon. Friend knows, we were conducting an active and successful campaign to persuade industries to convert to coal. I had hoped that 1,000 firms would convert to coal this year, but the entire campaign has been destroyed by the dispute.

Mr. Hannam: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the dispute is rapidly becoming more concerned with the future of the president of the National Union of Mineworkers than of the coal miners? Will he commiserate with the TUC, which must negotiate on behalf of a union which refuses to budge an inch towards a settlement?

Mr. Walker : I understand the diverse problems of the TUC. From my talks last week and my communications with the TUC, I am sure that it is anxious that the dispute should end with a negotiated settlement as speedily as possible. I told the trade union leaders who attended the talks on Friday that almost no other British trade union has an offer available to it as generous as the offer available to the miners.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Secretary of State agree that the only people who will change the views of the leadership of the NUM are the members of the union and its executive? What plans does he have for discussions with the TUC and others, and what public action will he take to persuade those members of the union and of the executive to try to bring about that change?

Mr. Walker: I am sure that the 16,500 union members who have returned to work since 5 November are having an impact on thinking.

Mr. Knox: Apart from our foreign competitors, can my right hon. Friend think of anyone who has benefited from the strike?

Mr. Walker: No, Sir.

Mr. Douglas: Does the Secretary of State accept that, for the first time during the dispute, he has gone a little way towards meeting trade unionists, which in a sense is welcome? If we accept that his view concurs with that of the TUC—that the only people who can settle the strike are the NCB and the NUM—what deters him from using his good offices to bring together those two parties in the foreseeable future? It is a mad strike, which must be resolved by sitting round the table, not by attrition.

Mr. Walker: I repeat that on several occasions the two sides have met, and on one occasion, under the auspices not of a Tory politician but ACAS, a compromise plan put forward by ACAS was rejected by the leadership of the NUM. Likewise, the leadership of the NUM has always refused to put the terms on offer to the miners in a ballot. That is the manner in which it is operating.

Mr. Aitken: Will my right hon. Friend give special attention to the position in the Kent coalfield where, before the strike began, three pits were losing £25 million a year, which amounts to a subsidy of £10,000 a year from the taxpayer to each of the 2,500 miners? As the position has deteriorated still further, because of geological and other changes, and as every sensible person in the Kent community knows that we cannot go on for ever in the same lunatic uneconomic way as before, will my right hon. Friend give special priority to the idea of an imaginative scheme by NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. after this strike totters to its close?

Mr. Walker: I assure my hon. Friend that wherever there is a potential closure due to a pit becoming uneconomic and unable to contribute successfully to the future of the industry, the new enterprise company which has been created will deal with the problem. It will have the finance, the managerial advice and, frequently, accommodation and a whole range of services to enable fresh and new enterprises to come into such communities.

Mr. Benn: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that for over a year, since the overtime ban began, he has come to the House week after week and said that the strike is crumbling? Has that not been wholly false, and has not the information that he has given misled the House and the country and deceived himself? Is not his policy in a shambles, and is not the only conclusion that can be drawn from his refusal to encourage talks that he and the Cabinet wish the strike to continue, which is the conclusion that most miners have already drawn?

Mr. Walker: Fortunately, the conclusion that most miners have drawn about the right hon. Gentleman is that his rhetoric during the dispute is different from his record as Secretary of State.

Secondly, as to disputes crumbling——

Mr. Benn: Answer the question.

Mr. Walker: I shall.

As to disputes crumbling, I recall that the right hon. Gentleman told me that the movement of coal would stop in April, since when 25 million tonnes have been moved.

Mr. Rost: As the taxpayer has to pay the bills for this senseless strike, has he not the right to demand that the board should do what every other private and public enterprise would have had to do by now to contain its losses, which is to announce a deadline for a return to work, after which the generous guarantee of a job will no longer be valid? When will the board start to manage?

Mr. Walker: Coal is one of this country's most important resources. Coal has a good, sound and expanding future. I hope that the pressures of all those who are concerned with the future of the industry will ensure that we move back to the potentiality of high investment and good production. I should not want to do anything to damage that prospect.

Mr. Hardy: The Secretary of State mentioned my association, NACODS. Does he accept that the agreement appears to have considerable fragility about it as a result of actions by the NCB? Does he further accept that that suggests that the chairman of the NCB should no longer be allowed to occupy his office, not least because of the pessimistic statement that he made at the very time when the Secretary of State was meeting the trade unions last week? Is it not time for the right hon. Gentleman to take a further initiative to achieve a negotiated settlement, and should he not suggest to Mr. MacGregor that the time has come when there should be an end to the visits to Hobart house of furtive emissaries from the Conservative party?

Mr. Walker: The chairman of the NCB has been through seven rounds of negotiations. He has been to ACAS and accepted its compromise proposal, and he has negotiated with NACODS in great detail and reached a settlement. Therefore, nobody can accuse him of inflexibility. As to being pessimistic, on all seven occasions the chairman has been opposed by somebody whose one boast is that he has not moved since 6 March.

Mr. Gale: Will my right hon. Friend reaffirm that the precondition to the negotiations having been laid down by the president of the National Union of Mineworkers, contrary to the impression that the general secretary of the Trades Union Congress sought to give on Radio 4 this morning, the union has not moved from the start of the strike from its entrenched position? Will my right hon. Friend undertake that there will be no further negotiations until and unless the NUM moves from that entrenched position?

Mr. Walker: The basic demand that every pit, no matter how uneconomic, must be kept going until all coal is exhausted unless there are safety or geological reasons for doing otherwise has never been made by any NUM leader in the past and, as far as I know, has never been made in any other coal industry. It is not just an absurd demand. It would do permanent damage to the coal industry if it were met.

Mr. Wallace: I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's meeting with the TUC, but I wonder whether the background of the talks was helped by the Government taking £1 off supplementary benefit. Is it wise, for the atmosphere of future talks, for the Government to proceed with their announced intention to strip miners of housing benefit if they are paying rent?

Mr. Walker: Certain advice has been given in NUM magazines about how to obtain additional money from social security. If the hon. Gentleman is interested, he should study that advice. It was given positively on the basis not of what were basic needs but of how to organise these matters.

Mr. Orme: If the tone of the meeting with the TUC was as good as the right hon. Gentleman suggests, why did he not respond to the TUC? The congress put forward positive proposals. The right hon. Gentleman will know that, according to the accountancy report and that of the London Business School, the basis of uneconomic pits has been challenged. Therefore, there is a basis on which to resume talks. Why does the right hon. Gentleman not play a role in seeing that those talks are held, instead of waiting another three or four weeks before anything happens?

Mr. Walker: The right hon. Gentleman asks why I did not respond. The TUC did not come to the meeting on that basis. It started the talks, quite correctly, by saying that it was not in a position to negotiate. We exchanged views on its suggestions. The TUC's problem, as Mr. Willis said afterwards, was that it did not consider that anyone could back down before the negotiations and therefore that it was wrong to suggest that the NUM should move from its position before negotiations began. I had to point out to the TUC representatives that there had been seven rounds of negotiations and that Mr. Scargill had not backed down on any.

Gas Prices

2. Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the Government's current policy on gas pricing.

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): Gas prices are determined by the British Gas Corporation, taking into account the need to achieve an adequate return on capital, and to obtain an adequate and continuing supply of gas.

Mr. Malone: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. Can he confirm that it is Government policy to ensure that gas is provided to the consumer at the most competitive prices? In addition, will he undertake that in the event of gas prices perhaps falling, as a result of increased efficiency on the part of the British Gas Corporation, prices will reach the consumer unaltered and that there will be no interference to put them up?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Pricing is the responsibility of the British Gas Corporation. We expect the corporation to be competitive. I hope my hon. Friend welcomes the fact that, under its financial targets and performance aims up to 1986-87, it is expected to achieve a reduction in unit net trading costs in real terms of 12 per cent. compared with 1982-83. There is strong pressure on the British Gas Corporation to be efficient, and I am sure that it will be.

Mr. Rowlands: As future gas prices and supplies may be determined by the decisions to go ahead with the Sleipner contract, will the Minister say what is the Government's position on it? As I understand it, negotiations are virtually complete between the British Gas Corporation and its opposite number. Where do the Government stand on the Sleipner contract?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The Sleipner negotiation is not confined to the British Gas Corporation and the Norwegian company Statoil. There are a number of other big financial considerations which affect the future of gas supplies to the United Kingdom and our balance of payments. Negotiations continue on those issues. Until they are concluded, I regret that it is not possible to answer the hon. Gentleman's question.

NCB Property (Vandalism)

4. Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when he next meets the chairman of the National Coal Board, he will discuss the incidence of vandalism against National Coal Board property and the resulting financial cost to the board.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): I deplore the malicious acts of vandalism which have been carried out against NCB property during the present strike. They can only damage further the prospects for the industry.

Mr. Merchant: In view of the serious acts of vandalism which have taken place in many areas, including Easington colliery, near my constituency, where a few weeks ago windows were broken and cars overturned, will my hon. Friend consider encouraging the chairman of the NCB to institute disciplinary proceedings against those miners found guilty of such offences?

Mr. Hunt: Since the beginning of the dispute about 450 employees have been dimissed by the NCB. These include a significant number for offences associated with vandalism. There can be no possible excuse for causing wilful damage to an industry which, at the start of this pointless strike, had such great potential for the future.

Mr. Allen McKay: When the Minister meets the chairman of the NCB to discuss vandalism, will he suggest to him that as, after seven meetings, he has found himself incapable of bringing the strike to a successful conclusion it is time that he went?

Mr. Hunt: As my right hon. Friend has already pointed out, in the course of the dispute there has been just one conciliation proposal from ACAS. After careful consideration, that was accepted by the chairman of the NCB but rejected by the president of the NUM.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: Is it not a fact that of all the many speeches that Arthur Scargill has made, he has not made one statement urging his members not to vandalise their own plant and tools, because, when they go back to work, any such damage will be to their detriment?

Mr. Hunt: The strike has been characterised by most unhelpful remarks from the president of the NUM. Perhaps the most unhelpful came today. Hon. Members may have noticed that he now calls for all forms of industrial action on a massive scale in support of the miners. I am certain that he will receive the same sort of raspberry to that ridiculous irresponsible notion as he has throughout the dispute.

Mr. Dormand: Is it not strange that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant) should refer to my constituency, Easington, as being near to his, when it is not, and is it not even more strange that he should refer to an incident which took place five months ago? Will he join me in my constituency to see the whole context of what has happened?

Mr. Hunt: The real damage in the dispute and the real financial cost has been, for instance, in the tragic investment situation. It now looks as if the industrial action, if it continues till the end of March, will mean a reduction in investment spending of nearly £500 million.

Mr. Adley: Just for once, would it not be wonderful to hear one Labour Member stand up and unequivocally deplore vandalism?

Mr. Hunt: I believe and hope that I am speaking for the House in condemning without reservation the sort of vandalism that we have seen.

Mr. Eadie: If and when the Secretary of State meets the chairman of the NCB, will he ask him why he seems to come to life only when there is a move to try to resolve the miners' dispute? He must be about the most expensive chairman of any nationalised industry. Is it not vandalism for the chairman of the NCB to make statements on the eve of the Secretary of State's meeting with the TUC suggesting that there is no prospect of the strike ending? It must surely be unparalleled for a Cabinet Minister to have his authority undermined in that way. Is it not time that Mr. MacGregor was asked to go? He has done too much damage already.

Mr. Hunt: The chairman of the NCB has made what is undoubtedly the most generous offer that the miners have had since nationalisation. It is interesting to note that not one hon. Member so far has said that it is not unreasonable for the president of the NUM to stick to the irresponsible demand that no pit, however uneconomic, should close while there is still an ounce of coal left in it.

British Nuclear Fuels plc

7. Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has for the privatisation of British Nuclear Fuels.

Mr. Peter Walker: We have no plans at present to sell shares in British Nuclear Fuels plc.

Mr. Orme: I welcome that statement, but will the right hon. Gentleman tell the management of British Nuclear Fuels to stop talking publicly about privatisation, as that will only get the public's back up and do great damage?

Mr. Walker: I gather that in an interview with one particular journalist the chairman gave his views as to the potentiality of privatisation and implied that, with regard to the staff of British Nuclear Fuels, privatisation would be welcome. But he explained afterwards that he had expressed his own personal view.

Energy Efficiency Office

9. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the budget of the Energy Efficiency Office for the current year; what is its role in relation to the co-ordination of energy conservation policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The Energy Efficiency Office's budget for 1984-85 is £18·6 million. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State set up the office to spearhead the drive for greater energy efficiency in industry, commerce and the home. Considerable progress has already been made.

Mr. Cox: In view of that reply, will the Minister give an assurance that the Government's financial policies, including those on rate capping and so on, will not harm energy conservation programmes throughout the country? In view of the urgency of the matter, why is there still a division of responsibility as between the Department of Energy and the Department of the Environment? Why cannot everything come under one Department — preferably the Department of Energy?

Mr. Hunt: I assure the hon. Gentleman that every possible incentive is being given to local authorities—I have recently met a number of them—to spearhead the energy efficiency drive. It is a sign of confidence that the Government have increased the budget of the Energy Efficiency Office within the Department by 34 per cent. over the past year.

Mr. Boyes: How can the Minister talk about confidence in the Government when Cape Insulation in my constituency gave notice on 4 December to 360 or 370 men that the company would close on 21 December? Is it not a futile use of Government money to spend it on glossy brochures and leaflets when the Government are not allowing local authorities the finance to use those products and thus to keep people in work?

Mr. Hunt: I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman about the very serious redundancies caused by the closure of Cape Industries in Washington, but for some time there has been over-capacity in that area of the market. With the increased advance in advertising and the "lift a finger" campaign already showing signs of tremendous success, I very much hope that we shall see an upsurge of activity in that sphere.

Mr. Wallace: How many local authorities have written to the Secretary of State in the past 12 months saying that they are having difficulty in planning and implementing energy conservation measures because of capital restrictions that are imposed on them by the Department of the Environment?

Mr. Hunt: There has been a tremendous amount of interest in the energy efficiency campaign on the part of local authorities. More than 250 local authorities have sought advice from the Energy Efficiency Office and are participating in the crescendo that we are now reaching in this important campaign.

Nuclear Power

13. Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the prospects for nuclear power in the United Kingdom.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): The Government attach considerable importance to the continuing safe and economic development of nuclear power.

Mr. Skeet: Does my hon. Friend agree that, after Sizewell, there does not appear to be a programme? Will he bear in mind the needs of the nuclear industry? Furthermore, will he take into account the fact that while 17 per cent. of total electricity is produced by nuclear means in the United Kingdom, the French, who are much more competitive, produce more than 50 per cent. of their total electricity from that source?

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend is correct in what he says about France. The Government consider that a prudent energy policy requires the country to have available a range of supply options, including an appropriate nuclear component. As my hon. Friend says, in 1983 nuclear power contributed 17 per cent. of the United Kingdom's electricity supply. When the three AGRs currently being commissioned are fully operational, nuclear power could be contributing as much as a quarter of our electricity requirements. Our nuclear generating capacity will then have risen from 6·5 to 9·5 GW.

The Government expect that nuclear power will form an increasing component of our electricity supply in the longer term, provided that nuclear stations can be built to time and cost. The number of new nuclear stations will depend on several factors, including the level of electricity demand.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is not the future of the nuclear power industry very much dependent on its competitive position as against coal? Do the Government take note of the way in which the accounts of companies and organisations involved in the nuclear industry are drawn up? If they do, how do they take note of those accounts? Do they take similar note of the National Coal Board accounts, with which the nuclear industry has to compete? Will the Minister ensure that the accounting procedures of both organisations are published openly so that we can all study them?

Mr. Goodlad: I note what the hon. Gentleman says. We have every confidence in the accountants concerned.

Coal Liquefaction

14. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the progress of coal liquefaction.

Mr. David Hunt: The National Coal Board has completed the basic design work for its liquefaction project at Point of Ayr. I am delighted to be able now to announce that the Commission of the European Community has offered aid of £4·8 million. The board expects to begin work on the construction phase early in the new year.

Mr. Dormand: Does the Minister agree that liquefaction is most important for the future of the coal industry? Does he agree that the Government first used the excuse of lack of private capital for the slow development of coal liquefaction? Is the Minister now using the miners' strike as an excuse for even slower development? The Minister has said nothing about Government finance. Will he say something about it now?

Mr. Hunt: This Minister is well aware of the hon. Gentleman's interest in the subject. It is a vital subject. The National Coal Board is discussing terms of participation with a private sector company. Such participation is expected to release the £2·5 million balance of the Department's contribution, which has already been substantial in the design stage.

Mr. Eadie: Does the Minister realise that his Department has been fiddling around with the liquefaction scheme for five and a half years? At the end of that it seems that all we shall have will be a glorified laboratory scheme on a colliery site. Is it any wonder that our scientists are disillusioned with the Government's approach to science and technology?

Mr. Hunt: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman says. The project is important. Completion of the NCB contract with the EEC will trigger the start of the construction phase work. That will go ahead with the Government's full support.

Electricity Prices

15. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the estimated increases in electricity prices to industry during the coming year.

Mr. Peter Walker: Electricity tariffs for industrial consumers are determined by the electricity supply industry. I understand that area boards will not be increasing tariffs this winter.

Mr. Baldry: I am delighted to hear that news, because industry needs to know well in advance, when it is budgeting, what prices might do in the coming year. Is my right hon. Friend aware that some industries have been worried that one of the effects of the damaging miner's strike will be to make them less competitive because electricty prices will go up?

Mr. Walker: I am aware of the importance to industry of keeping electricity prices as low as possible. That is the electricity industry's objective. I am pleased to say that electricity prices to industrial consumers have fallen on average by 8 per cent. in real terms in the last two years.

Mr. Nellist: Does the Secretary of State agree that he has wasted £4,400 million in the last 10 months attacking the National Union of Mineworkers and that a large part of that cost will fall on industries such as the electricity industry, resulting in price increases in the coming months or years? Will not old-age pensioners between the ages of 70 and 85, whose heating benefits have been cut, and the families of striking miners whose benefits have also been cut, have to bear the cost of the Government's attack on the miners and their families in the last 10 months? Yet again the people least able to bear the cost will have to bear it.

Mr. Walker: As I know of the hon. Gentleman's passion for looking after pensioners, I know that he will be doing all that he can to persuade Mr. Scargill to accept the very good terms available.

17. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the average electricity price charged to industrial customers in the United Kingdom; and what information he has on the comparable figure in France.

Mr. Goodlad: Electricity prices to industrial consumers vary greatly within all countries, according to the nature of the load being supplied. In general, however, French prices are the lowest in Europe and are, typically, up to 20 per cent. lower than those in the United Kingdom and other EEC states. This is largely due to the greater proportion of electricity generated by nuclear power in France.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: As French electricity prices put British industry at a competitive disadvantage, which is bad for investment and jobs, will my hon. Friend explain some of the reasons for the price differential? Does he agree that the large French nuclear programme enables that country to generate electricity significantly more cheaply than we can manage?

Mr. Goodlad: Yes, Sir. My hon. Friend is correct.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister accept that while European electricity suppliers may advertise certain tariffs through long-term agreements, they supply electricity at a much lower figure to many industrialists working in Europe? Is there not a massive subsidy to industry in Europe? Are there not many companies with bases in this country and Europe which obtain electricity at a cheaper rate by using that method to get around the advertised tariffs?

Mr. Goodlad: The French tariff is lower because, broadly speaking, it has a larger nuclear element. The electricity supply industry in Britain is currently considering proposals for successors to the present load management schemes, including the contracted consumer load scheme, which formally expires in March 1985. I understand that the Electricity Council intends that the new arrangements should, overall, be no less beneficial than the present schemes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Palace of Westminster (Bedrooms)

38. Mr. Greenway asked the Lord Privy Seal how many bedrooms there are in the Palace of Westminster today compared with 30 years ago; how they are allocated; and if he will make a statement.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): There are 42 bedrooms in the Palace of Westminster, which compares with 38 bedrooms 30 years ago. These rooms are used by those occupying official residences and by staff of the House whose duties may require the provision of overnight accommodation.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the problems of some elderly and unfit Members of Parliament—[HON. MEMBERS: "Name them."]. It would be unfair at Christmas to name them. Such hon. Members have problems getting to the Division Lobbies from their distant offices in the eight minutes allowed. Will my right hon. Friend consider giving priority to finding offices for hon. Members within the precincts of the House? Will he switch the bedrooms from the House to the distant offices vacated by hon. Members?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend's question became more uncharitable as it proceeded. In the execution of the Bridge street project, it is hoped that it will be possible to shift some staff from the Palace of Westminster and that accommodation can then be made available to hon. Members. Of course, such allocation and the criteria for it are matters for the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee.

Mr. Beith: Is not one of the bedrooms occupied by the Lord Chancellor? Does he not sleep more easily in his bed than he should because he does not have the scrutiny of a Select Committee of this House over his Department, as do all other Ministers? Should not his slumber be made uneasy like that of other Ministers?

Mr. Biffen: I suspect that the premise of the question is wrong, and therefore it would not be appropriate for me to comment on the conclusion.

Public Gallery (Access)

39. Mr. Wareing asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will make a statement on the provision of access for blind people with guide dogs to the House of Commons Public Gallery.

Mr. Biffen: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) on 2 July.

Mr. Wareing: I have not seen that reply. Is the right hon. Gentleman satisfied that the facilities for blind people with their guide dogs are equivalent to those in the other place, where I understand Black Rod has a considerable element of discretion? Will he carefully monitor the position in the House of Commons Public Gallery? Will he consider the possibility of giving the Serjeant at Arms like discretion?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman may be interested to know that an identical number of blind persons with dogs may attend the Strangers Gallery in the House of Lords as obtains in the House of Commons. In my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter I said that two places in the Gallery had been provided for blind persons with guide dogs. Since that arrangement was made six months ago, a place has been taken by a blind person with a guide dog on only one occasion. The visitor pronounced himself well satisfied.

Mr. Hayes: Given the difficulty that the blind seem to be having in gaining access to the Public Galleries, does my right hon. Friend not feel it outrageous that convicted terrorists are gaining access to Committee Rooms?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. Pavitt: The Lord Privy Seal will recall that recently, following a debate on the blindness allowance, there were at least six blind persons present with their guide dogs. Will he consider ensuring that there is flexibility on certain occasions, which will enable him to give instructions to the Serjeant at Arms to increase the number of those permitted in with guide dogs?

Mr. Biffen: Certainly. I am sure that the appropriate Committee will be happy to consider that. Since the establishment of special places in the Galleries for the blind and their guide dogs, the facility has been used to the extent that admission has always been possible.

Mr. Hayward: Is it not the position that the Department of the Serjeant at Arms operates the provisions and facilities for the blind and other disabled with a great deal of flexibility when requests are made of it? Last week I brought a disabled person into the House and I received all the help that I needed from the Department.

Mr. Biffen: I am certain that that is so and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making the point. It enables me to say that the facilities that can be offered and supervised by the Serjeant at Arms are always that much better if lobbyists inform him in advance of their proposals.

Mr. Boyes: In considering the problems of the handicapped and the disabled, will the Leader of the House inform us whether a sign language interpreter for the deaf is permanently employed in the House? If not, will he be prepared to consider whether one should be so employed?

Mr. Biffen: I shall have that proposal investigated.

ENERGY

Selby Coalfield

20. Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Energy if the current miners' strike has led to delays and cost overruns in the development of the Selby coalfield.

Mr. David Hunt: The total investment programme of the National Coal Board had been planned at £800 million for this year. The current strike has, however, halted work on many of the NCB's projects, including Selby, to the detriment of the industry's future.

Mr. Eggar: Was not the Selby development a signal to the entire coal mining industry that the Government were committed to the future of coal mining? Was it not a severe blow when the National Union of Mineworkers decided to go ahead with picketing to stop development of this extremely important coalfield? Is there nothing that my hon. Friend can do to try to assist in getting more miners back to work so that development can continue at Selby despite the NUM's actions?

Mr. Hunt: I agree with my hon. Friend that everything possible must be done. Since 1979 the Government have invested £3·9 billion in the coal industry. That investment is nearly 50 per cent. higher in real terms than investment in the previous five years by the Labour Government.

Mr. Heffer: As the amount of coal which the Government projected would be mined will not be reached because of the dispute, is it not time that the Government stopped intervening on the side of the Coal Board and took a step in intervening to achieve a settlement of the dispute, as has been asked for by Opposition Members? Given the Secretary of State's statement that there should be no negotiations, is not Mr. Scargill right in saying that the only way forward is industrial action by the rest of the working-class movement?

Mr. Hunt: It was noticeable that when the hon. Gentleman said that Mr. Scargill was right there was not one note of agreement throughout the Chamber.

Mr. Nellist: Yes, there was.

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman was asleep. It is a fact that before the industrial action started our great coal industry had tremendous potential, but that is being lost every day that the dispute continues.

Mr. Rowe: Is there not a real danger that the longer the strike continues the more Mr. Scargill's gloomier predictions will become self-fulfulling? What steps is my hon. Friend taking to ensure that when the strike comes to an end the damage that has been inflicted on the coal industry is laid at the door of those responsible?

Mr. Hunt: I agree with my hon. Friend. All Ministers at the Department of Energy are anxious to start on the rebuilding process. Since the beginning of the dispute, not only have 23 production faces had to be abandoned, but 13 salvage faces as well. In addition, 19 faces are giving cause for serious concern, and a further 65 faces are causing concern. It is a tradegy that the NUM is putting at risk those pits which its leaders claim they are fighting to save.

Mr. Foster: The Under-Secretary of State continues to plead how tragic it is for the industry that this dispute is continuing, and the hon. Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar) is alarmed about the implications for Selby. If Tory Members are so worried about damage caused to the industry, why do they not lift a finger and get the people involved around the table to solve the dispute? Is the Secretary of State aware that he is profoundly mistaken if he believes that there is any political profit to be had in humiliating the miners and destroying mining communities?

Mr. Hunt: The solution to this dispute lay with a ballot held at the start of the dispute, in accordance with the long-established, democratic tradition of the NUM. If a ballot had been held, there would have been no need for these mass pickets, intimidation and violence. Not one miner would have gone to work. The sad fact is that the only way to end this dispute is for miners to vote with their feet and return to work.

CIVIL SERVICE

Northern Region (Job Transfers)

41. Mr Dormand asked the Minister for the Civil Service what are the number of Civil Service posts transferred to the northern region since May 1979.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): As I last told the hon. Gentleman on 20 November, the dispersal programme announced on 26 July 1979 did not include any transfer of posts to the northern region. Details of posts that may have been transferred by Departments for management reasons are not held centrally.

Mr. Dormand: Is the Minister aware that people in the north are sick and tired of seeing the Government shed crocodile tears over unemployment in the region? Here is a matter on which the Government can take direct action, and in nearly six years they have done absolutely nothing. The Government have actually transferred Civil Service jobs from the northern region to other parts of the country. In view of what the Minister said today, can we ever expect a change of policy in this matter?

Mr. Hayhoe: The dispersal programme, which was announced on 26 July, is being followed through. I can hold out no hope to the hon. Gentleman that a new dispersal policy will be brought before the House.

Administrative Grades (Recruitment)

42. Mr. Chapman asked the Minister for the Civil Service what initiatives he is taking to encourage scientists and engineers to be recruited, at least for limited periods, into the administrative grades of the Civil Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: Recruitment into administrative posts in the Civil Service is open to people from all disciplines and we seek through publicity and university visits to bring this fact to the attention of all potential recruits, including scientists and technologists. A total of 17 per cent. of successful candidates for administration trainee in 1984 had a scientific or technological background, compared to 11 per cent. in 1983.

Mr. Chapman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving that information. While recognising the importance of attracting scientists and engineers into the administrative grades of the Civil Service, may I ask my hon. Friend to consider sympathetically the possibility of extending the unified grading approach to new entrants from the professions, as I am sure he will agree that that is the best and most effective initiative that we could take to attract such people into the Civil Service?

Mr. Hayhoe: I certainly support the concept of extending unified grading, and discussions are occurring to extend it down to principal level. I hope that those discussions will be completed soon. I am sure that that extension will have an encouraging effect on the outlook of engineers, technologists and scientists in the Civil Service.

Mr. Eastham: Is it not almost criminal that we are to recruit engineers and scientists into administration when it costs many thousands of pounds to train those specialists? Is the Minister aware that, recently, a Select Committee on which I served was advised of grave shortages of some of those scientists, such as the shortages to which reference was made this afternoon?

Mr. Hayhoe: As one of the few chartered engineers in the House, I can say to the hon. Gentleman that I believe that people with such professional skills should be employed in the highest ranks of the Civil Service. Many of the matters with which the Civil Service deals and about which advice must be given to Ministers involves engineering, technological and scientific aspects. It is highly desirable that some of the people giving that advice should have been trained in those disciplines.

Delegation of Authority

43. Mr. Eggar asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he is satisfied with the level of delegation of authority within the Civil Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: The central Departments have already delegated a wide range of authorities to spending Departments, while maintaining where necessary common standards and rules across the Civil Service, and Departments in turn delegate a good deal to line managers. More delegation is needed and this is one of the aims of the changes in management under way in the Civil Service.

Mr. Eggar: Has not the record of delegation of authority within Deparments, rather than within the centre, been somewhat disappointing despite the fact that the financial management initiative drew attention to the need for delegation? Has my hon. Friend noted that the new report from the efficiency unit draws attention to that? Will he assure the House that he will lead a drive to ensure that Departments follow the recommendations of the efficiency unit?

Mr. Hayhoe: My hon. Friend, as so often on such matters, is right in what he says. We want to see more delegation. Delegation and accountability go together. We want to see that being extended. The financial management initiative has that as one of its main objectives. I shall do all that I can to facilitate progress on that initiative.

Trade Union Discussions

44. Mr. Soley asked the Minister for the Civil Service when he last met representatives of the Civil Service trade unions; and what was discussed.

Mr. Hayhoe: I met the Civil Service unions on 4 December to discuss the Government's decisions on the 1984 report of the Top Salaries Review Body. The unions also took the opportunity to discuss with me some recent changes in travel and subsistence provisions.

Mr. Soley: Did the Minister take that opportunity to raise the subject of the review of VAT offices? Has he anything to say about the proposal to close 30 of them, in view of the Government's plan to increase VAT on some commodities—on newspapers, books and so on? What implication does that have for staffing? Will he make a statement on that subject to the trade unions?

Mr. Hayhoe: VAT was not discussed at my last meeting, which was with the Council of Civil Service Unions. Nor was it discussed at an earlier meeting that I held with union representatives from Customs and Excise. At that time they were raising matters about the customs part of the general responsibility of Customs and Excise.

Dr. McDonald: Is the Minister aware that in the pay negotiations going on at GCHQ, of the five members of the staff side three still retain their trade union membership? Does that not show the absurdity of the Government's ban on trade union membership there?

Mr. Hayhoe: No. What it does show is that the hon. Lady is relying upon a recent, inaccurate report in the Financial Times.

ENERGY

Electricity Prices (Landlords)

21. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a further statement on the practice of some landlords in pricing electricity to tenants above the rate they are required to pay themselves; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The Office of Fair Trading is currently considering the comments received on the consultative document which it issued earlier this year and expects to report its findings to Ministers in the new year.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree with me, without prejudging what the report says, that it is wrong for some landlords to charge their tenants double, or even more, for the price of energy than they themselves have to pay? When he sees the report, will he introduce legislation to make that impossible?

Mr. Goodlad: I am aware of the close interest that my hon. Friend has taken in this matter. Existing legislation provides that area boards shall set maximum permitted prices for the resale of electricity. Landlords may resell at that higher price to recoup their additional costs. The Office of Fair Trading reviewed the problems associated with the resale of electricity between 1974 and 1977. It was concluded that there was insufficient evidence to justify recommending changes in legislation. I should not wish to anticipate the findings of the present review or the Government's response to it.

Coal Industry Dispute

22. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the coal strike.

Mr. Peter Walker: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth).

Mr. Nellist: Following the Under-Secretary's remarks about Selby coalfield, does the Secretary of State recognise that that coalfield, producing 10 million tonnes of coal, with 4,000 miners, is designed to replace equivalent production from 21 pits in the north Yorkshire area, which used to employ 16,000 men? Is not one of the central issues that fuels the anger of the miners the development of super pits such as Selby, and in areas of Oxfordshire, Warwickshire and so on, which is a preparation for future privatisation? It shows that the Government are less concerned about the continuation of jobs in communities and more concerned about lining the pockets of their big business mates.

Mr. Walker: It is remarkable that the hon. Gentleman should argue about the development of pits such as Selby, when a predecessor of mine in a Labour Government boasted of the enormous contributions made by Labour Governments towards Selby's development. The reason for the dispute is nothing to do with the development of Selby, which is in the interests of the coal industry. The leader of the NUM — I gather from the tapes — is reported to have repeated his demand at the meeting with the TUC this morning and informed it that the NUM is not prepared to allow the closure of any section of the industry, however small. That is in sharp contrast to what happened under all previous Labour Governments.

Mr. Lawrence: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does the point of order arise directly out of questions?

Mr. Lawrence: No.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take the point of order later, then.

Banking Supervision

3.31 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about banking supervisory arrangements, in the light of the recent problems at Johnson Matthey Bankers Ltd.

I have now considered with the Governor of the Bank of England the events leading up to the rescue operation conducted by the bank on 1 October. It is clear that the case raises important issues about our present procedures of banking supervision, and the legislative framework within which it is conducted.

The Governor and I have therefore agreed to a full review of the present supervisory arrangements, and to consider whether any early changes in present supervisory procedures are needed. Issues to which particular attention will be given are the relationship between auditors and supervisors, staff experience and training, the handling of concentrations of risk and the assessment of quality of assets, notification and collection of statistics, and the adequacy and deployment of staff resources in the banking supervision department of the Bank of England. The review will also consider whether a more effective framework is required than that provided by the Banking Act 1979. I shall be placing a copy of the full terms of reference of the review in the House Library.

I shall, of course, inform the House as early as possible of the results of the review, including any legislative changes that I consider necessary.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): The most significant fact about the statement is that the Government felt the sudden necessity, after 10 weeks, to go on record about the Johnson Matthey affair. No doubt the Chancellor believes that his message will be blandly reassuring, but the nature of the statement, and the fact that the right hon. Gentleman needed to make it today, will, I suspect, intensify rather than allay fears.

The City of London has been anxious about the matter for the past two months. Can the Chancellor tell us why it took that period of time before he was able to make a statement, in the House or elsewhere, about the changes that he regards as necessary? Has the delay been in part the product of the widely reported disagreements between the Bank of England and the Treasury about how the matter was disposed of? Can the Chancellor tell us whether he personally supports the view that the Bank should have virtually nationalised Johnson Matthey at 9.30 pm one Sunday evening? As well as telling us his view on the general principle underlying that disturbing pattern of events, will the right hon. Gentleman answer four questions, even in advance of the review which he has promised and which we shall no doubt debate?

First, will the review include a thoroughgoing examination of the Banking Act 1979 specifically to deal with the problems of early warning and whether the bank and the Government get sufficient warning in time about incipient collapse; whether the Act provides sufficient supervision in its quasi-voluntary form, or whether some sterner regulation is necessary?

Secondly, may we be told the relationship to the affair of Price Waterhouse and Co., and whether the Chancellor thinks that this firm of accountants is spreading its activities too widely across the entire economy of the United Kingdom?

Thirdly, may we be told about a second firm of accountants — Arthur Young McClelland Moores and Co.—the auditors, which gave the company a clean bill of health as recently as the middle of June last year? We hear that that firm of accountants is likely to be investigated by the standards body of its profession. Is that true?

Fourthly, the Governor of the Bank of England is on record as saying that institutions should stand or fall according to their own performance. Does that rule apply to companies within the City of London, or does it apply only to manufacturing industries, which are allowed to fall by the Government, thereby causing large-scale unemployment?

Mr. Lawson: The right hon. Gentleman asked whether there would be a thoroughgoing examination of the Labour Government's Banking Act 1979. As I have said, in so far as the provisions of that Act are relevant—and many of them are—they will be very much at the heart of the inquiry. I do not want to prejudge the results of the inquiry, but it may well be that it will be necessary to introduce certain amendments to the Banking Act. However, we shall have to await the results of the inquiry.

Price Waterhouse has little, if anything, to do with the case. As the right hon. Gentleman said, the auditors are Arthur Young McClelland Moores and Co. As I said in my statement, the relationship with the auditors and, indeed, the general relationship between auditors of banks and the supervisory authority, are extremely germane and will be at the centre of the inquiry. As to whether firms stand or fall by their results, the shareholders of Johnson Matthey, the parent company, of which Johnson Matthey Bankers is a wholly-owned subsidiary, have lost three quarters of their money — some £¼ billion — and the entire top management, from the chairman downwards, have been obliged to resign. That, I think, answers the right hon. Gentleman's question.

It comes rich from the right hon. Gentleman to ask why it has taken me so long to come to a considered judgment on the best way of investigating banking supervision, because until I announced that I would make a statement today he had not asked one question about this matter.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): The House, particularly the Treasury and Civil Service Committee, will need to consider carefully what my right hon. Friend has said, in the light of the document to which he referred. Has he any views on the likely timing of the inquiry? When it is completed, will it be presented to the House as a Green Paper or in some other way?

Mr. Lawson: Given that this is a highly complex matter, it is difficult at this stage to say how long the inquiry will take, but it will be completed as soon as possible. As to how the results are reported to the House, I shall have to determine that in the light of the inquiry, which will go into matters of very great commercial confidentiality, including relationships between banks and their clients. I cannot yet say how I shall report to the House, but, as I said in my statement, I shall report the results of the inquiry, together with whatever action I think it proper to take.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Does the Chancellor accept that his remarks are unsatisfactory? There is now a contingent liability on public funds of £75 million. This matter began with no liability on public funds, it went to £10 million, and many of us are wondering whether the figure will go above £75 million. Will the Chancellor reassure us on that point? Will he confirm that public money is involved, because if the public liability is taken up there will be a loss of dividends from the banking department to the Treasury?

Secondly, will the Chancellor reveal the extent of his own involvement? He told me in a letter that this was entirely the decision of the Governor of the Bank of England. The Governor told me that he had been consulted at all stages. I understand that Sir Peter Middleton was heavily involved in the early stages of the rescue. The Chancellor insisted that no public money should be involved. These are serious matters and very disturbing events in the City of London. To have a public inquiry or the kind of assurance from him for which his right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) has asked —that there should be revealed to this House the basis of this internal investigation—is the minimum that is needed. Above all, the Chancellor, who is very complacent about this affair, has a duty to say to the House whether any more public money is at risk other than the £75 million.

Mr Lawson: Far from being complacent, I have shown myself to be very concerned about what appeared to me to be possible weaknesses in the system of banking supervision in this country, which goes far beyond the issue which has brought the matter to light; namely, the collapse of Johnson Matthey Bankers Ltd. That is why I thought it right to have in inquiry into the adequacy of banking supervision in this country: both the way in which the existing system is operated, and whether it statutory framework needs to be improved. As to whether there should be an internal inquiry, or a public inquiry, because of the nature of the matter it is right that it should be an internal inquiry, which will involve not only the Bank of England but the Treasury and an independent consultant.

As for when I knew about it, the Governor notified me of the action which he intended to take shortly before the rescue was announced. As for the funds, my approval was neither sought nor required. Perhaps I might refer the right hon. Gentleman to an occasion when he was a Minister in a previous Labour Government. In the case of Slater Walker, my predecessor but one, the right hon. Gentleman's former colleague, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), said when he was asked about it, inevitably by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner):

"I was aware of the general approach adopted by the Bank of England to the problems of the Slater Walker Group".

"My specific approval of the standby loan facility and guarantee was neither sought nor required."—[Official Report, 13 October 1976; Vol. 917, c. 142-43.]

That is the relationship between the Bank of England and the Treasury and between the Governor and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. As for the resources which are at risk, these are not voted funds. They are the own resources of the Bank of England.

Mr. Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, with the ever-growing internationalisation of financial markets and the development of 24-hour markets, the supervisory role of all central banks is becoming increasingly more difficult to perform, and that, although it is important to try to achieve the most efficient legislative and codification arrangements possible, in the last resort these matters, which often have to be handled very quickly and in a situation of some crisis, depend for their successful resolution upon having men of great judgment and experience running the central banks and that whatever we do we should be careful not to reduce the role of the Bank of England to that of the Treasury's poodle?

Mr. Lawson: I agree with everything that my hon. Friend has said, but there is no question of the Bank of England being a Treasury poodle. At issue here is the adequacy of our banking supervisory arrangements, for which the Treasury clearly has responsibility. The Banking Act 1979, which is the statutory framework within which it is conducted, is an Act of Parliament for which there is Treasury responsibility. Therefore, it is necessary for the Treasury as well as the Bank of England to be involved in this inquiry.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): I, too, welcome the review which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has announced, but will he be more forthcoming about the liability of the Bank of England? This is an important matter. We are committing public money to the rescue of a bank, although similar amounts of public money are not being given to many worthy individuals or companies whose businesses have collapsed during the past five years. If there is to be sauce for the one, there must be sauce for the other. The right hon. Gentleman must tell us about the amounts of money involved, because those same amounts could have saved many jobs in many worthwhile industries all over the country.

Mr. Lawson: So far, the Bank of England has paid only £1 from the banking department's own resources. It is true that, beyond that, there is an indemnity, jointly between private sector banks and others and the Bank of England of £75 million each. It is far too soon to say how much of that indemnity will be required.

In making the comparisons which the right hon. Gentleman sought to make, he knows as well as I do, because he is a former Financial Secretary to the Treasury, that in every country in the world the central bank has a responsibility, as a lender of last resort, for the banking system. It has to decide in each case whether it is right for it to use that authority as a lender of last resort and, if so, in what way. It was the clear view of the Governor that there was a threat to the London gold market, which is a very important market for this country. That was a factor of which he had to take full cognisance.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): My right hon. Friend's announcement that the relationship between the auditors and the supervisory authority is to be the subject of a review is welcome, but can he tell us whether he has recommended to the Bank of England or others that the auditors in this case should be sued?

Mr. Lawson: I have made no such recommendation, but, leaving aside the question of litigation, when a company becomes insolvent as rapidly as Johnson Matthey Bankers did, questions arise about the role of the company's auditors. The auditors signed off the company's accounts without qualification on 18 June of this year. Of course, beyond the particular case—the House might do well to concentrate on this—there is the question of the role of banks' auditors and the relationship between the auditors and the supervisory authority.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): The House will be grateful to the Chancellor for mentioning, after 17 minutes, the London gold bullion market and for saying that it was involved in the considerations of the Governor of the Bank of England. Was not the lifeboat of the Bank of England launched to help speculators in the gold market rather than those who put their money into real wealth creation in industry in this country?

Mr. Lawson: That is not true. The case was one of a particular bank which got into serious trouble. As far as I am aware, it was a one-off case. The matter was complicated by the fact that the bank was wholly owned by a leading member of the bullion market.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Bearing in mind the fact that Johnson Matthey had such a pivotal position in the London bullion market, does my right hon. Friend agree that the Bank of England would have been right to try to rescue Johnson Matthey if it could have achieved, as its initial press release said it had achieved, a rescue in which there was no liability of public funds? Will my right hon. Friend address his mind to what has gone wrong between the original press statement of no liabilities and the present situation where we hear that there could be £75 million of liability of public funds? Where are the guilty men?

Mr. Lawson: I seem to have heard that last phrase somewhere before. My hon. Friend asks what has gone wrong. I think that what has gone wrong is that there is prima facie evidence of a weakness in the way that the banking supervisory system operates. That is precisely why I have set the review in motion.

Mr. Norman Atkinson (Tottenham): Is not the Chancellor's dilemma about whether to have a public inquiry into all aspects of the matter dominated by his desire to protect the reputations of leading personalities in the City and of some ex-hon. Members and current hon. Members?

Mr. Lawson: I have not the faintest idea to whom the hon. Gentleman is referring.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend accept that most of us believe that he has acted entirely properly and with some circumspection before launching the inquiry? Does he agree that if we are to have full confidence in the inquiry, bearing in mind the responsibilities and supervisory role of the Bank of England, noble Lords in the upper House, who have great experience in these matters and who are Privy Councillors, should be included in the inquiry team? If that is done, all hon. Members can have confidence in the inquiry and the report that results from it.

Mr. Lawson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his initial remarks. I assure him that he can have complete confidence in the inquiry that I have set in motion.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Was the Chancellor surprised at the collapse of Johnson Matthey in the buoyant enterprise society in which he keeps telling us we live, and at the disinclination of private interests to rescue the bank, which would have been an alternative to having recourse to the Bank of England and public funds?

Mr. Lawson: It is wrong to say that the private sector was unwilling to come forward. It provided a substantial sum. In addition to the initial sum that was invested, especially by Charter Consolidated, the private sector has invested 50-50 with the Bank of England in the £150 million indemnity.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Is my right hon. Friend not aware that public anxiety on these occasions is always about the phrase "internal inquiry"? To avoid good old-fashioned City magic circle-ism in this extremely disturbing story, will he assure us that the inquiry will be fully publicised, properly set up and will include eminent people, who may come from the upper House, as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) suggested?

Mr. Lawson: I am sure that my hon. Friend, who earns his living in the City, as well as in Parliament, will understand that matters of high commercial confidentiality are involved, such as the relationship between the bank and its clients. It would not, therefore, be appropriate for this to be a public inquiry. I have made my concern clear to the House by having a full review of the workings of the existing system and of whether the system should be improved. I shall report my conclusions fully to the House. If legislative changes are required, the House will have the fullest opportunity to debate them.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Does the Chancellor accept that his weasel words cannot disguise the extraordinary fact that the Government, who believe in the magic of the market, nationalised for £1 an uneconomic bank late one Sunday evening? Does he agree that that shows that the Government have one law for uneconomic banks and another law for uneconomic pits and factories?

When the right hon. Gentleman speaks about a serious failure of supervision, does that not raise questions, which were hinted at by the hon. Member for East Lindsey (Mr. Tapsell), about the Governor of the Bank of England, whose qualifications were questioned by the Labour party and by many leading figures in the City when he was appointed?

Finally,——

Mr. Tapsell: There is no such implication.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Although the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) is a Front-Bench spokesman, he should ask one question only, as other hon. Members do.

Mr. Lawson: I hope that the hon. Gentleman, who will have heard the comment of my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Mr. Tapsell) that there is no such imputation about the Governor of the Bank of England, who is a distinguished banker, will withdraw his remark.

Mr. Tim Eggar (Enfield, North): I welcome the review. For the benefit of ignorant Opposition Members, will my right hon. Friend make it clear that the Johnson Matthey group employs a large number of people in manufacturing industry and that the prompt action of the Bank of England safeguarded their jobs?

Mr. Lawson: That is absolutely right. The Johnson Matthey group has a gold refining business, various other manufacturing businesses and employs many people, some of whom, if I am not mistaken, are in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Does the Chancellor agree that, in view of the seriousness of the matter, it is inadequate that there is no independent element in the review that he has announced? Does he further agree that it is incorrect that those who were partly responsible for the collapse should inquire into themselves? Does it not reflect badly upon the Bank of England that it has implemented inadequately the legislation that has been passed during the past four years?

Mr. Lawson: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman says. The inquiry will be a joint one between the Bank of England, which is the supervising authority, and the Treasury. The Treasury will be fully involved. An independent consultant experienced in banking will also be involved. That consultant has not yet been appointed.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): If the Chancellor can give £75 million from public funds to bail out Johnson Matthey, do not his friends in the City think that with this Government it is Christmas all the year round? If he can provide such money out of public funds for them, why can he not waive VAT on the Band Aid record so that that money can be used to relieve the famine in Ethiopia?

Mr. Lawson: I have given no money, and no taxpayers' money is involved in this. The hon. Gentleman mentioned an important factor. Because the Governor of the Bank of England decided to intervene in this case, under his authority and using the resources of the banking department of the Bank of England, it does not follow that he would do so in any other case, were one to arise.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is it not true that an investigation of Johnson Matthey's accounts has shown that half of the loan portfolio was in risky ventures to which it should never have lent money? Is it not also true that that information was relayed to the Bank of England 12 months ago? May we therefore presume that that information was also relayed to the Chancellor about 12 months ago? Does the right hon. Gentleman deny that he knew 12 months in advance of the possibility that the bank would fail in the way that it has and that the Exchequer would be required to pick up the bill in the form of a £70 million indemnity?

Mr. Lawson: First, the Exchequer has not picked up the bill. Secondly, of course I did not have the knowledge to which the hon. Gentleman referred. All these matters, including the loan book of Johnson Matthey bankers, will be germane to the general review into the adequacy of the present banking supervisory arrangements.

Mr. Hattersley: The Chancellor is clearly foolish to pretend that the £75 million, which may technically be a matter for the Bank of England, is not a charge on public funds. It is clearly money which, were it not used for this purpose, might be used for far more desirable purposes. The Chancellor makes a technical, and therefore false, distinction between the two.

Perhaps the Chancellor will clear up some of the added confusion that he has caused. He said that he did not understand my reference to Price Waterhouse and Co. I may be wrong, but I understand that it was the firm of accountants asked by the Government to consider the company's business. When did it become involved? Was it involved when the problem seemed much less serious that it does 10 weeks after the collapse?

Secondly, have any attempts been made to ensure that the risks that may be involved and any money that may be required will properly be debted to the parent company of Johnson Matthey, which I understand is not regarded by the Bank of England as being responsible for the potential debt?

Thirdly, and most importantly, may I ask the Chancellor again a question which he has so far not attempted to answer concerning his attitude to the affair. He said that he was told about the arrangement shortly before the public announcement. He was clearly not consulted, but was informed that it was happening. The House should know whether the Chancellor approves of the rescue in this case. If he approves of this rescue, there will be many more desirable rescues of which the House will expect him to approve.

Mr. Lawson: On the last point, I have made clear, my approval was neither sought nor required. I was informed of the position shortly before the announcement was made in what has become the conventional way, and obviously there was no time for me to consider the full details of the matter then. Price Waterhouse and Co. was asked by the Bank of England to conduct a quick examination of Johnson Matthey's accounts at a late stage, but before the rescue, when the Bank of England had serious doubts about the state of Johnson Matthey's loan book.

I am sorry, but I have forgotten the right hon. Gentleman's third question.

Mr. Hattersley: It was about the involvement of the parent company, which I understand—the Chancellor will correct me if I am wrong—may not be responsible for the debt and for the rescue operation costs which the Bank of England has underwritten.

Mr. Lawson: I have already made it clear that the parent company has lost its entire investment in Johnson Matthey Bankers. The top management, from the chairman downwards, have been obliged to resign and the company now has a market capitalisation of £90 million, which is after some injection of cash from Charter Consolidated, having had a market capitalisation of £320 million before the rescue operation.

Mr. Hattersley rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have an important private Members' day today.

BILL PRESENTED

TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANKS

Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, supported by Mr. Peter Rees, Mr. Giles Shaw, Mr. John Moore, Mr. Barney Hayhoe, Mr. Ian Stewart, Dr. Rhodes Boyson, Mr. Allan Stewart and Mr. Alex Fletcher, presented a Bill to make provision for the purposes of or in connection with the reorganisation into companies incorporated under the Companies Acts of the institutions regulated by or existing under the Trustee Savings Banks Act 1981 and for the treatment for the purposes of the Banking Act 1979 of any Scottish savings bank established before 28th July 1983 which has not since become a trustee savings bank: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed [Bill 45].

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the House, I shall put together the Questions on the four motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the Sale of Optical Appliances Order of Council 1984 (S.I., No. 1778) be referred to a Standing Committee of Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Agriculture and Horticulture Grant (Variation) (No. 2) Scheme 1984 (S.I. 1984, No. 1923) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Dangerous Substances and Preparations (Safety) (Amendments) Regulations 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Novelties (Safety) (Amendment) Regulations 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

British Shipping Industry

4.1 pm

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): I beg to move,

That this House recognises that the shipping industry is not only of great importance to the United Kingdom's trade and commerce, but also to the United Kingdom's defence needs and North Atlantic Treaty Organisation commitment; notes with concern the decline of the British merchant fleet in terms of tonnage and share of world markets; and asks Her Majesty's Government to state its policies for helping the industry to improve its international competitive position.

Both the constituencies that I have had the honour to represent have strong maritime connections, and that is one reason for choosing the state of our Merchant Navy as the subject for my private Member's motion. The other is that since the Conservative Government took power in 1979 there has been no opportunity, in either Government or Opposition time, for a general debate on an industry which is crucial to this country's economic prosperity and its strategic defence.

It is true that we have had Adjournment debates about the Merchant Navy, and I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who had an Adjournment debate on this subject in March 1983. I am sure that the House will also applaud my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. du Cann) for initiating his Adjournment debate on the Merchant Navy in October 1982, for the general way in which he has spoken up on behalf of the merchant shipping industry and for the way in which he drew attention to the state of our merchant fleet during the recent debate on the Royal Navy. The House will also salute my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton for taking over the chairmanship of the all-party merchant shipping group, which has just come into being, and not a moment too soon.

I am afraid that apart from those debates and occasional "quickies" on small matters of shipping legislation, the Finance Bills have offered the best opportunities to say things about shipping. Perhaps that underlines the importance of fiscal policy for this vital industry. It is a pity that all the Treasury Ministers who were here a moment ago, and to whom many of our remarks this afternoon will be directed, are not here to listen to this debate.

The debate is necessary because the British merchant fleet, in spite of being one of the world's most modern and efficient, is declining at the rate of about two ships per week, which could nearly extinguish it by the end of the decade. Cruise ships and ferries may be doing all right, but by the year 2000 we may have a fleet which consists only of cruise ships and ferries, and that would not be good enough for our trading position. As recently as 1966 our fleet was the largest in the world, representing 12·5 per cent. of world tonnage.

When I first went to Bristol as a candidate in 1975, our merchant fleet was still at an all-time, but somewhat exceptional, peak. However, our position in the international league table was then already beginning to slip because our overseas rivals, often with massive state aid, were outgrowing us and adding to the excessive world tonnage. For the last decade the gap between available tonnage and cargoes has been steadily widening. Symbolic of the mounting shipping surplus is the fact that two of the earliest ships which I saw use the new Royal Portbury dock in Bristol, which were recently launched OCL container ships, were laid up because there was no demand.

As I look out from the Waterside part of my constituency across the Solent, I see the horizon blanked off by the huge hulk of the Burma Endeavour standing idle in Southampton, not on account of the industrial dispute in the docks, although there is plenty of that, with dockers determined to scuttle the port of Southampton, their jobs and the jobs of many of my constituents who are working in the dock-related services, but because there is no economic demand for its 500,000 tonnes oil-carrying capacity. It is cheaper for BP to pay £1 million a year in wages, maintenance and mooring fees to keep her idle in dock.

Therefore, I hope that today I can, first, convince the House that Britain needs the Merchant Navy. Secondly, I shall explain why our share in world shipping is down to 3 per cent. and still falling fast. Thirdly, I shall try to suggest what we should be doing to halt and perhaps reverse this dangerous downward trend.

Why do we need a Merchant Navy? In answer to that question I shall quote from a pamphlet entitled "British Shipping—the Right Course", of which I am the joint author with Mr. Jonathan Marks, a shipbroker, a good Tory and one day, I hope, a Member of Parliament. In the introduction to the pamphlet we said:

"Britain's economic prosperity depends on our success in international trade. It generates a third of our national income and employs a corresponding part of our workforce.

As a major exporting and importing nation, it is essential for us to have free access to world markets to sell our goods and services.

It is equally vital to be able to purchase raw materials and finished products abroad.

We need the freedom to invest overseas and to attract foreign capital into Britain.

No other leading industrialised country has so clear a stake in open trading markets.

The prosperity of our country rests upon this foundation."

Our shipping industry is of critical importance in sustaining Britain's competitive performance in these world markets. The comparative advantages which a British-owned and registered fleet once enjoyed have made it one of the largest national flags and made a major contribution to our overseas earnings. Even now, an industry which employs more than 45,000 officers, ratings and cadets on about 800 vessels, which earns about £3·5 billion per annum and which in total contributes a surplus of £1 billion to the balance of payments each year is clearly vital to our economy. Threats to its prosperity constitute a danger to our long-term interests.

Our shipping industry is now in a state of crisis. The advantages which we once enjoyed in supplying shipping services have long since ebbed away and our fleet has shrunk accordingly. The world recession has compounded our problems. It has cut British shipping traffic with disproportionate severity. It has been argued that if our fleet continued to decline at the present rate it would be impossible to mount another Falklands expedition and could cast doubt on our ability to fulfil our NATO commitments.

While this has been happening, we have seen the growth of unfair competition. We have seen Governments in developing countries build up their fleets. We have seen moves by our overseas competitors towards protectionism and even more state subsidies. We have seen the massive growth of the Comecon fleet, which, as well as being part of the Soviet Union's naval might, is in a position to wage economic war on this country. Nor should we forget that it is our maritime tradition that helps to make the City of London what it is. Sink our merchant fleet and untold damage will be done to the maritime service industries such as insurance and the Baltic Exchange, ship forwarders and travel agents which today provide world-wide services to shipowners everywhere. They are very important, too.

There are many reasons why we need a merchant fleet, and it is important and appropriate to mention at this stage three independent organisations which think likewise—the Nautical Institute, the Greenwich Forum and the British Maritime League—and pay tribute to the work that they have done and are doing to broaden and to deepen the debate on merchant shipping.

It is not surprising that voices have been raised within and without the shipping industry calling for drastic action to prevent a further decline of our fleet. One purpose of this debate is to ask the Government what they are doing to bring forward maritime policies which will halt and reverse that downward trend.

Before looking for remedies, it is important to examine the reasons for the decline. There has been no shortage of analyses, but diagnosing the ill is very much easier than prescribing a cure.

The British Maritime League has completed the most recent in-depth study in response to a request from my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State. The league rightly concludes that the main underlying cause of our fleet's decline is the impractibility of trading fairly in a market which is no longer governed by economics alone. Our competitors will do anything to survive when far too many ships are chasing far too little cargo. I know that it is a cliché, but it is the old case of Britain playing cricket while the rest of the world perform karate.

More specifically, the causes of the decline of our fleet can be either international, over which we have no direct control, or national, over which Britain — the Government or the shipowners or the unions — have some significant influence. The causes also apply either generally to the whole of the British merchant fleet or to particular sections of it.

Internationally, the world recession has reduced the demand for seaborne trade, and the debts of many developing countries and also the Comecon countries have put a high priority on acquiring foreign exchange. Our trade with Europe has grown at the expense of long-haul trade. Shipping requirements have been grossly overestimated by Governments, shipowners and banks. There were, for example, too many tankers in the early 1970s before the oil crisis, and too many bulk carriers in the late 1970s. The growth in protectionism is both national and international and includes national subsidies, direct and indirect, national flag discrimination or preference, national Government interference in conferences, multilateral and bilateral financial aid to developing countries for shipping projects and, of course, the UNCTAD 40-40-20 liner code for freight. More efficient ships have been introduced. There has been a growth in competition from flags of convenience, with lower taxation, minimal regulation, lower crew costs and, in some cases, less costly safety standards.

Another international cause for the decline of our cargo liner fleet is the development of the Trans-Siberian railway, which is now taking an increasing share — nearly 30 per cent. — of the trade between Europe and the far east.

Further threats to our liners are, first, the growth of the massive Taiwanese Evergreen and United States lines' fleets, which will be operating round-the-world container services outside the conferences; secondly, the increased practice of cargo reservation by countries such as Latin America, India and Sri Lanka; and, thirdly, reserved cabotage exercised in various forms by France, West Germany, Greece, Spain, Italy, all the Comecon countries, the United States, Canada, Australia, Japan, Finland, India — at least we can beat the Indians at cricket, even if we cannot beat them at shipping — Panama and most countries in south America and south-east Asia. The list is a very impressive one — [Interruption.] I am glad to see the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East here now. I was paying credit to him earlier in my remarks.

To sum up, it is a very inhospitable and unfair market in which British shipowners have to compete, and we cannot afford to have any self-imposed handicaps. I know that it is dangerous to generalise, but it is nevertheless true to say that shipowners, both British and foreign, choose to fly the Red Duster because of the fiscal policies and tax regimes of successive Governments, and they have registered elsewhere—or "flagged out" as it is called—because of excessive operating costs, particularly crew costs. Until recently there were extreme cases where British crews were twice as expensive as Chinese crews, not only because of wage levels, but because of the related welfare payments — the so-called social wage which owners have to meet. British ships also tended to be overmanned, and it is greatly to the credit of the seamen's unions that at least on new ships our manning levels are now comparable internationally.

I cannot be as complimentary about the Government. Until recently our fiscal policies and tax regimes were an incentive to "flag in". Now it is quite the reverse. In his 1984 Budget my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer did his best to torpedo what was left of the British-registered fleet. Apart from adding to crew costs by removing overseas tax relief, he ended the 100 per cent. first-year allowance coupled with free depreciation. Admittedly, thanks to some tough talking during the passage of the Finance Bill, the Government recognised that shipping was a special case and introduced instead free depreciation on a 25 per cent. writing-down allowance, but this is thought by shipowners to be totally inadequate when compared with what other western European Governments are doing to increase their financial support for their shipping. The Red Duster is now being put at a competitive disavantage against nearly every other fleet.

With due respect to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, I think that there is a very good case to have the debate answered by a Treasury Minister. Indeed, I should like to see my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the Dispatch Box. I do not suppose that he would be able to say very much, because we have to accept that between now and Budget day he is in purdah, but I hope that he will read the debate and take action on what is said during it.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): That is true of every Department.

Mr. Colvin: We shall hear what my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State says. We are looking for action by the Department of Transport, too.

It is appropriate, therefore, that in suggesting policies to halt and, if possible, to reverse the decline of our merchant fleet I should start with fiscal policies. Even if the General Council of British Shipping has slightly overplayed its hand in years gone by, I believe that its new proposal, which formed part of the industry's submission to the Government for the 1985 Finance Bill, for a 50 per cent. ship allowance on new and secondhand ships in addition to the 25 per cent. writing-down allowance should be considered most seriously. There are other proposals on balancing charges, consortium group relief, the business expansion scheme and overseas earnings tax relief. I know that they sound a lot, but they do no more than bring us into line with some of our main overseas competitors.

On manning, I have paid tribute to the way in which seamen have helped to improve productivity. Of course, most of the reductions that have already been made through the joint efforts of shipowners and unions are in discretionary manning. It needs the Department of Transport to adopt a more innovative and flexible attitude towards statutory manning levels, particularly for officers, if further progress is to be made.

I welcome the recently agreed research into manning and technology which the Department of Transport is sponsoring, and the efficient ship project, at present the subject of a feasibility study being sponsored by the Department of Trade and Industry, could show us how to make further progress in combining high technology and lower manning, and Britain is very good at that.

Related to manning are the subjects of regulation and safety. Britain has taken a lead in improving safety at sea. In 1959 we helped to set up what is now the International Maritime Organisation and have consistently applied safety standards which are stricter than those required by the IMO convention. As a result, the casualty rate for British-registered ships is now only one eighth of that of the world fleet for similar ships. That is good, and it is very welcome, but many of the requirements, both for safety and other equipment, may be unnecessarily restrictive and saddle British operators with unreasonable additional costs. Mr. Iain Sproat, when he was Minister, began to get to grips with this problem, but the task of removing petty regulations is far from complete and remains a major deterrent in terms of money and time to owners and operators wishing to "flag in" and sail under the Red Duster. We also want to see the rules tightened and enforced internationally to prevent our overseas competitors sacrificing safety in order to cut costs and therefore to underquote us.

I have mentioned the unfair protectionist policies of many of our overseas competitors. Unfortunately, our partners in Europe are among the worst offenders. Two things have happened which might help to put that right. The first is the appointment of Mr. Stanley Clinton Davis as Transport Commissioner. Those of us who knew him in this place will welcome the arrival in that office of someone with such knowledge of transport matters. The second is the publication by the European Commission of its comprehensive paper outlining a possible common shipping policy. Our shipping industry has already welcomed that and I do too. It is long overdue.

Shipping is excluded from the competition articles of the treaty of Rome. That is why the Commission's proposal to open up existing restrictions within the Community concerning cabotage and cargo reservation is welcome. I understand that it is also to make proposals for defending British and Community shipping from protectionist measures and unfair practices in other countries throughout the world, particularly the Eastern bloc and the developing nations. How about subjecting the Comecon fleet to a quota system for calls at European ports if those countries continue to refuse to allow European ships to call at their ports?

Can my hon. Friend the Minister tell us whether Her Majesty's Government support the view that if we in Europe could get our house in order and adopt a common policy toward the rest of the world we could negotiate from a position of far greater strength for the open trading system upon which the prosperity of our shipping industry depends? For example, the Brussels package, which was a European response to the UNCTAD liner code, will go a long way towards securing access to the crucial cross trades for British shipowners.

The United Kingdom cannot deal with the problems of unfair competition single handed. If we reacted against protectionism by closing our ports to liners of the offending countries, it would do us no good at all unless the ports of Rotterdam, Antwerp and Le Havre were also closed. There is obviously a role for the Community here, but I hope that it will be a constructive one, aimed at keeping trade open, rather than retaliating against the outside world. Can my hon. Friend tell us how the Government will react to the idea of a common shipping policy?

One target for united European action is the United States. I understand that a dialogue on a broad range of shipping policy issues has been going on for two years now between the United States and the Consultative Shipping Group, which includes the European countries and Japan. That dialogue has been mainly concerned with preserving free access to trades in the liner shipping sector in the face of protectionist restrictions in other countries. Is it not about time that we started straight talking with the Americans about the repeal of the Jones Act, which reserves all their cabotage for their ships?

It is not, of course, all gloom and despondency in every sector of our shipping industry. The cruise liner business is reasonably healthy and ferries are doing well, thanks to the growth of trade with Europe, which has hit our deep sea cargoes. Until recently the offshore oil market has been a growth sector, with the British offshore support fleet of some 150 vessels now accounting for nearly 20 per cent. of the United Kingdom-owned and registered fleet. But British supply-shipowners are extremely dissatisfied with their position vis-a-vis foreign flag supply boats operating in the North sea, particularly our Norwegian allies.

At any time one would find that, out of 180 supply ships in the United Kingdom sector, about 40 per cent. would be flying a foreign flag and half would be Norwegian. Contrast that with the position in the Norwegian sector where, out of about 80 ships, rarely more than a couple fly a foreign flag. Today there is only one British flag ship in the Norwegian sector, and that is beneficially owned in Norway.

Two financial inquiries have been carried out in recent months, one by the joint shipowners and the other by the joint Governments. Why are Norwegian ships able to offer lower rates? If it is true that the Norwegian financial assistance gives them the edge over the British, surely our financial system should be changed. At least, British shipowners should be given the chance to requote for business in the Norwegian sector.

Before concluding, I want to mention briefly the conference system, registration and defence. I am sure my hon. Friends will agree that the idea of the liner conference system—in effect, one of cartels—is anathema to our free market economy ideas. But we are dealing with a business which is neither free nor fair. Therefore, any immediate tinkering with the system would quickly lead to disaster, with the break-up of much of our fleet and the consequent loss of influence world-wide.

The conference system is still needed to ensure stability and regularity in the provision of liner services. However, I am critical in my pamphlet of the way in which conferences have repeatedly increased rates without consultation. How does my hon. Friend feel about the conference system? The House would particularly like to hear whether the idea that was being canvassed a little while ago on loyalty arrangements is still being pursued. That was, in effect, that no individual shipper could be required to put more than 70 per cent. of his custom with the conference in order to qualify for the rebate available in many trades in return for loyalty.

I noted that the Department of Transport recently issued a consultative document on registration suggesting changes in the criteria for registration under the United Kingdom flag. That contains valuable proposals for regularising the position in relation to Commonwealth countries where we have no jurisdiction. I hope that the Government will legislate along those lines. Will they go further and establish a register of ships owned by British companies, but registered under foreign flags, so that at least we know the real size of the British beneficially owned fleet? Most importantly, perhaps, will the Government stand firm against demands from the developing countries that open registries should be outlawed?

Lastly, I want to mention the Merchant Navy's defence role, which was touched on during the recent debate on the Royal Navy and about which the Under-Secretary of State had just given evidence to the Select Committee on Defence. Is today's British flag fleet really adequate for our defence needs? We were only just able to assemble 54 merchant ships in 1982 to support the 53 Royal Navy ships in the Falklands task force. Even then, some of those had to be chartered foreign flag carriers. Will my hon. Friend tell us today what he told the Committee last week? Will he also say something about the Government's review of future requirements for merchant ships in support of defence plans? As there is now general agreement that if the decline of our fleet continues our defence capability will be greatly weakened, what kind of arrangements will the Government be prepared to make when gaps in our strategic reserve are identified?

Even if the Government can requisition foreign ships to make up any gaps in our own provision, what will they do to ensure that we have an adequate supply of trained

British crews to man such ships when foreign nationals are not prepared to face hostilities? Can the Government cross their hearts and echo the words of G. W. Hunt in 1875, who said:

"We don't want to fight, but, by jingo if we do,
We've got the ships, we've got the men, we've got the money too."

What has my hon. Friend to say about that?

Our Merchant Navy is a big and somewhat technical subject for debate. I have spoken for far too long already. Nevertheless, I have left a multitude of items for hon. Members to cover.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): I have been listening with great interest and some sympathy to what the hon. Gentleman has had to say, but does he not find it surprising —I certainly do—that neither of his hon. Friends who represent Southampton is present in the Chamber to hear what he has to say?

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): I represent part of Southampton. Eastleigh now includes the Woolston ward of Southampton.

Mr. Colvin: The intervention of the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) does not do him credit. My hon. Friends the Members for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) and for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) have repeatedly taken part in debates, and I am sure that they will be in the Chamber later to participate in this debate.

With the exception of the hon. Member for Dagenham, who has made a facetious intervention, I thank those hon. Members present for their patience and their supportive noises during my speech. The decline of our merchant shipping industry from the pre-eminent position that it occupied so recently is truly a melancholy story. Our fleet faces extinction, and we should be fighting for its survival at least as passionately as we fight for the preservation of the whale. The trouble is that it is not until the species is about to be extinct that anyone takes any notice. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State now face a challenge and an opportunity. If they fail, and if our merchant fleet disappears, they, like the Cheshire cat, may disappear too—the only differences being that there will be no smile left behind.

Sir Paul Bryan (Boothferry): I declare my interest as deputy chairman of Furness Withy and Company Ltd. I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on his choice of subject, which is not only important but under-debated.

I shall not recite again the figures that tell the sad story of our merchant fleet since 1975. The reason we Members of Parliament are debating shipping today is that each one of us is deeply concerned that the fleet has fallen in size, is still falling steeply and is expected to fall still further. Britain is now losing merchant ships at a greater speed than at the height of the second world war. They are victims not of torpedoes but of ever-rising costs, far eastern competition, and subsidised shipbuilding which makes ships too cheap to buy and thus leads to a surplus that in turn means uneconomic rates and cut-throat competition.

That general situation was exacerbated by the oil crisis, which led to a recession and to countries drawing their oil supplies from fields nearer home, thus making large tankers redundant. No one has escaped the biggest shipping slump for 50 years. Even the spectacularly successful Hong-Kong shipowners, Y.K. Pao, C. Y. Tung and Frank Chao have reduced their ship numbers and diversified into property, container terminals, support vessels for oilfields and so on. The great BP and Shell tanker fleets are a fraction of their former size.

In those worldwide conditions the British fleet, with its high costs, was bound to suffer more than most. Many famous shipping names have disappeared. Others such as British and Commonwealth and Furness Withy have been selling off ships during the past five years at an almost hectic speed, and have diversified into other areas. P and O has had to write off £77 million in its balance sheet in respect of gas carriers.

However, there is a brighter side to the picture. For example, 20 per cent. of the merchant fleet—150 ships in all—is servicing North sea oil and other more distant oilfields with some of the most sophisticated ships in the world such as the Orelia, which was fitted out on Humberside and is now in the Persian gulf. We lead the world in luxury cruising. The commissioning of the Royal Princess took one back to the launching of the Queens, except that, regrettably, the Royal Princess was not built on Clydebank. The Atlantic Conveyor, a third generation combined container roll-on roll-off ship is about to join the Cunard fleet. As my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside has said, the ferries are also prospering.

Nevertheless, the ugly truth is that new tonnage on order for the United Kingdom fleet is running at an annual rate of about 200,000 tonnes—in other words, at less than the tonnage of just one very large crude carrier. With dropping ship prices and plenty of modern ships on the market, there is no temptation to build anything but specialist ships.

So much for the past and present. What of the future? The bulk carrier and tanker trades are still depressed, but over the past few months, after a vicious struggle in the north Atlantic, the liner trade has been moving into profit in most parts of the world. But just as the horizon begins to brighten storm clouds loom up in the shape of 14 huge new container ships almost twice the size of what is at present considered large, which are owned by United States lines, and of an even bigger fleet of new container ships of slightly smaller size from the Evergreen line of Taiwan.

Both of those lines are starting round-the-world services, increasing world container capacity by about 40 per cent. Whether or not those huge ventures prosper, they must have a devastating effect on rates and hence on the profits of the main world container lines, such as OCL of Britain, which are preparing in various ways to meet this challenge.

We are moving into a world of huge investment in which only the strongest will survive. It is against that background that the Government have to make their Budget decisions and industry must make its business decisions. The main firms in the industry—Cunard, P and O, British and Commonwealth, Ocean and Furness Withy—are not heading for bankruptcy. They are firms with access to capital and they have to decide how to invest it. In recent years that investment has inevitably been in the direction of diversifying away from shipping.

The Government, in turn, will have to decide whether shipping really is to be a special case, with no guarantee that fiscal measures will stop the rot. My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside has described the fleet's tremendous commercial value, which goes well outside the industry itself. But another obvious justification for Government action might be defence, and an inquiry is already promised. This is surely unnecessary. The General Council of British Shipping is already deeply involved with Government in contingency planning for defence purposes, both in respect of NATO and nationally. There are also two Standing Committees dealing with this issue, and three statistical studies are now in progress.

[Sir Paul Bryan]

We shall duly be told that the Merchant Navy is adequate for a Falklands-type operation. But we know that the whole British defence set-up is ideal for such an operation. We probably have the most efficient forces in the world, but they are small and—owing to lack of conscription, recent wars and, in the case of the Navy, a waning merchant marine—we lack reserves. In the Falklands, casualties were light and reserves were uncalled for. We had to use only our crack troops, and the mix of our Merchant Navy, with its accent on cruise ships, ferries and RO/RO ships was particularly suitable. It is in a more protracted campaign, in concert with our allies, that our reducing merchant fleet with its corresponding reducing core of trained personnel will be found wanting.

None of that was taken into account at the last Budget, when, for the first time, shipping lost its status as an exceptional case. By Committee or Report stage of the Finance Bill, even the Treasury was slightly frightened at what it had done and some small concessions were made. However, by then confidence in the industry was badly shaken.

At that time the Chancellor's no-distortion rule was new and shining bright. Since then student grants, pensions and the like have shown that nothing in this political life can remain rigid and survive. Every other country of any consequence is supporting its shipping in one way or another. When Britain did that foreigners invested in our fleets as a flag of convenience. Now the opposite is true. Our shipping is actually discriminated against since it cannot enjoy regional grants, enterprise zones and the other titbits offered to land-based industries.

The GCBS has made its proposals and my hon. Friend listed some of them. In my eyes the most important of these is a ship allowance. To enable companies to write off their ships more quickly, in addition to the 25 per cent. writing-down allowance, there should be a 50 per cent. ship allowance for new and second-hand ships.

The underlying argument is that the continued existence of a substantial British merchant fleet is of sufficient national importance to warrant special assistance. The Chancellor may find help given discreetly through the tax system repugnant. He knows that if the new tax rules are bent even slightly for shipping, he will be besieged with special cases.

If the Chancellor can be persuaded that assistance is required, it may be better if the arguments are discussed openly and any resulting subsidy is explicit. A shipping allowance would come exactly into that category. It would show that the Government were convinced, without doubt, of the importance of shipping. It would do something to restore confidence in the industry.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): I congratulate the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on his good fortune in the ballot and on fixing on the merchant service as his subject. I had begun to think that the future of the British merchant marine was a minority interest in the House, although a number of hon. Members, such as the right hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. du Cann) and the hon. Members for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) and for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), have recently made speeches on the subject.

I am surprised at the Government's attitude because the merchant fleet plays a vital part in defence. Even if the Government were indifferent to the trading and employment aspects of the subject, the connection between the merchant fleet and defence should be in the Government's mind.

The disappearance of the fleet is startling. "Disappearance" is a fair word. People of my generation remember how thin the lifeline was in the early 1940s. My war service was in the Royal Navy, so I am not scratching my own back when I pay tribute to the vital link that the Merchant Navy provided. When one recalls that, one is more than ever surprised at the Government's lack of interest in the erosion of the merchant fleet. We experienced a great humiliation in the Falklands war when we had to charter foreign merchant ships to make up the numbers.

Once we had 50 per cent. of the world's commercial shipping. We are now down to 700 ships or a tonnage of 21 million. The Greeks have more than five times that number in their merchant marine. In 1975, we had 1,614 ships or a 50-million tonnage.

Ships have disappeared to take up flags of convenience for various reasons. I refer to lower taxation, lower manning levels or odd watchkeepers' certificates—where they exist—as opposed to the British mariners' certificate which is demanded under the Red Ensign. Reduced safety regulations elsewhere are also an attraction, but it is a mistake to think that all ships sailing under flags of convenience have lower standards. Some of them are up-to-date.

A restriction applies to our coastal trade. Our so-called partners in the Common Market bar our shipping from their coasts while we have no recourse to the same practice here.

On the invisibles side, the decline of the United Kingdom fleet between 1980 and 1983 reduced the trade balance on sea transport by £1 billion. That is confirmation of what I and some other hon. Members have said for a considerable time—that the Government do not appear to care about the merchant fleet. Their lack of concern has cost the country £1 billion.

In addition, the Chancellor is withdrawing fiscal aid and putting the competitive position of the merchant service at an even greater disadvantage. As the hon. Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) said, the last Budget did considerable damage to the merchant fleet when it proposed the withdrawal of depreciation allowances.

The position of our seamen was made worse in the same Budget by the withdrawal of the allowance on foreign earnings. That can mean as much as £10 for an able-bodied seaman and up to £40 a week for senior masters. Seamen who work outside the country incur extra expenses; they are away from their homes and do not enjoy the amenities available to people living in the United Kingdom.

That ill-judged imposition will inevitably lead to a demand for bigger pay increases. That will make the position even worse. It will reduce the Merchant Navy's competitiveness, although the Prime Minister told me recently that that was essential for the continued existence of the fleet.

I hope that the Minister will convey to the Chancellor what I have said about the availability of fairer allowances for depreciation and restoration and the overseas earnings allowance.

For a maritime nation, the Government's indifference is astounding. In the last war the deep-sea trawling fleets and experienced seamen were the backbone of the navy. That has gone. The only reserve of trained seamen is in the merchant fleet. Any maritime nation neglects that at its peril. The problem has received little attention in the House. It involves trade, employment and defence. If we neglect those matters, the United Kingdom will be placed at a disadvantage.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): It might be convenient if I intervene briefly now. I do not have a declaration of interest to make other than happy memories. I am not a vice-chairman of a shipping company, but I am an ex-able seaman. I joined the Merchant Navy 24 years ago when the size of the British fleet, of the shipbuilding industry and of our port industry was very different. It is a sad reflection on Government policy that we have reached such a terrible state in our shipping, shipbuilding and ports industries.

I thank the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) for choosing the plight of the British merchant fleet as the subject for debate today. As he has already reminded us, it comes at an important stage in the development of the decline of British shipping. Unless we take some drastic action, this once proud maritime nation may have no maritime fleet left.

Two years ago, the National Union of Seamen—of which my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) is the only sponsored Member of Parliament—produced two documents which outlined the dramatic decline of the British merchant fleet. One was entitled "Flags of Convenience" and the other "British Shipping: Heading for the Rocks." I recommend the Under-Secretary to read them both.

It would appear that singularly little action has been forthcoming from the Government on the state in which Britain currently finds itself. That inaction has provoked a storm of protest from the General Council of British Shipping. I note that in the brief that it sent us today it commented that the 1984 Budget was a disaster for United Kingdom shipping.

Mr. Jim Slater, the general secretary of the NUS, wrote to the Prime Minister on 8 November spelling out in the plainest terms—one might say with a touch of mess deck language — the dramatic decline of Britain's merchant fleet, and suggesting remedies to halt that decline.

In the business section of The Sunday Times on 2 December, Philip Beresford and John Huxley wrote an article entitled "Britain's abandoned ships." No doubt the Minister read that. There was also an article in The Guardian by Andrew Cornelius entitled "Facing a fight to the death." That graphically outlined the problems being faced by British shipping. Given the state of British shipping today, it is hardly surprising that the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside, together with his colleague Jonathan Marks — who I understand is a shipbroker and member of the Conservative party — should publish a report entitled "British Shipping—the Right Course." I reiterate that the House should be grateful to the hon. Gentleman for choosing the subject of shipping for today's debate.

I shall do the hon. Gentleman the honour of discussing the report of which he was co-author. I have read it. The report attempts to analyse the reasons for the decline of the fleet and makes recommendations for halting and reversing that decline. Much of the analysis echoes the examination by the NUS of the problems of the United Kingdom shipping industry. Despite some hysterical and factually incorrect sections on manning, collective bargaining and trade unions, the report makes a worthy contribution towards getting the Government to give serious consideration to shipping.

The General Council of British Shipping has reacted to the report in an extremely hostile manner, because it attacks two of the fundamental elements of protection for existing companies involved in shipping — the conference system and the fiscal reliefs peculiar to shipping. It is clear that the authors of the report believe that the GCBS and the shipping companies have, on the one hand, looked for every form of advantage available, including the elimination of competition, but, on the other hand, have publicly espoused free competition.

I believe some of the suggestions in the report to be wrong, but some of its recommendations are certainly worth pursuing. Some of its comments are a direct criticism of the Government's performance thus far. The hon. Gentleman and his colleague outlined graphically the decline of the British fleet and set out certain measures to halt that decline. I shall not bore the House by detailing them, but I subscribe to many of them.

In addition to the points made by the hon. Gentleman in his speech, there has been a process of concentration through the merger of shipping groups, diversification by shipping companies into other areas and a build-up of foreign ownership. Apart from manning restrictions, which I believe to be factually incorrect, the factors mentioned in the report were also identified by the NUS in its pamphlet in 1982. The report demonstrates a belief that the United Kingdom can act alone against these trends. It implies that support for existing shipping companies would not be in the nation's interests.

I wish to quote a number of passages from the report. It states:

"the temptation to go behind the fence to reach bilateral agreements with the developing countries in order to buttress the position of established companies must be resisted . . . If we succumb to [this temptation] we head towards complete regulation of shipping . . . the survival of the British merchant marine depends upon the creation of a broader base of entrepreneurial ship-owners, free from unnecessary and burdensome fiscal and regulatory constraints, and thus in a position to face fair competition and the changing trends of the shipping markets of the world. Government should use its powers to create a fairer environment for international competition."

Mr. Colvin rose——

Mr. Stott: I shall give way in a moment.

[Mr. Stott]

Acknowledging that the British people play cricket while other countries play karate, the report's basic solution is that everyone should be persuaded to give up karate and play cricket. That reveals a very slim grasp of the realities of international trade and the commitment of other Governments to protect their interests, rather than the fixation of a single ideology, which I understand from the report is based upon unfettered competition——

Mr. Colvin rose——

Mr. Stott: The hon. Gentleman should be patient.

Mr. Colvin: The longer that the hon. Gentleman continues, the more I shall have to answer. He criticised the idea of a wholly regulated market, which is precisely what the bilateral agreement between Britain and Sri Lanka would lead to and which would be anathema to the whole principle of free trading.

The hon. Gentleman failed to acknowledge that in the NUS paper and brief, which I have read, the NUS recommended a totally controlled environment. It wants to control everything. It would nationalise everything—the shipping lines, the shipments, the forwarding agents, the docks and the shipbuilding companies. The whole lot would be integrated on a national state-owned basis. The NUS thinks that that would solve the problem. But it would not. It would lead to retaliation from our competitors overseas. The hon. Gentleman must appreciate that the cross trades are vital to our shipping industry. If we do anything to weaken our position, we will fire the equivalent of more than one Exocet at our fleet.

Mr. Stott: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, I do not know to which pamphlet he has referred. The NUS document does not mention the nationalisation of shipping companies. It certainly mentions a firmer degree of Government control, and I go along with that. Prior to the election the Labour party produced a document referring to a national shipping line. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman will find what he has suggested in the NUS document.

The hon. Gentleman is not a reluctant critic of the role of the Government. His report states:

"A long-term policy for British shipping is hard to detect. If there is an official view on the structure of the industry, on its tax regime, on its requirements for registration and regulation, it has yet to be made public as a coherent whole."

That is absolutely right.

The report continues:

"A general view has been promulgated neither by Ministers nor officials on the structure of the industry."

Again, the hon. Gentleman is spot on.

The report is critical of a lack of any real regulation over the conferences. It states:

"Despite a political belief"— that is the belief of the hon. Gentleman and his friend—

"that the conference system is ripe for reform . . . we have accepted the argument that any immediate dismantling of the system would quickly lead to disaster with the break up of much of the fleet and a consequent loss of influence worldwide."

The pamphlet sets out certain suggestions in respect of the conference decisions. I subscribe to the recommendations, which are absolutely right.

The hon. Gentleman talked about cabotage and state aid and said that the Government should be prepared to go to the European Court, if necessary, to ensure that other EEC countries do not breach the treaty of Rome on cabotage. The report makes a dramatic leap from having ended cabotage in Europe to pressing the United States Government to abandon cabotage and reversing Government-generated cargoes to United States flag ships. The demonstrates a degree of naivety. The chances of getting Greece to abandon cabotage are extremely remote, especially now that it is the dominant shipping industry within the EEC. Italy is trying to obtain EEC approval for a package of credit measures that would encourage Italian shipowners to order new ships in Italian yards. The United States Government have categorically stated that they will not alter the principles of the Jones Act, which provides for United States cabotage.

The blind faith of the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside in free trade leads him to confuse the ideal world of free trade and entrepreneurial endeavour, which he would like to see, with the real world of shipping. Cabotage exists and will continue to exist in the real world.

Mr. Colvin: When I suggested that it was about time that we talked seriously with the Americans, I went on to explain that we are already taking that approach. As is stated in my pamphlet and as I said earlier, we shall be more capable of acting internationally to try to remove some of the unfair practices of competing nations if we act jointly with our European partners. That is why my question to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State was so important. I referred to the shipping policy document that has been produced by the commissioners and I to Mr. Stanley Clinton Davis, who was an Opposition spokesman and who is now a Transport Commissioner. Mr. Davis should be in a strong position to be able to do something about cabotage and the evolution of a common shipping policy. We can tackle the problem of unfair competition elsewhere in the world only if we act in concert with our European partners. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will endorse the idea of a common shipping policy. If he does not, he will sign the death knell of the British merchant fleet.

Mr. Stott: What a tangled web we weave. I do not subscribe to what the hon. Gentleman has said. I do not think that we are likely to achieve any common cause with our European partners, for the reasons that I have outlined. I cannot envisage the Greeks, the Italians, the West Germans or the French agreeing to what the hon. Gentleman proposes. I redirect the hon. Gentleman's mind to a document produced by the NUS in 1984 in which it proposed that, in the first instance, coastal shipping should be regarded as domestic transport. It suggested that it was valid for every nation to reserve its coastal trade for its own flagged ships. However, if the EEC were to adopt new regulations within the terms of the treaty of Rome, it would be more appropriate to lift restrictions within the Community but to reserve the coastal trade to vessels registered within EEC states than to abandon coastal shipping to all comers. That is a proposal that would probably find acceptance.

I support the attack of the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside on the Government's taxation measures. That attack has been taken up by others, so I shall not rehearse his arguments on taxation. However, it greatly concerns the shipping industry that it is not treated in a way that would encourage it to keep British ships under the British flag.

The hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside has repeated the analysis that is set out in the document produced by the NUS on registration by acknowledging that foreign investment represents about half the ownership of the United Kingdom fleet. However, rather than seeing this as a source of insecurity and questioning more deeply why United Kingdom investors have been reluctant to put their money into shipping, the hon. Gentleman suggests that the development of a coherent shipping strategy depends on foreign investment. Surely he is aware that the whims of foreign investors are influenced by factors outside the control or influence of the British Government. The abandonment of United Kingdom shipping to their whims hardly demonstrates a commitment to ensure that United Kingdom shipping recovers from its current appalling decline.

The report of the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside draws attention to the need to ensure that substandard vessels do not obtain British registration without complying with British safety standards. That is to be applauded. However, the suggestion that more inspection work should be delegated to private sector classification does not make for an adequate system of ensuring that common safety standards are met and maintained.

The hon. Gentleman's pamphlet can be applauded also for its call that eligibility to register vessels should be confined to those over whom jurisdiction can be exercised. However, that contradicts other statements which support flags of convenience operators. Countries which operate the flag of convenience arrangement offer a major attraction, because they do not exercise effective jurisdiction.

The hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside referred to manning. The hon. Gentleman would not expect the Opposition and the NUS to agree to, participate in or countenance levels of manning which would clearly be unsafe. He would not expect us to allow the status of our seamen to be undermined by reducing wages and conditions to levels at which other seamen have to operate. The status of our seamen is a cost to the industry and it is one that the industry has to bear. We cannot, will not and should not be expected to agree to the lowering of the standards that our seafarers have obtained through negotiations with shipowners. We cannot allow that to happen.

The hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside was right when he mentioned the role of the merchant fleet and the defence of the nation. The defensive role of merchant shipping has long been recognised and supported by the Opposition and the NUS. It is to be welcomed that others adhere to the union's position. However, the hon. Gentleman's pamphlet seems not to take into consideration the link between shipping, shipbuilding, ship repairing and Government support in maintaining a defence capability. It is important that we recognise the link.

I apologise to the House for spending some time responding to the issues that the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside sets out in his pamphlet. I thought it only right to extend to him the courtesy of demonstrating that I have studied his pamphlet and taken some care in trying to understand what he has written and said. A number of sections are flawed, and I cannot agree with the conclusions that he has drawn in those respects; but his pamphlet and the suggestions that he has made, together with the debate that he has initiated, are to be greatly welcomed.

The decline in British shipping is serious. There is a general recognition throughout the House of that fact. In the last decade, the British merchant shipping fleet has declined from 50 million tonnes to 20 million tonnes. During the past 10 years, the number of seamen working on British ships has been halved to about 37,000. During the past two years, the balance of payments contribution from merchant shipping has been cut in two. The reason is simply that there are too many ships chasing too little cargo. Unfortunately, that is a fact of life.

We have heard and shall continue to hear the appropriate plaudits for our merchant seamen. With some regret I have to say to the Under-Secretary of State that the tax relief measures for our seamen undertaken last year by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget were a pretty poor reward for their service in the Falklands war. I hope that, if the Under-Secretary of State has some influence with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he will tell him that that measure went down badly in the shipping world, and certainly with those brave men and women who manned our merchant fleet during that crucial time.

Our merchant fleet is in bad shape. The Government have presided over 4 million of our citizens on the dole and over our industrial decline. Will they preside over the sun setting on the Red Ensign? I very much hope that that will not happen. The House expects the Under-Secretary of State to recognise that there is serious trouble ahead unless the Government do something about it.

Mr. Edward du Cann (Taunton): Following the admirable precedents set by the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) and the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott), I should like immediately to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on his choice of subject. This debate was certainly timely, and I should like to congratulate my hon. Friend on the excellent speech to which we had the pleasure of listening. I much appreciate the kindly things he said about the all-party parliamentary maritime affairs group and appreciate his consistent support of that body.

I have a single statement to make and a single question to put. I believe that I shall make common cause with the hon. Member for Wigan, my hon. Friends the Members for Romsey and Waterside and for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) and the right hon. Member for Western Isles. Indeed, I should be surprised if the House is not unanimous in these matters.

Britain is faced with an alarming decline in her merchant fleet which is now assuming crisis proportions. That is undoubted. The present condition of Britain's merchant navy is the Achilles heel of our economic and defence policy. The question that was posed immediately by my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside was: what do the Government propose to do about it? The need for action now — action this day, as Winston Churchill used to say—is undoubted.

Every right hon. and hon. Member who has participated in the debate so far has given the facts. In 1967, the British fleet was the largest in the world; by June 1983 it had dropped to eighth place in the world league, and it is still declining. What is worse, during the past three months no orders for merchant ships have been placed in British yards. Picking up a point made by the right hon. Member for Western Isles, in 1970 Britain had 160 distant water trawlers, last year it had 10, and this year it has none. The loss of trained seafarers is now running at a rate of 5,000 officers and men a year. Educational and training establishments are being closed, and the cadet schemes are virtually extinct. In 1970, the annual number of entrants of engineering cadets was about 1,000; last year it was 70. It does not matter which aspect of the scene one examines —the picture as a whole is horrifying.

It is possible to say that there is a world surplus of ships and shipbuilding capacity and a world recession, as my hon. Friends the Members for Romsey and Waterside and for Boothferry pointed out. Of course that is true, but it is only part of the story. Since 1945, world trade has grown eightfold—with 99 per cent. or more carried in ships. As my hon. Friends have pointed out, other nations have substantially expanded their fleets. They include China, Korea and, not least, as my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside pointed out, Comecon and the Russians.

Soviet Russia is now a formidable maritime state while, in comparison, the United States is a naval power only. The Soviet naval fleet is now larger than the British fleet. Russian warships are second in number only to those of the United States. The Soviet submarine fleet, with 400 ships in service—a new submarine completed every 40 days—is larger than the one Dönitz commanded, which so nearly brought our country to its knees in the 1940s. The Russian fishing fleet—also used from time to time for military purposes—is the largest in the world, as is the Russian fleet of ice-strengthened ships. The Soviet Union's hydrographic capability is by far the greatest in the world while ours—potentially the finest in the world — is disgracefully neglected, as I have often complained. I cannot get out of my mind the words of Admiral Gorshkov:

> "Soviet seapower . . . has become the optimum means by which to defeat the imperialist enemy and the most important element in the Soviet arsenal to prepare the way for a Communist world."

It is not unimportant to ponder those words while we are in the midst of this successful visit, which I greatly welcome, by Mr. Gorbachev.

What about our friends and allies? It is a fact that the United Kingdom's merchant fleet is declining faster than that of any of our allies in NATO or in the European Community. We can, therefore, safely deduce that the dominant cause of the decline of our Merchant Navy is not the recession but the way in which our country has reacted to it.

It has been common ground among every right hon. and hon. Member who has spoken in this debate that a national shipping capability is vital in peace time, for numerous good commercial reasons — for instance, its direct contribution to our balance of payments, which is still running as high as £1 billion a year, although, as the right hon. Member for Western Isles pointed out, it had gone as high as £2·5 billion in 1974. Such capability is vital for the security of availability of cargo space, and for some control over freight rates. After all, 98 per cent. of our trade goes by sea.

It would surely be extreme folly to be exclusively or nearly dependent on foreign carriers and to put Britain's life support system in the hands of our competitors, or perhaps even our enemies. This process has already gone pretty far. I cite three instances, one of which was given by my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside when he pointed out that, of 180 supply ships in the British sector of the North sea, only about 100 fly the Red Ensign. Clearly, that is different from the Norwegian sector, as my hon. Friend rightly said. Secondly, believe it or not, three quarters of our oil and gas from Sullom Voe in the Shetlands is carried in foreign ships. Thirdly, in total, less than one third of our imports are now carried in British registered ships. Some may think, as I do, that the process has gone too far already, but there are many indirect reasons for supporting a substantial British Merchant Navy capability. A thriving and substantial British merchant fleet is the key to and basis for a British shipbuilding industry, a British ship repairing industry, a prosperous marine engineering and equipment industry, and substantial invisible earnings in the City through brokerage, insurance and so on.

London is currently the world maritime centre. I believe it to be of great benefit to the United Kingdom that we should maintain that position. In an emergency our national merchant fleet, as the hon. Member for Wigan said, is, in effect, Britain's fourth arm of defence. Its military task is to transport men and supplies; its economic task is to keep our people fed and supplied. Besides that, as the right hon. Member for Western Isles and my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry said, it is the Navy's reserve of manpower. Adverting in particular to what the right hon. Member for Western Isles said, a comparison with the years gone by that he and I remember is interesting. In 1934, there were 200,000 British men at sea upon whom the Navy could call for reserves. Today, there are a mere 45,000

All those benefits to the United Kindgom economy and employment are at risk. They should not be. They need not be. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is a great friend of mine whom I much admire. He is serving our country well in Government. I must tell him that in the face of the most worrying circumstances I regard the inertia and complacency of successive Governments as intolerable. I remember raising the subject on the Adjournment in November 1982 The Minister then replying, who is not now in the House, said that he shared the concern that was expressed. He further said that he would come forward in the almost immediate future with some measures. Nothing happened. Now, even the OECD is sounding a clear warning in its publication "Maritime Transport" which states:

> "OECD Governments . . .must take a more active part in shipping and can no longer rely on the resolution of problems between shippers and ship owners while limiting themselves to the role of observers".

Those are wise words. Someone said to me the other day that he thought the attitude of successive Governments to the provision of the Merchant Navy was the equivalent of the man who leant out of a window halfway up a skyscraper to watch a man falling from the top. As the man who was falling went past him he said, "How are you getting on?" The man replied, "So far, so good."

The Government cannot any longer just stand by. What is the right course for Ministers? I do not believe that policy is difficult to decide. I believe that all in the House would agree upon it. We should declare loudly and certainly that Britain needs its Merchant Navy. We should accept that the Government have a responsibility to provide the political, diplomatic and fiscal climate in which shipping can survive and prosper.

Now to practical proposals. In the past 25 years—I am sure that we would all agree — shipping has advanced technically, it would seem, about as far as practicable. What with megaships, containerisation, integration with land transport and a substantial reduction in crew numbers, it is right to claim that the industry has done its part. Now, it seems, is the time for Government to back the United Kingdom commercial effort. I say now —I am sure I speak for the whole House—how much the presence of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to listen to part of the debate is welcomed.

What does Government backing of the United Kingdom commercial effort mean? I believe that what it means, above all, is all Government Departments acting together. We have listened to a torrent of complaints—I believe entirely justified—about the changes introduced in the last Budget by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, with depreciation and tax allowances for seamen being removed. He could not have hit the industry a harder blow than he did with those two measures.

One is entitled to ask what consultation there was with the Department of Transport before those measures were introduced. What is the Department doing, on its own account, to influence other Government Departments to stop the chartering of foreign ships? What are we doing chartering foreign ships when so many of our seamen are out of work? Adverting to a point that has been made several times already, and which is in the minds of us all, I do not recall seeing Swedish, Danish and Norwegian ships in the Falklands when the Exocets were flying around. Out duty is to support our people.

Like my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, I believe in the virtues of competition, but what our shipping companies are facing in world markets, as my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside said, is anything but fair competition. For instance, five European Community countries ban United Kingdom ships from their coastal waters while we allow free access. That was a point brilliantly brought out by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) in a question to the Prime Minister a little while ago. Whatever the method is for dealing with it—we have been arguing across the House about it—why do we allow it at all? Why do we allow such a state of affairs to continue? A further 25 nations actively discriminate against British shipping using their ports although, again, their ships use our ports without hindrance. Why do we allow such things to happen?

Discrimination, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside referred, can take many forms. I have a note of about 68 different examples, many by developing countries. It is particularly odious when developing countries discriminate against British shipping when United Kingdom-financed cargoes are being delivered to their shores. Governments all over the world disregard the virtues of fair competition. It is therefore incumbent upon my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to ensure that the Government mount a determined political and diplomatic offensive to counter discrimination.

Retaliation may even be called for. In my view, it is justified in the context of the United Kingdom's present employment position. We should have the courage and realism to do it. Since quotations have been the order of the day, not least from my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside, who gave a particularly appropriate one, perhaps I could quote John Stuart Mill who said:

"In labouring for one's own country in the right principle we labour for all humanity."

What we need, in a sentence, is a national maritime policy designed to defend and advance the British industry and the British interest. We want that campaign carried forward with imagination and pertinacity. That is the message that will come from the debate. We look to the Government to provide it. I have every confidence that my right hon. and hon. Friends will take that initiative. Heaven knows, in the national interest, it is badly needed.

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): The hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) spoke one significant sentence of which I took note. He claimed that British shipping was facing extinction. That is nothing new for the House to hear. Hon. Members have been saying year in, year out that shipping was facing extinction, but successive Governments have done little or nothing about it. That is a sad fact, but one which we must accept.

On Friday morning I shall be at the Swan Hunter yard in Wallsend. I shall be on board the Atlantic Conveyor to have a final look at that ship before it goes on its maiden voyage. Unfortunately, that is the last merchant ship on the river Tyne, as the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) will confirm. It means that for the first time since the 1930s no commercial shipbuilding will be taking place on Tyneside, and it does not seem as though there is any possibility of receiving any orders within the near future. Therefore, not only merchant shipping but commercial shipbuilding is facing extinction.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) asked the Minister a series of questions, during which he placed his finger on the dilemma that faces us. In the House there are basically two distinct political philosophies: one is the virtue of free competition, and the other is the principle of state intervention. Some would call it Socialism but I prefer to call it state intervention. That is the dilemma. The shipping industry is facing the same dilemma as the cotton, textile, machine tool and steel industries and the fishing fleet—I could go on and on. We have not resolved the dilemmas of those industries. For that reason, this country faces a desperate situation with regard to its productive and manufacturing basis.

The Government have distanced, and continue to distance, themselves from those problems. Because of a lack of state intervention, or at least a move by the Government of the day towards a more careful analysis of the problems, we continue to drift. The chances of any good coming out of today's debate are not great, because of the basic philosophy of the Prime Minister herself, so ably backed by some members of her Cabinet. She has often said that one cannot solve a problem simply by throwing money at it. The root cause of the problem is how we finance the British shipping industry in the context of the role that it performs, as has been said by Conservative Members, including the hon. Member for Romsey and

[Mr. Ted Garrett]

Waterside. We are no nearer an answer to the problem than we were when I started my political career in the House some 21 years ago.

I am proud to represent Wallsend in the north-east. There are strong and traditional maritime instincts in that area. People not only built the ships, but sailed in them. The port of South Shields, which my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) has the honour to represent, suffered the largest loss of life among men lost at sea in both world wars. Men have also been lost in peacetime, sailing in ships that have provided the lifeline to our nation.

There are training facilities and technical colleges. There is one at Southampton, and one on the north-east coast, at South Shields, where men have been trained for service in the Merchant Navy—marine engineers, radio operators, deck hands and, of course, officers. When they went to sea, those men performed good jobs. They learnt traditional skills, and when their service ended they came ashore to play a highly valued role in industry because of their skills. The mere fact that there will be fewer vacancies for the positions that I have mentioned means that the skills referred to repeatedly in the House over the past few months will go. Is it any wonder that the recently reconstituted Engineering Council has decided to run a series of advertisements emphasising the role of engineering skills, which are so essential to this country's future?

In our shipping industry, this country has been to the fore in introducing regulations to improve safety, and these are being applied more and more in other nations' merchant ships. However, at the end of the day we must believe in ourselves and ask whether we want a shipping industry. The answer is still unclear.

Admittedly other countries are in a worse state than we are, but some are better off. I should like to refer to China. It is appropriate that I should do so, because this afternoon the Prime Minister left on a very important mission to China. China recognises that there is overcapacity in shipbuilding and has delivered a pledge not to disrupt world shipbuilding markets any further. China has told international shipowners and builders that for the time being it does not intend to become a major shipyard power. If that is so, one of the items on the Prime Minister's agenda, in addition to signing the agreement on the future of Hong Kong, should be to ascertain whether there is a market in China and, if so, what aid we can give British Shipbuilders or the private sector to obtain orders from that country.

Some five or six years ago I attended a lunch in the City of London given by the General Council of British Shipping. The then chairman was Peter Walters, who is now the head of British Petroleum. He forecast that there would be a surge of orders by British shipowners because of the aging of the British Merchant Navy. Regrettably, that has not happened, yet the prospects in other countries for more shipbuilding orders are not too bad. It would be foolish to think that no ships are being built anywhere. Many ships are being built in other countries, and we must look more thoroughly at the market; for example, in India.

It is estimated that one third of the Indian merchant fleet of over 10 million tonnes deadweight will be due for replacement by modern fuel-efficient container ships during the seventh plan for the years 1985-90, according to informed sources in New Delhi. I might be straying from the motion, but I am sure that people in British Shipbuilders will read the debate, and I should like them to bear in mind that there is a market there and they can go out and get it. Just as I make no apology for asking for public assistance to get those orders, so I make no apology for asking for direct intervention to save the British shipbuilding industry.

It is often said that if one is a Socialist there is some doubt about whether one is as patriotic as those in the Conservative party, who make great claims to patriotism. But where is the patriotism? It should be applied in view of the simple fact that the British merchant shipping industry is essential to the defence of this country. There is a lack of patriotism by Conservative Members who have to make the decisions about whether we are to have a shipping industry. We cannot carry on just letting industries decline. That has to stop, in the interests not only of the people whose livelihoods are affected but, more importantly, of the whole nation.

Conservative Members who have participated so far in the debate have shown a remarkable awareness of the problem facing the industry, and they have displayed a certain amount of courage when they have had the temerity to criticise the fundamental policy that motivates the Government. If they can change that policy, they will get total support from the Opposition.

Mr. Neville Trotter (Tynemouth): The situation is indeed grave. Britain's historical background to its maritime traditions and links is so great that it is staggering that two thirds of the Merchant Navy has disappeared in just nine years. Given that the history of the United Kingdom has been built up on our maritime endeavour, that is indeed staggering. I can only reflect that as a country we have failed to give more attention to the staggering decline in one of our great historical industries simply because employment in it has not been concentrated in particular parts of the country.

I believe that the man in the street—whether he lives at the seaside or inland—believes that Britain needs a Merchant Navy and that there is increasingly national concern about the decline in, and even the collapse of, this industry.

One newspaper recently published interesting figures about the size of individual companies. My father worked for P and O before the war, when I remember that it had more than 200 ships. That was a long time ago, but today P and O has just 24 ships. Furness Withy has 13 ships, Ellermans six, and British and Commonwealth only four. I appreciate that some of these companies are also members of container consortia, but these figures represent a staggering reduction in the British fleet. It is right that the House should debate this subject today, and I join in the congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on choosing it.

Other hon. Members have referred to the reasons for this decline, one of which is the fall in coastal trade. Coastal traffic has practically ceased as a means of communication. In the days when the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) and I were at school, the Tyne was crowded with colliers taking coal to the south. Nowadays that coal goes to power stations near the collieries and is conveyed by electric line to the south of the country.

Britain now trades far more with Europe, and consequently less of our home trade is taken on long-distance journeys by sea. Less oil is now brought into the country from overseas. Every 1 million tonnes of additional output from the North sea means that one tanker fewer is required. Some tankers are still needed to carry oil from some of the wells to the ports, but the oil also comes ashore by pipeline, and we should contrast the demand for tankers to bring the oil ashore from a few miles out in the North sea with the demand required to bring it around Africa from the Gulf. That sector has also witnessed a great fall in demand.

Container ships are now being made more efficient than the ships they replaced. As well as being larger, each spends only a short time in port. In the old days the ships spent a long time in port, but those days have gone because container ships unload in 24 hours and are off again. One such ship now does the job of seven or eight of its predecessors.

The world depression has also had an effect on our trading situation. The first effect was on the tanker industry, when a flood of cheap ships from the low-wage shipyards of the far east were bought up in vast numbers. Having destroyed the tanker market, those shipyards began to construct bulk carriers, with the result that that sector was also destroyed. We have heard earlier in the debate about the way in which the container business is in turn about to be affected by a vast over-expansion in the number of container ships. Huge fleets of new container ships are ready to come into service in the near future, and one of the sectors that is still doing quite well will be badly affected.

World trade by sea has grown by 28 per cent. in 14 years, but in that time the tonnage of ships available to carry the trade has more than doubled. That has had an appalling effect on freight rates, which are now lower than six years ago. While 1984 was a bad year for world shipping, and for western shipping in particular, it looks as though 1985 will follow the same sad pattern.

Several hon. Members have referred to the defence implications of the Merchant Navy, and it is on that that I wish to concentrate. The developments in the Falkland Islands a couple of years ago dramatically focused attention on the requirements for the Merchant Navy. There is, however, a danger that as time passes we shall lose impetus. It is, therefore, with relief that I congratulate my right hon. Friend and his colleagues in the Ministry of Defence on setting up an inquiry into the adequacy of the Merchant Navy in a war or crisis. I hope that that inquiry will investigate "out of NATO area" operations as well as operations in the north Atlantic. Should some terrible circumstances again require Britain to act alone—God forbid that it will ever happen—we shall have to look to our own resources. We shall be unable to count on our NATO allies in that situation.

During the Falklands crisis, 20 product tankers were sent south to support the Royal Navy. At that time, BP had 25 or 30 such ships in its fleet. I understand that now it has only eight, far fewer than would be needed to support another Falkland Islands operation. There has been a particularly critical fall in the number of specialist ships.

Some figures about shipping requirements in the event of a crisis in Europe are freely available in America—though not perhaps in this country. I understand that 1·5 million men would be flown across the Atlantic, but their equipment would have to come by sea. Further, 8·5 million tonnes of stores plus 10 million tonnes of fuel would have to be brought across the Atlantic. That would require 2,000 shiploads a month. On top of that, a similiar requirement would be needed to maintain the civilian and industrial life of Europe. These are enormous figures, and it is right that the Government should now be inquiring into the continuing capability of the Merchant Navy to play its part in dealing with such a crisis.

Manning would be a particular problem in a crisis. The number of our people at sea has nearly halved in the last 10 years, and is falling at the rate of about 5,000 a year from its present level of 41,000. As we have heard, the number of cadets recruited is also causing great concern. At one time, 1,000 cadets a year were recruited, but it is now a fraction of that number. Therefore, we shall be unable to produce the officers of the future.

It is no good having ships available under flags of convenience which could be requisitioned at a time of crisis if there is no one to man them. It could well be that the existing foreign crews would refuse to sail into particularly hazardous waters, and we might have to rely on our own sailors.

Given the present state of oversupply, with 1,400 surplus ships laid up in the world's ports, it is easy to acquire a second-hand ship cheaply. It is therefore important to do everything we can to maintain the safety of international shipping operations. I very much welcome the recent increase in the number of port inspections. There are now about 10,000 inspections a year, and the need for them is highlighted by the fact that well over 13,000 defects were discovered. No fewer than 430 ships inspected were detained or delayed because they had serious deficiencies. That was 6 per cent. of all the ships inspected. Clearly, that effort needs to be maintained.

The main cause of the problems in the British Merchant Navy is the protectionism of the developing world, which uses its own fleets to gain hard currency and to develop an industry. Those countries gain great advantage from their cheap labour. There is no doubt that this will be a permanent problem for Britain and the other western ship-owning countries. The same applies to much of manufacturing industry, but the problem is highlighted at sea.

Recently I spoke to the manager of a foreign-owned company which still operates from London. On ships registered under the Red Ensign, crew costs account for two thirds of the income, while on ships registered in Liberia or one of the other flags of convenience countries the crew costs account for only one third of the income. That kind of difference highlights the great problems when operating under the Red Ensign, as we all wish.

Turning to specialist ships, the difference in crew costs is not so much a factor. Crewing costs can be the least of the requirements when providing a complex service, whether it be container ships, gas carriers or other specialist vessels. Countries such as Britain are still able to compete in providing ships of that kind.

What can we do for the future? We can try to be more efficient. We can cut crews. I do not believe that this will in itself solve the problem, but we have to do all we can to be as efficient as possible. In recent years there have been quite dramatic falls in the size of crews. A ship which a few years ago had a crew of about 60 has been replaced by a ship with a crew of 31. That in turn will be replaced by ships which are now being built for crews of about 21. Japan is talking seriously about operating large ships with crews as low as 12. Technology will bring further changes in the manning of ships. However, that will not deal with the magnitude of the problems that have been outlined in the debate.

If I may deal with subsidies, I do not believe that British shipowners seek to be subsidised. However, they say with great justification that they are at a disadvantage compared with other western operators and even more with the countries of the eastern bloc which pay no regard to normal commercial factors. I trust that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Transport will refer in his winding-up speech to the discussions that have taken place with the Soviet Union on the passenger cruise liner sector of the industry, which has been so harmed by competition from the non-profitmaking, subsidised Soviet merchant navy, the size of which has been so well portrayed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. du Cann) who, again, made a strong case for the Merchant Navy.

What can we do to provide our shipowners with at last the same financial assistance as is given by their western competitors? I support fully what has been said about the negative nature of the Budget changes that have been made this year and the suggestion made by the GCBS that the fleet should be allowed, in addition to the 25 per cent. writing-down allowance, a 50 per cent. ship allowance for new and second-hand ships. Nothing less than that will encourage the investment that is so desperately needed.

The hon. Member for Wallsend referred to the fact that he and I have been invited to go on board Atlantic Conveyor later this week. It is sad indeed that we should these days be talking about individual new ships, not fleets of ships. One ship today is a great achievement for both the shipbuilders and the shipowners of Britain. It is indeed tragic that when Atlantic Conveyor sails there will not, for the first time in centuries, be a merchant ship being built on the Tyne. We must do everything we can to encourage shipowners to continue to invest. The financial state of their industry is so bad that they cannot invest without tax relief. If they are not asking for operating subsidies they should at least be given tax relief. The lack of incentive and of help to our shipowners makes Britain unique. It needs to be put right.

I come to the problems of navigation, and the ports around our coasts. They have the greatest effect upon the British Merchant Navy since it is the British Merchant Navy that uses our ports most. Pilotage is a matter that deserves a separate debate. I welcome the recent publication of a Green Paper on that difficult subject. Ships coming to this country can be charged £12,000 for light dues, whereas if they go to continental ports they pay nothing at all. This leads to ships avoiding Great Britain and to traffic being diverted from our ports to western European ports, with goods being brought on to Britain on cross-Channel ferries. This results in a further adverse effect upon our deep-sea shipping fleet.

I was at Southampton recently. It was a sad sight. That great port has eight container channels. Not one container was to be seen there. The whole trade of the port has gone. While that is harmful to Britain and surely disastrous for Southampton, it must certainly also be bad for the British Merchant Navy if ports of that magnitude are closed down by the lunatic action of the labour force. I say to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Transport that the dock work labour scheme must be given further attention by the Government in the interests of those who work in the industry as much as of those in the Merchant Navy.

One of the problems is the lack of co-ordiation between Ministries. That is not through any lack of goodwill or intent. It is just the result of the history of Government in this country. I do not believe it to be sensible that the vital question of labour relations in the ports should not be handled by the same Ministry as deals with the Merchant Navy.

The efficiency of ships can be helped by improvements in fuel efficiency and design. I welcome the efficient ship project, which the Government are supporting, but I repeat that there will be no investment in new ships unless there are Budget changes. The inadequacies of the present system must be put right in the next Budget.

I believe that this will not be the end of the matter for this House. A maritime league has been formed in this country, consisting of eminent people who deal with every aspect of maritime life. It will continue the battle for the Merchant Navy. There is a maritime affairs committee in the House. It is on an all-party basis and is chaired admirably by my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton. It will not go away, either.

I am sure that we shall return to this subject. The message that has to go out from our debate today is that as a first step the Treasury must accept the need to give assistance in the next Budget to our shipowners. It is absolutely vital that this message should be taken on board.

5.57 pm

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): I am pleased to follow the hon. Members for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) and for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett), because I know a little about the technical college which trains Merchant Navy officers and personnel at South Shields. Until recently my daughter taught there. She conveyed to me the depressing nature of the rundown in numbers and the virtual closure of that college, which has played such a great role over many years.

I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on choosing this subject for debate. It is important that we should discuss these matters —in particular the dramatic decline in the strength of our Merchant Navy and the continual rundown of our shipyards.

As has been mentioned, since 1975 the number of ships in our merchant fleet has more than halved. The number has gone down from 1,600 to only 700. Between 1977 and 1980 about 24,000 jobs were shed in British shipyards, and many more have disappeared since then. More shipyards have been closed and there have been continual lay-offs. A great number of lay-offs are taking place at the moment, not only in the north-east, but in Southampton, at Vosper Thornycroft, a very modern shipyard which I believe should never have been nationalised. No new orders at all were received by British shipyards between July and September.

However, I welcome, as I am sure the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) also welcomes, the recent order which has been placed by British Steel for a bulk carrier at Harland and Wolff. My inspection of Harland and Wolff leads me to believe that it is as superbly equipped a shipyard as any in the Western world. That at least is one piece of good news. Every effort must be made to keep Harland and Wolff in operation.

Fiscal measures relating to taxation would help the shipowners of this country. I shall not repeat what has already been said. I support the GCBS proposal for a 50 per cent. ship allowance, not only for new but for second-hand vessels.

The "British Shipping Review 1984" says that Norway, Denmark and Japan provide extended periods of finance for up to 10 or 12 years, with initial grace periods of two to three years. While those schemes may have been devised to help domestic shipbuilders, obviously British shipowners have had some benefit from that. There is a host of examples of the sort of help given in West Germany, the Netherlands and many other parts of the world.

Does this country really want to opt out of owning a merchant fleet or building any more ships? Some operators in the City believe that we cannot compete and that, therefore, we should order all our ships from Taiwan—I have seen the very impressive shipyard there—Japan or Korea and perhaps merely fit out ships in this country.

That view was put to me by a City shipowner—I shall not name him—when I suggested where he might order his new ferry. The Under-Secretary may guess where it will be operating to and from. The Robb Caledon yard had just closed, and it seemed to me that such an order would be a great opportunity to reopen the yard. He said that I must be mad if I thought that he could get a ship built on competitive terms in a British yard. He said that the order would go perhaps to Scandinavia, but probably to the far east and that all that a British yard could do would be to fit out the ship.

That view is far too defeatist and must be resisted. The Government must help. I welcome the establishment of the all-party maritime affairs committee under the distinguished chairmanship of the right hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. du Cann), who spoke so knowledgably earlier. However, we are late on the scene. As a member of the committee, I pledge that we shall maintain the pressure until we see an upturn in our merchant fleet.

I congratulate the Government on facing reality in their Green Paper on maritime pilotage. That remark will probably not go down too well in my constituency, because a number of pilots live there, but the Government cannot opt out of the compensatory redundancy payments that will inevitably arise. The Green Paper says:

> "The Government propose that as a matter of mechanics the cost of the scheme should be met from a levy on harbour authorities, which would be recoverable from a special charge on shipowners."

We made a previous attempt to get some sense into pilotage, and it was accepted that 600 or more pilots might be made redundant. At that time, it was thought that redundancy payments would average about £80,000 per pilot. The shipowners said that they could not meet such sums, and it is hardly likely that they will be able to do so today when the situation is so much worse. There is a case for what the Government have set out in the Green Paper. However, the terms will have to be generous if we are to get a sensible settlement. A three-way split between the state, port authorities and shipowners is surely the right way forward.

Like other hon. Members, I am depressed by what I have seen across the water from my constituency, in Southampton. The actions of some dockyard workers and their colleagues in that port are, as was said earlier, sheer lunacy. They have put in jeopardy the jobs of too many innocent bystanders, whose livelihoods depend on a vigorous, modern, well-run port complex. Many Southampton operators have moved to Felixstowe, and one has even gone back to Liverpool. Perhaps we should give a cheer for Liverpool, but if Southampton has put itself in the same league as Liverpool, I deeply regret it.

Southampton has all the advantages: excellent facilities, four tides a day, and so on. Regrettably, the workers have committed suicide, and they have taken many pilots, tug owners and launch supply operators with them. That has had an effect in my constituency. Even taxi drivers in Southampton complain bitterly. The whole economy of Southampton has been affected.

A new attitude is required if we are to put matters right. We need a competitive port with a sustained record of industrial peace. Otherwise, shipowners from abroad will not come to our ports. We need to make proper use of modern technology and end overmanning, though with adequate redundancy terms.

As has been said repeatedly in the debate, we need the Government to provide a more sympathetic tax regime and financial help over the next few years similar to that which is so readily available to our competitors. We want fewer crippling charges imposed on shipowners and a determined effort to encourage people to buy British and to repair ships in British yards.

I tried today to get a copy of the evidence given to the Select Committee on Defence by the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, but I gather that it has not yet been published, so we cannot read what was said. The hon. Gentleman was dealing with the role of the merchant fleet in support of the Royal Navy in times of crisis, and what I have heard secondhand is not reassuring. Therefore, I hope that the Under-Secretary will say more about the issue when he replies to the debate.

I welcome the inquiry that is to be set up, but it is far too late. We know what the inquiry will show, and if we wish to save our merchant fleet we must take action now.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): I shall not follow what the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) said about the problems of the dock industry in Southampton, though we could have a fruitful debate on that subject alone.

I join other hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on his success in the ballot and on his choice of subject. It must be clear to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Transport that the House is disturbed by the decline in the size and scope of the British merchant marine.

Various figures have been bandied about, but I prefer the simpler and more homely statistic that our fleet has been declining by two ships a week—we have seen the fleet stealing away into the mist—and it is continuing to decline.

Every hon. Member has asked the simple question: is it in the national interest that there should have been such a decline and that the decline should continue? The answer from every hon. Member has been a firm no.

The message from the debate is that, although we all have our own solutions, we agree that in the national interest the present situation must not continue. In saying that I must declare an interest, because my constituency, which surrounds Southampton and includes a corner of the city, is deeply involved in the shipping industry and I have professional contacts with the industry.

No hon. Member has yet discussed the Government's policy as they have stated it. It has been suggested that the Government do not have a policy but I know that they have one, because it was spelt out to me by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport in reply to a question from me earlier this year. My right hon. Friend told me:

"The Government will continue to fight strenuously for the widest and fairest possible opportunities for British merchant shipping to compete in the shipping markets of the world. The industry's future will depend mainly on the use it makes of those opportunities, and thus on the enterprise of our shipowners and seafarers. These have always been the main factors in the industry's fortunes."—[Official Report, 9 July 1984; Vol. 63, c. 375.]

How far have the Government succeeded in achieving the laudable objective set out in the first sentence of that answer?

The annual report of the GCBS states:

"Non-commercially operated shipping from Soviet bloc countries continues to cause major problems in many important liner trades and in the UK cruise market by grossly undercutting British and other Western operators."

There should be an agreement with the NUS about that. I am sure that Jim Slater would agree that the Soviet bloc has been undercutting.

The report continues:

"Moreover, in the liner trades, a deluge of new tonnage is about to fall on the market. Highly subsidised either by the shipowning or shipbuilding country, in some cases operated by companies based in countries which restrict access to their own trades, these ships will operate almost exclusively as cross-traders. Many will be manned and operated from relatively prosperous newly industrialised countries, where trade unions show modest aspirations for their members.

Hence they will have substantial cost advantages over operators from European countries of comparative affluence."

I speak as a former Minister at the Board of Trade, and it is clear to me that that in ordinary language means dumping. We must therefore use some form of anti-dumping legislation against them. I am without doubt in favour of action. Obviously, the action is better done if we can do it on a European basis. I am glad to tell the House that from my information the Commission of the European Community is well seized of that matter and is well on the way to producing a shipping policy to put before the Council of Ministers. I commend what I have seen of it in draft form.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I only wish to say I received it on Wednesday and that I agree.

Sir David Price: When my hon. Friend replies to the debate, I hope that he will support what is being proposed in Brussels. Broadly, the message is that the time has come when we must collectively take action against unfair competition, and that it is better done collectively than individually. Therefore, I hope that the Government will give the new policy their full support.

In the meantime, European countries would be in a better position to take such action if they lived by anti-discrimination within Europe. Many hon. Members, especially my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. du Cann), referred to my efforts this summer to demand action against our so-called partners in Europe for not allowing free access to their coastal waters. My hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) suggested that there had been a great decline in coastal shipping. I remind him that coastal shipping round our own coasts carries in terms of tonne-mileage 2·8 times more freight than is carried by rail. It is second only to transport by road as the main United Kingdom carrier of freight. I commend to the House the figures that I received in reply to a question that I put to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on 25 June. Coastal shipping is increasing, not declining, largely because of the moving of oil products.

Mr. Trotter: I referred to the 1930s, when there were between 50 and 70 colliers on the Tyne, and at a small port like Blyth between 30 and 40. Now the figures would be two or three for that particular trade.

Sir David Price: There has been an increase in fuel technology, and in those days there were no large coastal refineries. What we have lost in coal we have gained in oil. I repeat that coastal shipping is the second most important method of moving freight around our kingdom.

With regard to the extension of the Community to include Spain and Portugal, if we have free cabotage for British shipping within the EC, the Atlantic ports and the whole of the northern Mediterranean coast will be open to our coastal traders. That would be a great bonus to British coastal shipping. When my hon. Friend replies, I look forward to repeated assurances in addition to those which he has already given me that in the Council of Ministers we shall fight for British rights of coastal access.

I deal next with other forms of appropriate Government aid within the context of free trading and an open seas policy, which the industry and I support. I agree with many of my right hon. and hon. Friends that the Chancellor's measures in the last Budget were not helpful. I hope that some effort will be made to reverse them. It is perfectly legitimate to ask for appropriate tax treatment of capital in the next Budget. The Minister knows that the industry has been making representations about that. I know that this is not the occasion to advance detailed arguments, but I hope that he will give the general idea a fair wind. Similarly, current shipping costs are largely crew and fuel costs. The impact of crew costs can be assisted through favourable taxation treatment. I shall not develop the point further.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth referred to the problem of lights, and the hon. Member for Isle of Wight commended, as I do, the new proposals on pilotage. However, there is a problem of charges. In a perfect world it is right that the charges should be borne by the industry, but in an imperfect world the industry finds them hard to bear, especially as none of its competitors must bear them. That point is not fully appreciated. The main users of lights are not the merchant fleet, but private yachtsmen. Merchant ships are so well equipped with navigational aids that they need lights less than they did in the past. Therefore, I hope that my hon. Friend will consider further the lights problem.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth wisely said that the Merchant Navy is the fourth arm of defence. However, both its size and mix are matters for its effective support of the Royal Navy. Even more critical is the time scale of the decline both in absolute terms and in the mix of the fleet. I suspect that the admirals who do their sums assume that what is on the books now will be on the books in four years' time. However, given the trends that many hon. Members have described to the House, that cannot be a certain assumption.

There is also the question of flagged-out ships which may be under beneficial ownership from this country. There is no certainty whether the crews of those ships will be available in an emergency. That deserves more study than it has so far been given.

Thought should be given to providing some sort of financial arrangements to companies which commit their ships to the Ministry of Defence, similar to that which exists for people—a ship version of the Royal Naval Reserve. There should also be a form of bounty for reserved ships. That would be a legitimate way of giving a little modest help to British shipping companies at this difficult time.

The decline of the British Merchant Navy has reached disturbing proportions. It must be halted and reversed. I invite the Government so to do. Although this is Christmas time, I do not ask the Government to emulate Santa Claus, only to be wise men.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): I congratulate and thank the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) for initiating this important debate. The hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) talked about the colliers on the river Tyne. I can remember colliers, Blue Star boats, city boats and tankers lying three or four abreast, but now there are virtually no ships to be seen.

My area designs, builds, sails and maintains ships. The Royal Navy cannot be divorced from the merchant fleet, nor the capacity to build and maintain the fleet. I agree with the right hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. du Cann) that we require a maritime policy. We have asked for a maritime policy on many occasions in the House, and the Select Committee on Trade and Industry recommended it in 1981. Britain must be the only maritime nation that has no maritime policy.

I was born in Jarrow, which was a shipbuilding town, and from the day I was born I was meant to work in the shipyards, just as someone born with a silver spoon in his mouth is meant to go to Eton. My grandparents and father were shipyard workers, and I was always being told how important seagoing was. I was told a tale about a Mr. Jenks who used to deliver manure by horse and cart. He did so, despite the arrival of gas turbine motor cars, jet aircraft and spaceships, because he discovered that with his horse and cart he could deliver manure with an economy and a certainty that pleased his customers and repaid him. Manure for the fields of England and food and goods for the rapidly increasing number of under-fed people in the world need neither missiles, spaceships nor jets; just a safe and certain means of transport so that the cost can be kept as low as possible.

If Mr. Jenks' horse became a Pegasus and grew wings, it might be able to lift about 15 lb of books from the Table and carry them through the air. However, if we taught the horse to swim, it could probably tow 50 or 60 hon. Members through the sea. Horse power is extremely important. It is important to realise that it could take 15 lb by air, but 9,000 lb by sea.

The need for a navy stems principally from the possession of a merchant fleet and the need to ensure that merchant ships have unhampered passage through the world's sea routes. General Galtieri taught Britain a lesson about the importance of surface ships and a merchant fleet; 54 merchant ships were in the task force that went to the Falklands. Everyone, from the Prime Minister upwards, or downwards—it depends how one looks at it—realised the importance of our merchant fleet. Yet, since the Falklands crisis, there has been a reduction of 200 ships in the merchant fleet. During the NATO exercise Operation Lionheart we had to charter foreign vessels.

There has been much publicity recently about the Royal Princess, which was built in Finland. It was a tragedy and a disgrace that British Shipbuilders did not tender for that ship, which is one of the finest passenger ships sailing the oceans.

Many hon. Members have mentioned the fact that the 1984 Budget was a disaster for United Kingdom shipping. The first thing that the Treasury should do is to put that right by introducing 100 per cent. fair share allowances and free depreciation, not by removing the 25 per cent. tax relief for seafarers, as is promised in next year's Budget.

In 1975, the United Kingdom fleet had 1,600 ships and a dead weight tonnage of 50 million. Now it has 700 ships and a dead weight tonnage of 18·5 million. To maintain it at that level would require new orders for 1 million tonnes every year. If new orders for 1 million tonnes were placed in British shipyards, we would not have problems such as we have in the shipbuilding industry. As the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside said, for the past nine years we have been losing two ships a week. That has happened not simply because of a decline in freight orders, but because of containerisation and the fact that British trading patterns have become increasingly dominated by Europe. For many years I worked on refrigerated vessels that took fruit and meat from Australia, New Zealand and South America, but those ships no longer come to our shores.

When the merchant ships returned from the Falkland Islands bands were playing,

"Rule Britannia, Britannia rule the waves."

If the Government do nothing about the decline in the shipping industry we will not even break the waves, let alone rule them.

The hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside, referring to protectionism, said that, while Britain was playing cricket, the rest of the world is engaged in karate. As an ex-boxer, I would say that, while Britain is fighting according to the Marquess of Queensberry's rules, the rest of the world is engaged in all-in wrestling. We do not have an open market. The Government must do something about the decline in shipping, shipbuilding and engine-building industries, which are important to an island nation. In a world two thirds of which is covered by water and 98 per cent. of whose trade is carried by sea, it is important that something be done immediately.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): I am glad to have the opportunity of responding to the motion that was so ably moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin). In the terms of his motion, he recognises the importance of shipping to our trade and our defence, and the importance of our fleet in its own right. I agree with him. It is overlong since the House gave time to this important industry. It is perhaps surprising that the Opposition have not chosen the indusry as the subject of an Opposition debate, so I am doubly grateful to my hon. Friend for choosing this subject. The motion follows his recent valuable contribution to the debate about the future of the United Kingdom merchant marine in the document produced by the Centre for Policy Studies entitled, "British Shipping — the Right Course." The hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) paid tribute to that document, although he did not agree with everything that it said.

The Government naturally share the concern expressed in the debate by hon. Members on both sides of the House about the decline of the United Kingdom merchant fleet. It has been a cause of understandable concern to me and my colleagues, as I know it has been to seafarers and their unions, the shipowners, the General Council of British Shipping, and to others concerned with our island's interests and our maritime history.

The decline in the merchant fleet looks especially dramatic if it is measured against the exceptionally high figure to which the fleet had grown in 1975. It may be useful to the House if I restate some basic facts about our fleet. Its high reputation, the skills that are brought to bear by the officers and men who man our ships, and the high calibre of the ships are all known and give us a world-wide reputation. But it is perhaps sometimes overlooked that, despite the decline, the United Kingdom fleet is the seventh largest in the world. That puts us well above our natural position in relation to our total trade. Among European fleets we rank as third, and within the EC as second. Therefore, although I recognise fully the deep concern which the Government share about the decline in the fleet, it is right to put it in perspective.

My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside was right to draw attention to the various roles in which the merchant fleet is involved. It is clear from the debate that the House shares his anxiety in three areas: first, in terms of enabling us to carry on our import and export trades where we are so dependent on the sea and ships for bringing in and taking out so much of our trade; secondly, the vital area of defence, which several hon. Members mentioned; and, thirdly, the realisation that the United Kingdom fleet is a major national asset, a major investment, a source of jobs and an industry in its own right.

Perhaps I may mention the projections about the rate of decline of the United Kingdom fleet. My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside referred to projections that would lead to the fleet's being extinguished. The General Council of British Shipping has suggested that the 700 vessels which now form the United Kingdom-owned and registered fleet will have fallen to 400 by 1986. Others, further projecting the current rate of decline, declare that by the year 2000 there will be no United Kingdom fleet. Even the hon. Member for Wigan who spoke on behalf of the Opposition, referred to the time when there would be no fleet left. It is far too simplistic just to extrapolate the recent level of the decline and suggest that there is an inevitable progression to the sort of figures that have been spoken about. I do not demur from the concern expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. du Cann) about this matter. He is chairman of the all-party maritime group, and I hope that we can have discussions about this matter.

My hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) will know that I am not responsible for shipbuilding. However, does he not recognise some inconsistency when he complains about uneconomic freight rates, because of the glut of shipping, in the same breath as he calls for subsidies for shipyards to build more ships, even in his constituency? The truth is that the fleet is not a single fleet; it is many separate fleets. For the House to judge the seriousness of the decline, where it comes, where the shoe is to pinch and what the causes are, we need to look more closely at the different mini-fleets that make up the total of the United Kingdom merchant marine against the background of the changes in our pattern of trade, which themselves lead to a different demand pattern for our fleets. For example, the change to membership of the Common Market has meant that a much larger proportion of our trade is no longer long distance, to the Commonwealth, but is on short haul from the east coast to European ports.

I commend to the House the analysis of the reasons for the decline given by my hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight. He analysed brilliantly, as one might have expected from his experience of the industry, what is going on. He said that seven or eight ships of the old fleet are now replaced by one container vessel. That is one of the many signs of the extent to which there are forces at work that are not within the control of any Government and that are leading to a decline in the number of vessels.

The development of containerisation has meant fewer and larger ships with smaller crews, and the oil crisis of a decade ago has had a dramatic effect on the pattern of the oil trade. For example, 55 per cent. of all the tonnage lost over the last decade—the largest proportion of all reductions in the United Kingdom merchant marine—has been in tanker tonnage. That has not been through any failure on the part of the Labour party when it was in government or of this Government. Principally, the tonnage has fallen because the world trade in oil shrank with high prices and we became self-sufficient from North sea oil being brought ashore by pipeline.

The huge surplus of tankers looks as if it may be coming to an end. One can contrast that with what has happened with regard to containers. We have one of the largest container fleets in the world, but Evergreen and United States Lines are proposing giant, round-the-world, minimum stop operations, which will present a huge challenge to our fleet. The prospect of a freight war developing, with massive surplus tonnage, is horrifying. My hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) referred to its devastating potential.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton will accept that there are many complex factors at work in the decline of our fleet. Happily, roll-on/roll-off and ferries are operating in a more buoyant and steady market, which shows that, while the total size of our fleet has declined and some further decline is on the cards, it would be wrong to extrapolate the figures of the past decline and assume that we shall end up with nothing.

The Government's strategy falls into three parts, all of which were referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside. First, there is the need of our island for ships to import and export goods; secondly, there is our defence strategy; and, thirdly, there is the help and encouragement that we can give to our ship operators. The House may expect me to start by saying that we must have a fleet of a given size to be able to carry goods to and from the United Kingdom, but that is not the case. Our fleet is important because of the jobs and the overseas earnings that it provides in itself. However, in terms of our imports and exports, the important factor, which relates directly to our competitive position and therefore to our national need, is that we should have efficient shipping services, able to get in and out of our ports with the minimum of burdens, to enable our exporters to compete. That is true in the changed pattern of trade, as so much of it lies with Europe. Our principal competitors are in Europe where they have land frontiers, while everything that we have has to be dragged across the sea and through our ports.

In this connection, it is important that we should minimise the burdens that are imposed on our shipping industry and those who use our ports. We have a continuing dialogue with the General Council of British Shipping about the burdens imposed by the Government, and we are seeking to do what we can to minimise them. For example, the cost of lighthouses and buoys around our shores is an expensive burden, amounting to £43 million a year, which is paid by ships using our ports. For some time, shipowners and the Public Accounts Committee have expressed concern as to whether the money was being most effectively spent. I am pleased to be able to tell the House that Trinity House has now invited the Government to nominate four business men to serve on the reformed Lighthouse Board, which has responsibility for this function under Trinity House.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a case, in equity, for those charges falling not just on shipowners? My hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) mentioned that these facilities are used most by yachtsmen, and the whole country benefits from having a safe maritime regime. Is it not possible for this cost to fall on the Exchequer rather than directly on shipowners?

Mr. Mitchell: On the total burden of lighthouse costs, Trinity House will welcome the addition of four distinguished business men on to the Lighthouse Board, which is involved with the administration of the service. That should lead to an assurance to the shipping community that there will be good value for money in the handling of the money that goes into the fund.

My hon. Friend raises a different point, which concerns not the totality of the expenditure, and therefore the totality that would be raised, but the distribution of it as between the commercial shipping, shipping and yachtsmen. We have identified this as a significant problem. There is an apparent unfairness about it. I understand the misgivings that the GCBS has expressed on this matter. We have commissioned a firm of management consultants to look into matter, and I expect to have its report early in the new year. I shall report to the House on what its recommendations are. I hope that my hon. Friend will recognise that that will cover the points that he raised about yachtsmen.

Mr. Donald Stewart: In view of the comparatively small sum involved, and as the whole rescue service is borne by the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, it would be a welcome contribution if the Government would bear the cost of lighthouses and buoys.

Mr. Mitchell: It would be nice for all of us if the Government had a bottomless pit out of which they could finance endless numbers of goodies. We would not then need to argue late into the night the relevant merits of spending money on kidney machines or lighthouses. However, in many sectors it has long been established that it is right and proper — and in this regard it has happened under all Governments—for the users of the service to pay for it rather than the general taxpayer. If that is a view that the right hon. Gentleman feels should be debated when the report is received from the consultants, I have no doubt that he will initiate an opportunity to do so.

Another burden is that of pilotage. I welcome the support of the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) for our proposals for the reform of pilotage in the United Kingdom. I am also grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) for his support.

Pilotage is another very substantial cost which has to be paid by ships coming to and going from our shores. It is quite right that we should give the highest possible priority to ensuring the safety of vessels coming in and going out of our ports. In a Green Paper that we published at the end of last week, we announced significant changes which will make for a more cost-effective service while in no way endangering the safety of vessels. It will give to the ports responsibility for pilotage as one of the services provided within ports. These proposals are being cautiously welcomed by the General Council of British Shipping and by Trinity House, which sees it as a new challenge as it will be able to tender for the work around our coasts. Concern has been expressed by the pilots themselves, and I look forward to hearing the response of the British Ports Association.

Another burden to which attention has been drawn is the cost of moving ships into the United Kingdom flag. A good deal of work has been done to reduce that cost and to make it possible for vessels to flag-in more easily. But my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside referred to further barriers, and I shall be grateful if he will write to me about them so that I can look at them more closely.

A number of the hon. Members drew attention to the tax position of British fleets. I shall ensure that what they said is drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside also asked me about conference loyalty arrangements. We have given much thought to the proposal that the postponed EEC competition regulation should prohibit conferences from enforcing loyalty arrangements in respect of more than 70 per cent. of shippers' custom. In our consideration we have taken account of the many views expressed to us, but I can now announce that we no longer intend to pursue this proposal.

Widespread anxiety has been expressed about our defence needs. I have been asked whether we would ever again be able to mount that which was done at the time of the Falklands in terms of merchant marine support for the Royal Navy. I have been asked about our NATO reinforcement ability and the needs of the Ministry of Defence. The hon. Member for Wigan referred to the cross-party recognition of the importance of these matters. We should seek where we can to ensure that these matters are not unnecessarily involved in the party political dogfight.

There is a continuing dialogue between the Department of Transport and the Ministry of Defence, in which the latter identifies its needs, and my Department has the task of ensuring that those needs are supplied. At the moment there is no reason to suppose that we are unable to supply those needs in one way or another. But that begs the question about what will happen in the years ahead if the decline in our fleet continues. For this reason, we have obtained from the Ministry of Defence its forecasts of its needs at varying times over the next few years and in 1992. Having its detailed analysis, we are now going out to consultants. A contract has been placed to see whether the vessels required at those forward dates will be available.

Should we find that some years ahead we are unlikely to meet particular needs, various possibilities are open to the Government. We have long-standing plans for collaboration with our NATO partners, and it is possible that they could help. However, it is not simply a question of the United Kingdom-registered fleet being available. In addition to the United Kingdom fleet of about 800 vessels, we have requisitioning powers in respect of 400 vessels registered in our overseas dependencies and 250 further vessels which are flagged out but beneficially owned by the United Kingdom. That makes a total of 1,450 vessels.

Sir David Price: Although they could be requisitioned, will my hon. Friend bear in mind that their crews are not British subjects in the ordinary sense of the word? With the changing policies of some of those countries, it is doubtful whether they would be available.

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding me of that. I had made a careful note that he and other hon. Members had referred to it as a matter that I must take back and look at more closely with my officials in the Department. I undertake to do that.

Mr. Sayeed: Beneficial ownership has been discussed a number of times. The suggestion is that those 250 ships flagged out but under our beneficial ownership could be used by us. I and many others who understand flagging out believe that that is by no means certain. We doubt whether our Government could get their hands on those ships, because it is not certain that the minority partners would necessarily let our Government get their hands on them or that their crews would want to go to war under the British flag. That being so, it is extremely optimistic to assume that 250 ships that have been flagged out will be available in time of conflict.

Mr. Mitchell: There may be some which are not available. There may be others which are in far off parts of the world and will not be immediately available. But my understanding is that in law we have the power to requisition. However, that does not detract from the perfectly valid point of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh about crewing these ships. I was about to say to him that it is one of the benefits of this overlong delayed debate that hon. Members have been able to draw attention to important matters that we must take in hand.

Mr. Garrett: In Exercise Lionheart last autumn there were huge successes, but one of the failures related to the mobility of our shipping. It was difficult to get the right types of ships for the right vehicles and with the right storage and necessary speed to get them over to mainland Europe. Can the hon. Gentleman assure the House that this matter is receiving serious consideration? In an emergency it would be of vital importance.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is right, but perhaps I can reassure him about it. In order not to interfere grossly with the holiday traffic and the ferries on their daily commercial routes across the channel, they were not requisitioned. The exercise was conducted using other vessels. But obviously people would not be going abroad on holiday at times of tension.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): My hon. Friend said that the Government did not wish to disrupt holiday traffic. Will he make inquiries to discover how many British shipowners were even approached to see whether their vessels were available. I know of one vessel which was laid up and which would have been perfect for Exercise Lionheart. It could have been used, but the owners were not approached.

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that matter. I shall make inquiries and write to him. However, against the fact that we required 49 vessels to support the initial Falklands operation, the fear that out of the 1,450 vessels that we have power to lay our hands on we would not be able to find that number does not seem to me to be borne out.

Should shortages emerge in the future, we could purchase ships for addition to the Royal Fleet Auxiliary. There are a number of other options, some of which it would be inappropriate to dwell on here. The aim of the surveys that we have set in hand is to discover whether there will be shortages of specific types of vessel, and I have no wish to prejudge the findings. It would be for us to consider how best to meet any such shortages in specific areas, rather than to do something about the generality of our fleet on defence grounds.

A vital part of the debate related to the huge United Kingdom investment in our fleet, the importance of its overseas earnings and the jobs which it provides. A fundamental choice has to be made between whether we are for protectionism or free trade. Countries will choose whichever of those two policies suits their national needs. There may be some, with a small national fleet which they are ambitious to see grow, which feel that it makes sense to go for cargo reservation and suffer the disadvantage of higher freight rates on their exports. But if, like us, a country has a large fleet—far too large for its national trade—an open market across the world is needed in which to deploy that fleet. We are certainly in that camp, as my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside stressed.

Some 58 per cent. of our fleet's earnings come from the cross trades. We must have fair and open markets to provide that opportunity. Indeed, I pray in aid the words of the greatly respected president of the General Council of British Shipping who, on taking up his post, said:

> "So what should be done? Do we want Government subsidies or protectionism? No, gentlemen, we do not. I believe that is a route which we should only seek to follow if all else fails."

I concur with that view.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I have been very patient. I accept the thrust of the Minister's argument, but Norway is an even better example than the United Kingdom in cross trades. How can the hon. Gentleman justify one British vessel in the Norwegian section of the North sea and 48 Norwegian vessels in our section?

Mr. Mitchell: I shall come to that point. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has raised it.

The hon. Member for Wigan asked about the inspection of substandard vessels. I agree that that is important. We exercise port state control strictly and I have initiated a considerable tightening up of that. It is effective in deterring people from bringing substandard vessels to Britain.

The Department of Transport is engaged, with the help of other Government Departments, in seeking to ensure that the number of markets closed to us is kept to a minimum so that our fleet has the maximum trading opportunities. In terms of value, we reckon that only between 10 and 15 per cent. of total international seaborne trade is now subject to reservation. That is to say, between 85 and 90 per cent. is free, open and available for our ships to operate in. Certainly we keep up constant pressure in one way or another against those who seek to close the markets to us. That is most often successfully achieved by acting in co-operation with other countries. For example, talks have been going on between the United States and the Consultative Shipping Group. Those are designed to hold back the tide of protectionism where it stands today, and to ensure that there is no further creeping protectionism. That can be achieved only by acting together.

The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) referred to Norway and the fact that there is only one British vessel operating there. One of the biggest single reasons for that is that Norwegian vessels are not required to take a pilot, but British vessels are. That has two disadvantages. The first is financial. To have to pay £200 on entering and leaving port in a competitive market is not peanuts. Far more important is that an oil rig requiring a supply vessel needs to have it immediately when the weather is right. If a vessel has to wait for a pilot, it will not be much cop as a potential bidder for a contract. Recognising that, at the suggestion of the GCBS I went to Norway and had long and frank discussions with its Minister. He came back here and we completed our discussions. The Norwegians have now waived that requirement in respect of United Kingdom supply vessels operating out of Norwegian ports.

Another important area is the EEC. The time has long passed when it should have developed a shipping policy. There have been enormous benefits to European countries from larger trade in goods as a result of membership. Such a policy should have applied to services in aviation and shipping, and it has not. We have been putting on as much pressure as we possibly can in recent months to try to get it to do just that. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh is right to refer to the importance of that area and of cabotage and all the unfairnesses thrown up from open access to our coastal ports for other European countries while some at least close theirs to our fleet. We cannot with equanimity allow that to continue.

The Commission, under considerable pressure from us, has at last produced its memorandum. We are waiting to see its terms, which I understand were agreed by the Commission last Wednesday. We look forward to pressing the Council of Ministers to bring that policy to a successful conclusion because it will provide fairer trading and competition within Europe.

It is not for the Government to run ships; it is for our shipowners and merchant mariners. They have had a tough task, and I praise them for the way in which they have tackled it. It is the Government's job to seek to ensure fair trading opportunities. On that I am never satisfied, but we are working on it and more progress has been made than hon. Members may recognise, particularly in relation to a joint response to protectionism by the United States and the OECD countries. I hope that in January we shall sign an agreement committing the signatories to act together against any new protectionist devices which may emerge. We attach importance to early progress on the Commission's memorandum on a shipping policy in Europe and on a competition policy as part of it.

We shall ensure that there are sufficient vessels to enable us to fulfil our defence requirements. There certainly are at present, and forecasts have been made for the years ahead. We have taken steps, such as I have spelt out to the House, to limit the burdens imposed by the Government on vessels using our ports.

I do not claim that the Government have all the answers. There is a considerable pool of wisdom in the House on this subject. It is important that Ministers should listen, and I have done so carefully. I shall consider equally carefully the points that have been made. I again express my gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside for having introduced the motion.

Mr. Colvin: In the remaining few minutes I want to thank my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for his reply and also to thank those hon. Members who have participated in the debate, a feature of which has been the measure of all-party support for demands to improve the lamentable state of our Merchant Navy, and the awareness of the fact that if the present trend continues and the number of our ships continues to drop Britain will be in dire straits not only from an economic point of view, but from the point of view of our strategic defence.

I was pleased to note that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was present during most of the debate. I trust that he has taken copious notes of some of the points that have been made. In particular, I was impressed by what my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) had to say about the way in which some of the bigger companies have pulled out of shipping. That highlights the essence of the problem mentioned by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State in his reply to the debate.

It is not the Government's job to run the shipping industry. It is their job to create the economic climate in which shipowners can prosper. That that climate has not been present of late is the reason for so many companies going out of shipping. I wish that it were possible to see the size of our merchant fleet maintained, but until we change the economic climate and encourage people to come back in, we are on a loser.

With that in mind, I am pleased that the GCBS, in its presentation to the Chancellor, has drawn attention to the need for allowances to be made available on secondhand ships. While we lament the state of the shipbuilding industry, there are nevertheless as many ships now laid up around the world as would constitute the whole output of our shipbuilding industry in one year.

I have no time in which to refer to the other remarks of hon. Members. The motion called on the Government to state their policies on merchant shipping, and my hon.

[Mr. Colvin]

Friend the Under-Secretary of State has done just that. We may not be satisfied with all his replies, but he has, nevertheless, stated the Government's policies, and I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Merchant Shipping

7 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): I beg to move,

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Liner Conferences) (Mandatory Provisions) Regulations 1984, which were laid before this House on 13th November, be approved.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Paul Dean): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following motion:

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Liner Conferences) (Conditions for Recognition) Regulations 1984, which were laid before this House on 13th November, be approved.

Mr. Mitchell: Hon. Members will remember that in 1982 the Merchant Shipping (Liner Conferences) Act became law. That Act enabled the Secretary of State to make certain regulations whose effect would be essentially to translate the provisions of the UN convention on a code of conduct for the liner conferences into United Kingdom law. The matter is complex, but I think that it is important that I put the situation clearly on the record. Accordingly, I hope that the House will forgive me if I go into some detail.

The purpose of the present regulations therefore is to enable the United Kingdom to accede to that convention. The convention, which came into force in October 1983, embodies a complex and wide-ranging set of rules governing the relations between shipping lines that are members of shipping conferences and between those lines and their customers, the shippers. The application of this code of conduct in the United Kingdom will be significantly modified by EC Regulation No. 954/79, commonly referred to as the Brussels package. I shall have more to say about that later. The United Kingdom intends to accede early in the new year—we hope to do so at the same time as a number of other European countries. That event will constitute a very significant development in international liner shipping and we have not taken this decision without conducting extensive consultations with interested parties. I am glad to be able to tell the House that the United Kingdom's accession to this convention is fully supported by the General Council of British Shipping and the British Shippers Council.

Although the regulations themselves are quite technical in nature—I am sure that the concern that is often expressed in the House about the state of the British shipping industry will be reflected in today's debate—hon. Members would wish me to explain the relevance of the regulations and of the code itself to the wider shipping scene.

I turn to the Government's objectives in liner shipping. The policy of successive British Governments on liner shipping has been governed by our interests both as an exporting nation and as a major shipping nation. Those two national interests continue to point in the same direction. A third of our national income is derived from international trade, and roughly that proportion of our jobs depends on its success. Most of this trade is carried by sea. Any failure to maintain competitive conditions on our shipping routes would clearly result in more expensive and less efficient sea transport, with inevitable consequences for our trade.

Equally, our shipping industry relies on its own ability to compete in maritime trades worldwide. Opinions may well differ as to the most effective method of arresting the decline of the British flag fleet and what role the Government should play, but one issue on which there is agreement is that it is the Government's task to try to keep the world's shipping markets open to British vessels. Nearly three fifths of the freight earnings of the British shipping industry comes from trading between other countries' ports, and cross-trading earnings represent two fifths of the industry's liner earnings. Free and fair access to cargoes in other countries' ports is therefore vital to the future of the British shipping industry.

I turn to the conference system. The House will know that, in line with the practice of Governments throughout the world, we exempt liner shipping conferences from the provisions of our restrictive practices legislation. We find that liner conferences are generally beneficial in providing reliable scheduled services required by many shippers of different types of cargo. They also help to preserve stable freight rates, although this stability can be threatened when there is an abundance of competition from non-conference lines. The exemption can, of course, only be tenable provided that this competition is present to some degree, or is not prevented from developing; and provided that shippers are effectively organised so as to make their views known to the conferences. In a nutshell, closed conferences are acceptable only as part of an open system.

Thus British industry wants to have access to the regular scheduled liner shipping services provided by the conferences; and a free choice of competing non-conference carriers. British shipping wants to have the widest possible freedom to compete in the world's liner shipping routes, both within and without conferences. The Government's key shipping policy objectives are to ensure that these very reasonable desires of British industry and British shipping can be fulfilled.

But the House will not be surprised to know that a number of developing countries do not share the Government's desire to maintain an open market in liner shipping. They want instead to share cargoes as exclusively as possible between trading partners. It was these pressures for cargo reservation which were a moving force in establishing the UN liner code.

The core of the code is concerned with: first, the relations among conference shipping lines: and, secondly, the relations between conferences and shippers. In dealing with the relations between conferences and shippers, the code states that its objective is to "balance the interests of the suppliers and users of liner shipping services".

The provisions of the code in large measure reflect the practices that have developed internationally in recent years and are, I believe, broadly acceptable to shippers and shipowners alike.

But in dealing with the relationship between conference lines the UN code sought to impose the very kind of rigid cargo-sharing that the Government have so often fought to resist. Article 2 provided that cargo should be divided equally between conference lines of the two countries that were served, leaving other conference lines to carry some 20 per cent. between them. This so-called 40:40:20 division of conference cargoes was unacceptable to the Government and was the main reason why the United Kingdom voted against the code convention at the diplomatic conference which adopted it in 1974.

Hon. Members who specialise in this subject will know that some OECD countries including France, West Germany and Belgium had voted in favour of the code and other OECD countries had merely abstained. We therefore faced the unhappy prospect that the United Kingdom might be compelled to stand aloof while this new regime was applied without restraint on many of the world's major shipping routes. In that event British shipping lines' cross-trading opportunities would have been severely restricted. I know that hon. Members would be deeply concerned at such a prospect.

Clearly there were, therefore, compelling reasons for OECD countries to adopt a more uniform approach to the code for EC states and, in particular, to agree a common position. That common policy was developed under the last Labour Administration; and the present Government were glad to continue it on behalf of the United Kingdom very soon after we came into office in 1979. The policy is embodied in the Brussels package, which creates directly applicable law in the United Kingdom.

The overall effect of the Community's policy on the code will be that its cargo-sharing provisions will protect the shipping of only those countries, mainly developing countries, that wish them to do so. This is assured by three key provisions. First, when the code applies to a route between a Community member state and a third country, conference lines from all member states will compete on that route on the same footing. Secondly, lines from countries within the OECD which intend to accede to the code will also be able to compete on the same footing provided that they offer reciprocal treatment on routes serving their own countries. Finland, Norway and Sweden have already announced their intention of joining the code and operating it in the same amended way as the United Kingdom and the rest of the EC. Thirdly, the conference shipping lines of other OECD countries such as Australia and the United States of America, which at present do not intend to accede to the code, will also be treated in the Community on the same footing as Community conference lines, so long as those countries do not themselves discriminate against Community shipping. Japan is the only country in the OECD which has indicated an intention of acceding to the UN code without having made clear what kind of reciprocal arrangements will be available, and discussions between the Community and Japan are continuing.

As a result of these fundamental modifications the Department has calculated that the code's cargo-sharing provisions will in practice reserve only cargoes representing between 10 per cent. and 15 per cent. of the world's liner conference trade; the remainder will be free of cargo reservation. I know that the House will welcome that in the light of earlier discussions on dealing with protectionism and access for our ship operators.

As I have mentioned, the code's basic regime concerning the relations between conferences and shippers was altogether more acceptable. The Brussels package contains some modifications to certain of the code's provisions but in the main the provisions which give rights to shippers to be consulted on the basis of full information are welcome.

There are two draft statutory instruments. The first, the mandatory provisions regulations, identifies the code's provisions which are to give rise to rights and duties. The second defines a United Kingdom national shipping line for the purposes of the code and defines those shippers' organisations which will have rights to be consulted.

The Merchant Shipping (Liner Conferences) (Mandatory Provisions) Regulations 1984 implement the code convention. The code's provisions are a mixture of mandatory and recommendatory provisions, and some of the mandatory provisions are ambiguous. It would not therefore have been possible or desirable to import the code as a whole into our law.

Regulation 2 lays down that these regulations apply to conferences which have their seat in the United Kingdom or serve the trade of the United Kingdom.

Regulation 3 lies at the heart of the statutory instrument and sets out in the form of a table those provisions of the code which are to be mandatory. The table identifies those people by whom and against whom these provisions may be enforced.

I do not believe that this table contains any unexpected or unusual decisions. We have sought to reproduce the code's mandatory provisions as faithfully as possible. Some minor clarifications have been made to ensure that the provisions work effectively and, above all, do not inhibit competition. I shall draw the attention of the House to just two.

First, regulation 2.4 (b) is clarified by stating that the share of cargo available to cross-trading lines is a right to acquire a share by commercial means. We wish to avoid any possibility of a cross-trading line seeking to increase its share simply through legal action.

Secondly, regulation 13.1 (2) is clarified to make it plain that conference lines are entitled to charge rates less than the published tariff. Our objective is again to ensure that this provision does not dampen competition.

Regulation 4 ensures that where any conference is incorporated its individual member lines remain responsible in respect of the duties set out in regulation 3, so far as this lies within their power. Regulation 5 contains minor clarifications to chapter VI of the code which deals with "Provisions and Machinery for the Settlement of Disputes".

The Merchant Shipping (Liner Conferences) (Conditions for Recognition) Regulations 1984 set the conditions for a national shipping line and shippers' organisation.

The code defines a national shipping line, but allows Governments to add further criteria. The code conferred certain privileges on national shipping lines and although these have largely been removed by the Brussels package it is widely acknowledged that national line status will be of some importance. During our consultations with shipowners, shippers and the seafaring unions some suggestions were made which in the Government's view would have imposed unduly restrictive conditions on national shipping lines. Some groups felt that United Kingdom national shipping lines should be British-owned, other groups felt that United Kingdom national shipping lines should be compelled to fly the British flag.

The Government have decided to set criteria to maintain as open a market system as possible for shipping lines operating out of the United Kingdom. Regulation 2 therefore limits national shipping line status only in the following way. Lines will be regarded as national shipping lines only in respect of those conferences of which they are members. And they will have to be of British nationality —which is defined as having their principal place of business in the United Kingdom. The only other limitation is that lines from countries which would refuse similar treatment for British lines will themselves be excluded. I believe that that is agreeable to the House.

The code also allows Governments to decide who should have the right to take part in consultations with the conferences. Here, our objective has been to ensure that those organisations which already have a key role in representing shippers' interests will have the right to be consulted under the code. We have also been concerned to avoid a position where conferences are obliged to consult so many organisations that the process becomes unmanageable.

There are two avenues available to the Government to determine who should have those consultation rights. The first—and the fundamental one—is to set down the conditions for recognition as a shippers' organisation. The code contains a basic definition of a shippers' organisation and allows Governments to add further conditions. These conditions, set out in regulation 3, are necessarily expressed in broad terms. All those whom we have consulted have argued against a very rigid set of conditions. I hope that the House will agree that we are right to respond to consultation in that way.

Regulation 3 allows one national organisation, which is expected usually to be the British Shippers Council, to claim consultation rights in respect of most if not all conferences subject to the code. In addition, other shippers' organisations may claim consultation rights where they can show that they represent shippers of such quantities of goods with that conference that it is reasonable for them to be consulted. If the conference sought to deny that claim it would be for the conference to show either that the shippers concerned were already adequately represented by recognised shippers' organisations or that there were so many other organisations representing more cargo that recognition would be inappropriate.

We look to both shipowners and shippers to operate the consultation procedure in a constructive fashion. With goodwill on both sides I am sure that the shippers' interests can be effectively and efficiently represented.

The second avenue by which consultation rights may be established is designed to benefit large individual shippers and representatives of shippers. Regulation 5 gives the Secretary of State the power to designate these groups.

As the conditions that we have imposed on shippers' organisations represent something of a compromise between competing claims, I think that it would be right at this stage to state that the Secretary of State would use his powers of designation only in exceptional circumstances. He would adopt criteria in line with those laid down for shippers' organisations. The result would be that when large shippers, or a large number of small shippers, using the same agent, such as a freight forwarder, feel that their interests have not been adequately represented to a particular conference they will be able to seek consultation rights. I think that that is a comprehensive set of guidelines. I am sure that the House will agree.

I would now like to say something about non-conference lines and the code. The diplomatic conference that adopted the code convention also adopted a resolution on non-conference shipping lines which stated that such lines should not be prevented from operating provided that they competed fairly. But that resolution is not legally binding and the code itself confers no rights on non-conference shipping.

The problem that we face is that there is an increasing disposition among some developing countries to seek to close their shipping trades to non-conference lines and thus establish a monopoly for the conferences. That position would be unacceptable to the British Government on routes serving the United Kingdom.

We have therefore concluded that the United Kingdom's accession will be subject to the condition that the United Kingdom will be bound by the convention only while our trading partners permit non-conference lines to compete in our mutual trades. We shall make a formal reservation along these lines when we come to accede. In the event that non-conference lines were to be excluded by another contracting party the Government would be able to suspend the operation of the code using section 4 of the enabling Act and would thus be free to use the wide-ranging retaliatory powers contained in section 14 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1974. We have discussed our intention with our Community partners and we understand that other OECD Governments are likely to make similar reservations when they accede.

Finally, let me just touch on other current initiatives in liner shipping with which the Government are closely involved. I have explained that the Brussels package ensures that the OECD's ground rules concerning competition in the provision of liner shipping services are fully respected. But there is clearly a need for the OECD countries to continue to develop unambiguous and positive policies to promote their interests in liner shipping, particularly as more countries come to accede to the code.

I have referred already to the EEC regulations and the United States—Consultative Shipping Group dialogue, so I shall not refer to that again. I have sought to set out the Government's objectives in pursuing the interests of British shipping and its customers. The code, together with the Brussels package, is an attempt—some would say a very ambitious attempt — to reconcile quite different and potentially conflicting aims. But the alternative would have been a series of unilateral or, perhaps, regional initiatives taken by each sovereign state attempting to impose its preferred solutions on the shipping lines of its trading partners. Interference of that sort would have led to inefficiency, increased costs for shipping lines and, not least, the threat of very real disruption to shipping and trading operations where disputes could not be resolved.

The British Government recognise that the code represents something of a challenge and we have equipped ourselves with appropriate defensive powers if things go wrong. We shall do our best to make the code work effectively because we believe it holds out the best prospects for the stable development of liner shipping and that, of the options available, it represents the best course for British shipping and for British industry at large.

I have spoken at some length. It is a complex matter and it is right to put on record exactly what is involved in this important step for our shipping interests. I commend the regulations to the House.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): During the excellent preceding debate hon. Members from both sides of the House made it absolutely clear to the Government that action to arrest the critical decline of our merchant fleet is required immediately. We must judge these regulations, tortuous though they may be, in the light of that criterion.

On the matter of the Brussels package, we have reached the stage when we must question whether it is in the best interests of the United Kingdom to continue to support it. Continued support makes sense only when the United Kingdom's earnings through cross trade exceeds the earnings that could be made from carrying 40 per cent. of our liner imports and exports. Clearly, that position has not yet been reached. However, the changes between 1979 and 1982 show the way in which matters are moving. Great change is taking place. The position is not quite what the Minister alleged. Serious changes are occuring and we must consider whether the package is acceptable to us.

The second set of regulations deal with the national shipping lines. They do not provide adequate defence for the United Kingdom shipping interests, and that applies especially to the definition of a national shipping line. Neither ownership nor the registration of vessels is taken into account to the extent that national line status can be accorded even if ownership and registration are outside the United Kingdom.

While regulation 2(3)—the conditions for recognition —has been included because of EEC regulation 954/79, the Government have not reconsidered that regulation in the light of the changed circumstances of United Kingdom shipping. The decline in the United Kingdom's liner trade calls for the regulation to be amended so that national line status is accorded only to companies with ownership and registration within the United Kingdom. However, recognising the existence of the EEC regulation, national line status could be accorded only to companies using vessels registered in the United Kingdom or in other member states.

Regulations 2(1), (2) and (3) give national line status to existing members of liner conferences. Even if they use non-United Kingdom flag ships with non-United Kingdom crews, such status can be retained by the conference members. For example, a Swiss-owned Liberian flag of convenience ship with a Singaporean or Filipino crew could still be used by a company with national line status. That really makes nonsense of the definition of a national shipping line.

The requirement that reciprocal arrangements exist for a foreign-owned company to receive national line status in the United Kingdom provides some attempt to protect our interests, but it is the very narrow interest of owners, because United Kingdom companies establishing subsidiaries abroad would be using foreign ships and labour, with no benefit to United Kingdom seafarers or to the nation as a whole.

The regulations are clearly aimed at the Comecon countries, because they are regarded as operating unfairly, and I subscribe to that view, but there is no attempt to act against flag-of-convenience operations, which are just as unfair and are a greater threat to British shipping. Overall, the regulations will not help to protect United Kingdom shipping. They will not secure existing operations or promote further opportunities.

I shall not ask my hon. Friends—if they are still around—to divide the House. I merely wish to point out to the Minister that some of us are greatly upset by the regulations. We do not believe that they will in any way deal with the very grave position facing British shipping.

[Mr. Roger Stott]

The Government are in the process of undertaking a review of shipping. The Minister of State for the Armed Forces is studying the whole question, but it is limited to the defence requirements for merchant shipping and the capability of the fleet to meet those requirements. The Under-Secretary of State, in answer to a question on 10 December, at column 304 of the Official Report, said that the review would take into account only vessels and not manpower, nor the economic necessities of maintaining a merchant fleet. I hope that the Minister will take that point on board.

I wish to crave your indulgence for a moment, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I may stray slightly outside the motion. However, I believe that an important matter should be put on the record. The Minister must ensure that the consultants whom he has engaged to consider the matter also consider manpower. He will know from the questions asked by his hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir. D. Price) that manpower is important, especially if there is another Falklands-type conflict, where ships that are flagged out may be brought back into Britain, but their crews may not.

In the light of the disastrous state of British shipping and the dire prospects for United Kingdom companies, the Government should undertake a major review of the industry. It is 14 years since Lord Rochdale made his major report on shipping, and a great deal has changed since then. In fact, the Government's lack of concern and their inactivity have condoned the worst decline in our merchant fleet in our history. It is time that we did something about that.

I shall not rehearse the arguments that I used in the previous debate. I am sure that the Minister is well aware of the feeling of hon. Members on both sides of the House about this great industry. I am sure that he is also well aware that something must be done quickly to arrest that decline. I do not believe that the regulations will go any way towards that. Much more positive action is required.

7.30 pm

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): First, I must declare an interest as I am associated with an organisation which is a member of the British Federation of Commodity Associations.

Regulation 2 is headed:

"National Shipping Lines of the United Kingdom".

I recognise the necessity for the regulation where there is a definition of a national shipping line. The United Nations liner code enables developing countries to participate in liner conference trade by virtue of having the right to carry in vessels of their national lines about 40 per cent. of the goods generated by trade between them. The countries at the other end would also have about 40 per cent. The remaining 20 per cent. of trade can be acquired by vessels of third countries. That is the so-called 40:40:20 rule.

If my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has read the Second Reading debate on the 1982 Bill, as it then was, he will understand that I have always been opposed to the United Nations liner code, which led to the Merchant Shipping (Liner Conferences) Act 1982. I have opposed it because of its impression and the opportunity which it has afforded to less scrupulous countries to abuse normal commercial practices and to take refuge for their action behind the code. I spoke at length on these matters when the 1982 Bill was being considered in Committee.

I was interested to hear my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State talk about the appropriate defensive powers that the Government have taken if things go wrong. I cannot help feeling that I have been reinforced in the view that I took in 1982, that the whole of this bureaucratic and cumbersome apparatus is very much the best of a bad job. My hon. Friend spoke about the problems that would have ensued if we had not decided to adhere to the code. He reminded the House of the difficulties that might have arisen if countries had pursued their separate interests. None the less, I am filled with gloom as I hear once again a description of the way in which the proposed apparatus will work.

I remind the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) of what was said in the House on 9 June 1978 by the then hon. Member for Hackney, Central, Mr. Stanley Clinton Davis:

"But much of the current support for the United Nations code derives from the desire of certain developed countries to increase their share of liner trades by cargo reservation, since it appears that they cannot win a greater share by commercial means. I see no reason why we should encourage any move at all in this direction."—[Official Report, 9 June 1978; Vol. 951, c. 610.]

I am glad that after a considerable period my hon. Friend has tabled the regulations, which seek to define important matters. In regulation 2(2) we have a clear definition of a shipping line of British nationality. In regulation 2(3) recognition of a shipping line as being of British nationality is accorded to shipping lines of member states of the EEC. I understand that that provision will operate reciprocally within the Community. However, in regulations 2(4) and 2(5) recognition as a national shipping line of the United Kingdom is accorded to lines of states outside the EEC under certain conditions. In regulation 2(4) there is a requirement for an effective opportunity to ply for trade, and in regulation 2(5) there are requirements relating to the percentage of share capital and directors. Those conditions may be subject to change—possibly to sudden change. For example, the opportunity to ply for trade could be restricted. The percentage of shareholders could change, and so could the number of directors. I should like to know what steps my hon. Friend proposes to take to ensure that when a decision has been made on such conditions there will be a system of monitoring to ensure that the conditions on which the decision was taken are retained.

I have always been worried that the code is vague and imprecise. I understand the problem of drafting regulations that result from a code that has been internationally criticised for being vague and imprecise. However, Britain decided to adopt the code, and it has taken seriously the subsequent legislation. It has attempted to make as good a job of it as possible. I ask my hon. Friend to set before the House the evidence he has that the issue is being taken equally seriously by other code states and that they are taking the necessary steps to draft legislation, especially the developing countries which have adopted the code. Unless all signatories to the code apply equally strict conditions, there is a danger that the code will not work.

Regulation 3 is headed "Shippers' Organisations". In regulation 3(2)(b) there is the right for shippers' organisations to be consulted by the conference under certain conditions. The conference is given the opportunity of saying under regulation 3(2)(b)(ii)

"that it would not be appropriate to consult".

In the debates that took place prior to the 1982 Act, I strongly represented the views of shippers of raw materials which were members of the British Federation of Commodity Associations. The commodities that are traded through London rarely reach the shores of the United Kingdom. The majority of them pass between third countries. However, the commission earned by London trading houses on such transactions is an important part of our invisible earnings. The commodity trades, according to the latest statistics that are available, earned £350 million in invisibles in 1983. The trade associations of London, which cover commodities such as sugar, cocoa, non-ferrous metals and rubber, may have problems from time to time with the carriage of their commodities by liner conference which they will need to discuss with the conferences. It is astonishing that the regulations should contain a proviso that might enable any conference to refuse such consultation on the ground that the quantities carried were not large enough or that the trade concerned belonged to a larger shippers' organisation, such as the British Shippers Council.

When there are real problems it is essential that the trade should be able to consult directly with the conference. It should not have to consult any other organisation, unless it wishes to do so. Representations have been made to my hon. Friend the Minister on this issue and I hope that he will be able to give some assurance when he replies that it is not his intention to deprive any trade of the opportunity of full consultation when a genuine problem arises.

This is the first piece of Government legislation that I have opposed at all stages with both voice and vote. When historians come to plot the decline of the British merchant marine, I hope that one of them will read the proceedings in Standing Committee during April 1982 and possibly the report of this debate. I hope that it will be noted that at least one Member of this place expressed serious reservations and surprise that the British Government found it necessary to accede to the proposal.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I take up the rather sombre tone of the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby), who has argued in the same vein for a number of years. Like many who spoke in the previous debate on merchant shipping, I have no direct financial interest. However, I represent a constituency that contains one of the four designated nautical colleges. As we heard from the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) in the previous debate, the colleges are under threat of closure. As the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) said in the previous debate, my constituency is a town which lost more merchant seamen in the past two wars than any other. My constituency contains the largest branch of the National Union of Seamen in the north of England and the general secretary of the NUS comes from my constituency. My constituency is based on Tyne Dock. As I have said, I have no financial interest but I have a great interest in the maritime industry.

It is with great sadness that I take part in this debate, especially in view of the earlier speech on the motion and the introduction to these regulations by the Under-Secretary of State. There is great resentment in my constituency about the way in which the Government have let down the Merchant Navy. These regulations are not a step forward. The Under-Secretary of State took 35 minutes to wind up in a three-hour debate, thereby preventing me from making a speech, and that can only add to the resentment.

Mr. David Mitchell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Clark: I shall not give way. The hon. Gentleman spoke for 35 minutes in the previous debate and gave a long introduction to this debate. He will have a chance to make his point when winding up.

The Under-Secretary of State talked about the Brussels package. I hope that all hon. Members wish the new commissioner in charge of transport, Stanley Clinton Davis, well in his task. I deplore the scurrilous attacks made on him and his colleague, Lord Cockfield, by the leader of the Liberal party when in Brussels. It was disgraceful to make such attacks on two first-class men. We wish Stanley Clinton Davis well in his efforts to grapple with the problem connected with the Brussels package.

The Under-Secretary of State said that our maritime ability will depend upon our industry's 'ability. As we argued for three hours in the previous debate, this has nothing to do with the industry's ability—it has to do with the fiscal measures that the Government are prepared to take to help the maritime industry to survive. I am sad that the Under-Secretary of State was not able to pick up that point, which was made ferociously by both sides of the House. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take that message back to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and say how unfair the Government's decisions in the last Budget were in reducing the overseas earnings allowance of seamen. That measure will increase the cost of the wages of the British shipping industry. It will give the lie to the point made by the Under-Secretary of State that our maritime ability depends upon the industry's ability. The Government have shown no incentive in trying to help the merchant shipping industry.

About 22 minutes ago, the Under-Secretary of State assured us that the purpose of the regulations and his policy was to protect British shipping. That is not how the shipping industry sees it. The hon. Gentleman responded by referring to the supply ships in the Norwegian section of the North sea. Some months ago, the hon. Gentleman met the responsible Minister, but we are still awaiting developments. The Norwegians operate a bureaucratic system that makes it virtually impossible for British offshore and supply vessels to become involved. It is as simple as that. The Norwegians know that, and they are pulling the wool over the Minister's eyes.

In introducing the regulations, the Under-Secretary of State rightly mentioned many other OECD countries, specifically Norway, Sweden and Denmark. I understand that the British Government are conducting negotiations with the Soviet Government. The British Government propose to preclude any Russian vessels from entering the port of Tyne and the river Tyne. I urge the Under-Secretary of State — he probably does not have the necessary information with him — to look into this matter. We can understand why the Government do not want to let the Russians into Barrow-in-Furness and Rosyth. I seriously warn the Government that, if they prevent Russian vessels from entering the river Tyne, they will add to unemployment. As a representative of the travel-to-work area with the highest unemployment rate in England — more than 30 per cent. of the men in the travel-to-work area of my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) are out of work —I know that already this year we have had more than £1 million worth of work from the Russians. I have heard much criticism of the Russians in this debate, but at least they pay their bill and are good customers. We want Russian vessels on the river Tyne. I hope that, if the Under-Secretary of State cannot give an answer today, he will write to me.

[Dr. Clark]

Mr. David Mitchell: I do not want to detain the House for any longer than need be. I apologise to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) if my summing up in the earlier debate deprived him of the opportunity to participate. That was unintentional. We did not have sufficient time to discuss such an important subject. I wanted to put several points on the record, because hon. Members on both sides of the House raised a large number of issues. I shall ensure that the points made by the hon. Member for South Shields about fiscal matters are conveyed to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I shall write to him about the entry into the Tyne of Russian vessels.

My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) raised a number of points and expressed his continuing anxieties. I well know the points that he made at the earlier stage of the legislation. I shall write to my hon. Friend about the legislation in other countries. The Government's objective in the definition of a shipper's organisation has been to ensure that those organisations able to play a worthwhile role in consulting conferences will be recognised, but to avoid setting conditions requiring conferences to consult so many organisations that the process becomes unmanageable.

My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge asked about a national line and about how the Government will monitor conditions set out in regulations 2(4) and 2(5). The Government will not intervene. These are matters for the liner conference and disputes will be referred to the civil courts. It will be in the interests of other lines to monitor progress.

The hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) and other hon. Members questioned the wisdom of our being involved. They suggested that extrapolating the historic trend of protectionism raised the question whether we would be better to join those countries which voted in favour of the code and get our 40 per cent. out of our trade. That assumes that no further effective steps are taken to resist protectionism. I hope that I managed to convey to the House our clear intention to be active on that front, especially in co-ordinating resistance protectionism within Europe and through the United States — Consultative Shipping Group talks, with the expectation that there will be progress in January or February.

Hon. Members referred to charges imposed on our exporters if they lose the freedom to choose which they now enjoy. Some goods for Brazil from the east coast of the United States travel via western Europe because that is cheaper than using the carved up trade between the other two countries. That shows the damaging effect on a country's exports when there is a stranglehold on the shipment of goods.

The industry's calculations show, and the General Council of British Shipping has made this point also, that it would be better for our ship operators if we joined the liner code on the terms now proposed. Although I understand the misgivings that have been expressed, I believe that there must be a coincidence of interest between the ship owners and the unions. There is room for the unions to talk more closely and to understand each other's thinking. That would be a helpful step forward. I hope that hon. Members will join me in saying that that should be commended to the parties. I hope, too, that the House will feel it right to approve these regulations.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Liner Conferences) (Mandatory Provisions) Regulations 1984, which were laid before this House on 13th November, be approved.

MERCHANT SHIPPING

Resolved,

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Liner Conferences) (Conditions for Recognition) Regulations 1984, which were laid before this House on 13th November, be approved. — [Mr. David Mitchell.]

Northern Ireland (Appropriation)

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Before I call the Minister to move the Appropriation (No. 3) (Northern Ireland) Order 1984, I should remind the House that this order deals with specific Supplementary Estimates and the debate should, therefore, be confined to agricultural assistance and social security benefits, or to other specified matters arising directly from the order.

7.50 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): I beg to move,

That the draft Appropriation (No. 3) (Northern Ireland) Order 1984, which was laid before this House on 20th November, be approved.

This order is being made under paragraph 1 of schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland Act 1974. The purpose of the draft order is to authorise the issue of £41 million out of the Consolidated Fund of Northern Ireland in respect of the autumn Supplementary Estimates of Northern Ireland departments and to appropriate this sum for the purposes shown in the schedule. The House has already approved a total Estimate provision of £2,832 million for this financial year; the present draft order will bring the figure to £2,873 million. Detailed information about the provision sought can be found in the autumn Supplementary Estimates volume, copies of which have been placed in the Vote Office. The draft order covers only four out of the 39 Votes of Northern Ireland Departments. Provision is sought to meet the cost of the continuation of special measures to assist agriculture, and to fund the milk outgoers scheme. On the social security side, more money is required to pay increased numbers of recipients of a range of non-contributory benefits and to cover the cost of the new severe disablement allowance.

Before I deal with the details of the provisions I shall, as is customary on these occasions, and with your permission Mr. Deputy Speaker, say a few words about the economic position in Northern Ireland. Mr. Deputy Speaker has not yet intervened. I have read the previous Appropriation debates as part of my training for this post, which is why I asked for the permission of Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister should set a good example by following the advice that I tendered at the outset, when I reminded the House that the debate should be confined to agricultural assistance, social security benefits or other specified matters arising directly from the order. I am sure that the Minister does not want to debate the economy of Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: I shall accept your guidance on that point, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall have to use my rather splendid paragraph on some other occasion, when I know that it will be enjoyed by hon. Members.

Now to the details of the four Votes covered by these Supplementary Estimates. The main purpose of the two Votes in Class I, which covers agriculture, is to increase funds for the various special aid measures to assist agriculture which were announced in February 1984. Provision is also sought to cover the initial payments under the milk outgoers scheme and the fees and expenses of tribunal and panel members adjudicating milk quota cases.

In Vote 1 there are three main items. An estimated £450,000 is sought for continued measures to develop the quality of beef cattle production, mainly through reduced charges under the Department's artificial insemination service. That provision is part of the special aid measures, most of which fall in Vote 2, and to which I shall be referring a little later in this speech.

New provision of £800,000 is required to meet the cost of compensation payments to those milk producers who have undertaken to give up milk production and thereby release quota for reallocation. A further £370,000 is sought to cover the costs of the Northern Ireland dairy produce quota tribunal and local panels established to adjudicate on special case claims and quota allocations, together with payments to the Northern Ireland Milk Marketing Board for the administration of certain functions under the dairy produce quota regulations.

Right hon. and hon. Members would, I am sure, wish me to make some comment on the present milk quotas position. All wholesale producers have by now received definitive primary quota allocations based on 1983 sales. The total primary wholesale quota so issued amounts to some 1,286 million litres, out of the total Northern Ireland allocation of 1,316·7 million litres, which means that 30·7 million litres have not been allocated. About 3,900 producers applied for special case treatment, either because of an exceptional event which adversely affected production in 1983 or because they were committed to expansion. Almost all these special case claims have been considered and provisional awards of secondary wholesale quota have been made by local panels in about 1,700 cases. The remaining claims have been rejected. Producers have, of course, the right of appeal to the Northern Ireland Dairy Produce Quota Tribunal, and at present 750 have exercised that right. The tribunal is also required to adjudicate on cases made under the exceptional hardship rules and here 3,430 producers applied for consideration. As at 28 November, decisions had been taken on 1,788 of these and provisional awards made in 540 cases. The remainder will be dealt with over the course of the next few weeks.

I have great sympathy for those farmers who are attempting to make unwelcome and difficult adjustments in circumstances where unavoidable delays have resulted in uncertainty about final quota allocations and levy liability. It would be remiss of me to continue without reference to the immense efforts being made by members of the tribunal and panels on behalf of those farmers who have sought a change in their position under the special case rules or have made appeals. In particular I should mention the leadership, which has been provided by Mr. W. E. Boyd, the chairman of the tribunal. The industry and the Government have cause to be grateful to Mr. Boyd and the many other people involved in establishing a base from which individual producers can better take sensible decisions about their milk businesses.

Under the milk outgoers scheme 595 producers have submitted applications, thereby offering to release a total of 53·3 million litres for reallocation. The Department has written to all producers with a valid application inviting them to proceed, and those who decide to take up this invitation will have four weeks to make a claim for payment. Since producers with special case or hardship applications do not have to commit themselves until their claims are determined, it will therefore be some time before the position on overall quota surrender is known. However, as a number of applicants have decided to withdraw from the scheme it is already clear that additional quota released will be well below the initial offer levels.

With only 30·7 million litres of primary wholesale quota unallocated out of the Northern Ireland total, and a potential maximum of about a further 20 million litres becoming available from the outgoers scheme, the way ahead for distribution to people with special claims will obviously be difficult.

The second of the two agriculture votes, Class I, Vote 2, is mainly for special local support schemes. There is £5·5 million required for continuation of the milk consumer subsidy, which enables a higher wholesale price to be fixed for milk going to the liquid consumption market. Without that, consumers in Northern Ireland would have to pay more than consumers in Great Britain, or dairy farmers in Northern Ireland would suffer an even bigger gap between their average milk price and that in Great Britain. There is £2·3 million required for continuation of aid to pig and poultrymeat processing plants and egg packing stations, with the objective of easing the pressures on the intensive livestock sector and maintaining employment in the processing industry. Finally, £1,948,000 is sought under the grassland scheme, which was first introduced two years ago to encourage the improvement of grassland productivity outside the less-favoured areas. Following extension of the less-favoured areas the scheme will, of course, now apply to a much reduced area and expenditure will consequently be less.

I close my remarks in relation to agriculture by reminding the House of the background to special aids and the objectives we are seeking to achieve by continuing to support them. The absolute and relative importance of agriculture to the Northern Ireland economy is obvious. This is one of the first points that struck me when looking at the structure of the economy of the Province. Agriculture remains the largest industry — farm employment represents 9·8 per cent. of total civil employment and ancillary industries constitute a further 3 per cent. Agriculture produces 5·6 per cent. of the Northern Ireland gross domestic product. At the same time, farmers in Northern Ireland face particular disadvantages, such as remoteness from the main markets, high dependence on imported feedstuffs and lack of suitable alternatives to livestock enterprises, the latter being less well supported under the common agricultural policy than other products such as cereals.

Against the background of a general economic weakness, and unemployment rates higher than those in any other United Kingdom region, the justification for those special aids is that they will be of some assistance in maintaining production and employment on and off farms. Having visited farms in Northern Ireland, I know why farmers have concentrated on livestock as opposed to cereal growing, and I now realise how high up they are and the amount of rain that falls in those areas.

With regard to the social security programme, additional provision is being sought in Votes 1 and 2 of Class X. Vote 1, which covers national insurance, makes provision for the supplement from the Consolidated Fund of Northern Ireland to the Northern Ireland national insurance fund. The supplement is an annually defined percentage of contribution income, which for the current year is set at 11 per cent. The Estimates may therefore need revision during or after each financial year in the light of the Government Actuary's revised forecasts of contribution income. The supplementary provision now sought thus comprises an upward revision of £3·9 million for the current year, and a final upward adjustment of £250,000 in respect of 1979-80.

Class X, Vote 2, covers non-contributory benefits. The Supplementary Estimate of £26·12 million represents an increase of 6·3 per cent. on the original provision. The largest increase sought is for supplementary benefits. The additional provision of £770,000 in respect of supplementary pensions is necessary because of the reduction from 70 to 65 years of age in the upper qualifying age for age-related heating additions and the introduction of a new, higher age-related rate. The additional provision of £14·22 million sought for supplementary allowances is attributable to a rise in the number of beneficiaries and an increasing number of single payments.

An additional £7·8 million is sought in respect of housing benefits. There have been increases both in the numbers of eligible claimants and in the average weekly rebates and allowances.

A new benefit — severe disablement allowance — replaced non-contributory invalidity pensions from 29 November 1984. The new allowance is similar in purpose to the benefit that it has replaced, but more people will receive it. All those who qualified for receipt of non-contributory invalidity pensions on 29 November automatically qualified for the new allowance. Apart from that, people who have been continuously incapable of work for at least 28 weeks because of a disability on or before their 20th birthday can qualify for the new benefit simply on that basis. Those who become incapable of work later in life must also be severely disabled to qualify. Married women can claim the severe disablement allowance even if they are able to carry out normal household duties. The benefit is being introduced in two phases—people aged 50 or over and those aged 16 to 34 can get the new allowance from November 1984, while those aged 35 to 49 will be eligible from November 1985.

There are several other factors contributing to the net increase sought in that Vote. In particular, there is an additional provision of £800,000 in respect of attendance allowances due primarily to a rise in the number of beneficiaries.

In my opening remarks I have tried to outline briefly the main features of the draft order and to give right hon. and hon. Members an appreciation of the reasons for the changes in these four Northern Ireland Votes. I shall listen with interest to the points raised by hon. Members, and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will reply.

8.4 pm

Mr. Harold McCusker (Upper Bann): I intervene briefly to give my agricultural friends the opportunity to shake the straw out of their hair because no doubt they will be splashing about in the milk quota once again when they have had time to digest what the Minister has just told us. I should like to comment on three of the allowances that he mentioned when he introduced the Supplementary Estimates for the Department of Health and Social Services in Class X, Vote 2.

I should like to comment, first, on the attendance allowance increase of £800,000. That must be the best £800,000 that we shall spend this year. I am glad that there are 500 new beneficiaries. There are not all that many of them in Upper Bann, but I am glad that some people are having success in getting that allowance. It is one of the most frustrating allowances to deal with and upon which to advise one's constituents.

I should like to refer to the method that is used to determine whether someone qualifies for the allowance. A doctor visits the applicant, who might be an old person, with his memory failing. Not all applicants, but many, might suffer from varying degrees of dementia. The doctor asks the applicant a series of questions, as well as giving him a medical examination. Such people are not in the section of the community that tries to suck the system dry. The applicant tries honestly to answer the questions asked by the doctor. He might be more than honest, and understate his case, thus depriving himself of the allowance. In doing so, such people are only doing themselves and the community in general a disservice. The assessor might take at face value what the person says, so he is doing us all a disservice.

Surely, if anything, the allowance was designed to ensure that we do not put a greater burden on geriatric hospitals and other homes which are the alternative for elderly people if their families cannot maintain them at home. Some 500 people will put an added burden of almost £1 million on our social security budget, yet the one thing of which we can be sure is that there will be no gross abuse of the increase. The only abuse, if there is one, is that the elderly person might marginally receive some assistance to which he is not entitled if one applies a strict interpretation to the rules. But, in reality, £1 million is being spread among several concerned families in the community in an attempt to help them to look after the elderly people in the bosom of the family and prevent them from becoming an added burden on our society.

I hope that an effort will be made to involve the applicant's local doctor, because the applicant's general practitioner is frequently at variance with the assessing doctor. If local doctors are professionals and we are to believe that they will make an honest judgment—which we must believe—some cognisance must be taken of their assessment of whether that person, and his family, should benefit from the allowance. Therefore, I welcome the increase and look forward to its increasing even more. I believe that it will be offset by savings in other places.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the most frustrating thing in connection with attendance allowance is that, if someone has an independent mind and does not want to feel embarrassed by letting the person visiting him know how incapable he is, there is no appeal system, except on a point of law?

Mr. McCusker: I have suffered the same frustration as the hon. Gentleman and others. We are dealing with a category of people who do not want to take advantage of the system. Perhaps one can say that that is unfortunate. That applies to other aspects of the social security system. Those are the people who are least willing to take what they are entitled to—for example, in supplementary benefit—whereas others are prepared to take what they are not entitled to.

Heating addition is another part of the supplementary benefits system. A few days ago I had a visit from an elderly constituent who had moved home. In her former home she had used a room heater from which she ran several radiators. She had been assessed as qualifying for the higher rate of heating allowance. In her new home she used a similar room heater but without radiators. She still had to fire that room heater, but she also bought a couple of oil-filled radiators to heat the other rooms. That combination was more expensive to run, yet she was told, "I am sorry, but you no longer qualify for the higher heating addition. You will now qualify for the lower heating addition." That is incredible.

I choose that allowance as an example, and I should like to make it clear, first, that we are dealing with the same category of person to which I referred earlier, and, secondly, if there is any abuse, it is marginal. We are talking about someone aged 60 or 70 who is taking advantage of the social security system to get perhaps £1 or £2 more than he ought simply to heat his home. That is an extremely fine judgment to make.

Most of the money is spent on supplementary benefit. Is the Minister satisfied that every effort has been made to prevent massive abuse of that system? Is he convinced that the number of investigators at his disposal is adequate to do the job? Equally, is he convinced that in his Department and social security offices generally there is an even-handed application when judging these cases?

The Minister of State talked about an increase in the number of claims for single payments. I have been supplied with some statistics, which show that 33,000 single payments were made in 1979. By 1983, the figure was in excess of 100,000. In 1979, single payments amounted to about £1·5 million, but by 1983 they were in excess of £12 million. Is the Minister satisfied that we are getting value for money?

In essence we are not talking about people aged 65 or 70 who have given a lifetime's service to the community and have applied for assistance to help buy a new appliance. In fact, the lady who came to me with her heating problem bought a new cooker for £90. She is in receipt of minimal supplementary benefit, and I suggested that she should apply for supplementary benefit assistance to help buy that appliance. She told me, "I'll do no such thing. I wouldn't have the town of Lurgan talking about me." She was indicating that she was sufficiently independent and had saved enough money to buy the cooker. She was also indicating that she did not believe the system to be watertight, and that if she did apply there was no guarantee that it would be in confidence. That lady did not believe that her application would be in confidence because of the rumours and talk that one hears throughout Northern Ireland about the abuses of the system.

For example, my hon. Friend the Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Nicholson) will no doubt be aware of the strong rumour that a firm in Newry will remove one's furniture, store it and return it when required, thereby enabling the householder to make a large claim for furniture under the single payments system. No doubt that firm will be happy to furnish the individual with a receipt to prove that he was entitled to the £1,000 that he received.

There is also a rumour in my constituency that if someone gets a single payment of £350 he can approach a "dealer" who will buy the cheque for £250 and furnish a receipt. The single payment was not designed to enable people to line their pockets with £250 or to allow a so-called "dealer" to take a £100 cut.

I asked another of my hon. Friends what he considered to be the worst abuse of the single payment system, and he told me that it was voluntary separation. A man and wife can agree to separate temporarily, and for some reason they seem to be assisted by the Housing Executive. The two partners then set up home independently and claim £1,000 or £1,200 to furnish those households. Consequently, they are reconciled, but £1,000 has been lost by that time. We have all heard of someone applying for a cot when there is one in the attic, merely because he wishes to cash the cheque.

I must accept a strict interpretation of the rules for elderly people applying for attendance allowance to help their relations support them within the bosom of the family. I also accept that great care must be exercised to ensure that there is no abuse of that system. But if a pensioner is to be taken off the higher rate of heating allowance and placed on the lower rate because of the number of radiators she uses, I want an assurance that the same effort is being made to prevent abuses of supplementary benefit, which now amounts to £250 million, £12 million of which goes on single payments.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Chris Patten): Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman. I estimate that this year we shall be spending more than £20 million on single payments.

Mr. McCusker: That makes my point. If he has not already done so, I ask the Minister to investigate this matter. I appreciate that there are dangers in what I shall say, but is it possible to identify where most of that money is spent? I should not be surprised if it was spent in those areas of the Province where the Queen's writ does not run as it should. There are all sorts of pressures on all sorts of people in those areas to be extremely careful when dealing with these matters. If we are now talking about an increase from £1·5 million to £20 million in five years, action clearly needs to be taken. Now that the Minister has confirmed that figure, I look forward to an assurance that he is getting value for money in respect of every penny of that £20 million.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): Like the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker), I am sure that any hon. Member from Northern Ireland would express concern about attendance allowances. Such concern must be highlighted. The other matters to which the hon. Gentleman referred are also of the utmost importance, especially as the Minister has said that single payments this year will amount to £20 million. That must be looked at carefully. No doubt my hon. Friends will develop these matters further.

I wish to speak about Class I, items 1 and 2. Anybody who heard the Minister introducing the order and who did not know anything about Northern Ireland would think that Northern Ireland was to receive special aid which would put agriculture in the Province in a far better position than agriculture in any other part of the United Kingdom. I should like to underline what has been taken out of Northern Ireland agriculture and the cross which Northern Ireland farmers have to carry so that our view of special aid to Northern Ireland is put into its proper perspective.

On 12 November the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food told us of his intention to save £40 million in 1985-86. Those who know something about Northern Ireland agriculture will be aware that the Department of Agriculture in Northern Ireland has a special relationship with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and that MAFF is a very important part of the administration of Northern Ireland agriculture. On 11 December the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced, in reply to a written question, that changes in the farm capital grants were estimated to save about £40 million. In other words, United Kingdom farmers will be £40 million worse off in 1985-86.

The new standard rate of grant in the lowlands under the agriculture and horticulture grant scheme will be 15 per cent. It was 20 per cent. In the less-favoured areas the new standard grant will be 30 per cent. Grant will no longer be available for land clearance and land reclamation. Those activities will be assisted in Northern Ireland only where the Minister says that they are essential to maintain farm incomes. The ceiling on the amount of investment that may be grant-aided will be halved, except for heated glasshouses and orchard replanting. Heated glasshouses in Northern Ireland are few and far between. Grants for orchard replanting will not be of very much help to Northern Ireland farmers. The limit per labour unit will be about £25,000, and the overall business limit over six years will be about £50,000—again halved.

The changes made under the agriculture and horticulture development scheme and the agriculture and horticulture grant scheme relate to the exclusion of certain land reclamation items and reductions in the rate of grant for field drainage, from 70 to 50 per cent. in the less-favoured areas, and from 50 to 32·5 per cent. in the lowlands. According to the Minister, the policy is to have a closer integration of conservation and agriculture policies through high rates of grant for certain agricultural works which are of benefit to the environment, and to exclude land clearance except for Northern Ireland reclamation works. That may be helpful in East Anglia, but it is not helpful in Northern Ireland.

The sugar on this pill is an increase in the rate of grant from 20 to 30 per cent. for hedges, walls and dykes built of traditional local materials and for associated gates. The farming community in Northern Ireland is told that more cereals should be grown. If it were to grow cereals, instead of erecting dykes and hedges and putting up traditional gates, the farming community in Northern Ireland would have to remove them. So that will not be of any real benefit to Northern Ireland.

I am trying to put these special aids for agriculture into their proper perspective, because the brakes have been firmly applied to the agriculture industry of the United Kingdom. What was described by the Government as savings in 1985-86 have turned out to be a major change in policy. For Northern Ireland, this is a serious matter. The changes made to the national schemes will apply to Northern Ireland. There are, however, two valuable supplementary schemes which have been recognised, and I give credit for that. I am pleased that Northern Ireland is to retain the grassland scheme and that it will continue to be paid for land reclamation. I am also pleased that the agriculture development programme in Northern Ireland is to continue. That programme is 40 per cent. funded by the European Economic Community, but I suppose that we should be grateful for small mercies.

The rates of grant and special supplement for the grassland scheme which applies to lowland areas remains unchanged, but the changes and reductions in the national capital grant scheme mean that the overall benefits to farmers will be reduced. In the case of drainage, for AHGS relevant items the reducion will be from 45 to 30 per cent., and for AHDS relevant items the reduction will be from 55 to 37·5 per cent. The Ulster Farmers Union says that under this announcement Northern Ireland stands to lose £14 million. This means that farmers in England, Scotland and Wales will lose £26 million. That adds up to £40 million. Does this seem to be a fair proportion for Northern Ireland—a loss of £14 million compared to a loss of £26 million in Great Britain? I believe that it is a disproportionate loss to Northern Ireland agriculture. I hope that the Minister who is to reply to the debate will be able to help us about that problem.

The effect of the EEC farm price agreement for 1984 is having a depressing effect upon farm incomes. Farmers must spend money in order to earn grant. They have been caught in a pincer movement. The future looks bleak indeed for our most important industry. I am pleased that the Minister who introduced the order pointed out that 13 per cent. of all those employed in Northern Ireland are employed in agriculture. Nearly £250 million worth of our exports came from the farming industry. This industry is very important to Northern Ireland.

That leads me to the other very important inroad that has been made into Northern Ireland agriculture. The milk quotas will take about £20 million out of the agriculture industry. This will result in a total reduction of £34 million, while we are given aid amounting to £10 million.

I am sure that both Ministers on the Front Bench know the views of Northern Ireland dairy farmers. I am sure, also, that the figures that we have been given today about the quota that will be available will come as no surprise to those of us who know what is happening to the dairy industry in Northern Ireland. We are in a very serious position. That situation should never have arisen, and that is why the dairy farmers in Northern Ireland strongly condemn the Government for their handling of the matter.

The Milk Marketing Board in Northern Ireland, the Ulster Farmers Union and the Northern Ireland Agricultural Producers Organisation, together with the three Members of the European Parliament from Northern Ireland, the right hon Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor), the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) and I, met Mr. Dalsager, the Commissioner for Agriculture, in Strasbourg. He told us that the purpose of the 65,000 tonnes allocation was to give more to Northern Ireland, because of the position of our agriculture industry within the United Kingdom. It was proposed that when the United Kingdom quota was settled Northern Ireland should get an extra 65,000 tonnes. To our cost, we know that that 65,000 tonnes was not given to Northern Ireland. It was spread throughout the United Kingdom, so that we got little more than 5·5 per cent. of it. That is why there is so much bitterness in Northern Ireland. We were told in Europe that we should get more, but we did not get any more. The jewel of Northern Ireland agriculture—the dairy sector—has been kicked into the gutter and will face serious problems.

Panels and tribunals have been set up, but when they give judgments the Government are not able to give allocations to those for whom they were intended. We spend money on a system to investigate hardship cases and to allow people to put their case to tribunals. Those people win their cases, but they still face serious problems. Some cases have already been adjudicated upon and the appeals machinery has been used. People who have brought those cases have been told that they will get a bigger quota. But how much will they actually receive? That question needs to be answered.

The Prime Minister said that until every member state of the EC pays the levy the British Government will not collect the money. We should remember that Northern Ireland is the only part of the United Kingdom that will have to pay the levy. Therefore, our farmers want to know what the future holds.

Dr. Boyson: I referred at a recent Question Time to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister about the milk levy. The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced in a written answer today:

" We are fully committed to the milk supplementary levy arrangements agreed by the Agriculture Council in March. It is clear from last week's Council discussion and from the position adopted by other member states that there are differences in the interpretation of the rules and uncertainty about the amount of levy due. We are, therefore, suspending action for the time being. We are keeping the situation under review and are ready to collect and pay over any levies that may be due from us once the legal position becomes clearer and other member states are conforming to the requirements." — [Official Report, 17 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 37.]

I have not discussed the matter with the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, but it seems that we are not paying any levy at the present time.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I welcome that reply, even though it only puts off the evil day. Knowing something about Europe and about the Governments who have not taken even the first steps to legislate so that they can collect levies, I know that it would be the height of madness for us to demand payment from our people.

Dr. Boyson: The hon. Gentleman has referred to the different attitudes of various countries. It may be helpful if I point out that Belgium, the Netherlands and the Republic of Ireland are taking the same approach as we are. So are the Germans, except that they have already collected some levy, which they are holding on to. The position in other countries varies.

Rev. Ian Paisley: That statement will help the farming community, the Milk Marketing Board and everyone else in Northern Ireland. I trust that the Government will remain firm on the issue. I know that if the British Government had said, "We will not pay the levy," other countries would have used that as an excuse not to pay the levy either. Now the matter is in the court of those who have not legislated to enable themselves to pay the levy. I am glad that that information is out in the open.

Ministers in Northern Ireland will be confronted by people who feel bitter because they have been badly treated. The Prime Minister said that we would get an increased production allocation. Subsequently, that undertaking had to be withdrawn. We were also told that we would be as well off as the rest of the United Kingdom. Now we find that Northern Ireland farmers do not get the same as British farmers for their finished products.

Northern Ireland agriculture faces a serious problem. The Minister of Agriculture said that that was a thing of the past, but it will never be a thing of the past. I trust that, even now, we can find a way to alleviate the hardship of Northern Ireland's dairy farmers.

Agriculture in Northern Ireland faces other problems, but the difficulty experienced by dairy farmers overshadows the others. The beef sector faces problems, but I am glad that the intervention regime has been made to work in Northern Ireland. At one time we did not think that we would have the necessary storage space or get the rights that we ought to have as a member of the European Community to get our meat into intervention. I am glad that the pressures put on the Minister of Agriculture have been effective and that there is provision for intervention.

I understand that an application is before one of the other Ministers for blast-freezing accommodation and factory space in Northern Ireland. I hope that that space will soon be available, so that we shall not have to take produce from Northern Ireland. That would be a great help to our farming community.

We shall no doubt hear more about how the Minister hopes to allocate special aid. However, even with special aid, agriculture has been badly hit and will suffer severely in the coming year. As agriculture provides permanent jobs and maintains the heart of employment, a larger measure of aid should be made available for it. That is what the Minister's message should be to farmers tonight.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I shall not follow the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) on that latter point because it may raise difficulties in that shopkeepers and industrialists may also look for more aid. We are debating a specific Appropriation order. I would be happier if we were doing so in a United Kingdom context because some of the issues that I shall raise may be applicable to other parts of the United Kingdom. I may appear to ask for something specifically for the people of Northern Ireland, but I shall deal with the division of the cheque of the nation to the needy, especially regarding Class X, Vote 2.

I welcome the Minister's statement that there has been an increase in the numbers who have taken up the severe disability allowance. Under the old scheme many deserving cases did not get it. I suspect that even yet all those entitled to it are not claiming it and that some who should receive it may not be entitled to it because of the way in which the rules are drawn. The rules were widened but they were drawn to exclude many people because the nation could not foot the bill.

How are the new policies on housing benefit working out under the new point system? I understand that anomalies are developing and injustices occurring. The housing authority introduced a fine point system. The normal bureaucratic process is to think of a number, double it, subtract 10 and come up with an answer. In some of our houses people were given points for having a kitchen dinette. However, we discovered that there was no specific measurement for a kitchen dinette. After several test cases it was acknowledged that a kitchen dinette was not specified. We thought we had won that, but then we discovered that there was no reduction in the rent and no housing benefit. When we inquired we found that, although there was no kitchen dinette, there was a living-room dinette. Therefore, the Housing Executive transferred the points across and charged people accordingly. Yet a house that is supposed to have a living-room dinette is no bigger. In many such rooms there is not space to put a table. At best one can have a drop-leaf table or a card table. Have there been savings in housing benefit for the Department?

There has been an increase in the basic pension, together with a re-examination of the allowances of those who hitherto had them. There is a case in my constituency that is typical of the sort of older people to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) alluded. The husband is more than 80 and the wife is more than 70 years of age. Previously, they were entitled to a heating allowance, which brought them in about £1 a week. They now have the increased pension. However, through regrading, the allowance has been reduced. That family has an overall increase of 3p a week. Top salary review boards, Members of Parliament and trade unions would not be satisfied if, at the end of a pay review when there was supposed to have been an increase in line with inflation, they were losing. As we are considering the Appropriation order, will the Minister say how many people are being adversely affected by the new arrangements?

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Will my hon. Friend bear in mind that that also bites upon payments for special diets as well as payments for heating?

Rev. Martin Smyth: I thank my right hon. Friend for widening my point. The arrangement has an adverse effect on those with special diets. Can the Minister assure us that food prices have been reduced, and tell us how those who three weeks ago were entitled to a special rate to meet the needs of their special diet can get resources to meet their medical needs?

As I said earlier, I would be happier if we debated the matter in the context of the United Kingdom as a whole, because it bites throughout the kingdom. My constituents are not happy with it or the glib response from the Department and the Prime Minister that the policy is to give people more in their basic pension so that they can choose how they use their money. That sounds nice, but those who receive an increased pension and have other pensions or savings to augment it find that the Treasury claws it back in income tax. It is not simply that pensioners are automatically given more money to spend as they wish. Many pensioners will lose because the increased pension takes them over the margin for benefits.

I am even more worried about pensioners who are net losers. A caring Government and Parliament should never legislate willingly for that and then dismiss complaints by saying that it is rough and ready justice. Can the Minister tell us how many people have been affected in that way?

Tonight we are dealing with an appropriation in aid. What worries me about social services in Northern Ireland is that whenever there has been a shortfall in the Northern Ireland programme the Department that deals with social services has made no bids for money to meet people's needs. Perhaps in its wisdom or otherwise the Department decided not to trawl for that money. I am referring especially to the problems of the elderly who have done their best to maintain their dignity in the community. According to the rules, they are entitled to the provision of a telephone service, but because there is a shortage of cash in the Department such telephones are being rationed and social workers must tell those elderly people that they cannot have telephones. It is rationing by lists. Time magazine has said that it is becoming a modern problem in medicine, with doctors hoping that people will die before they have to spend money to meet their needs.

Mr. Chris Patten: I may have misunderstood what the hon. Gentleman said, but I think I am right in saying that my Department suggested several ways in which some of the underspend might be used in the social services area. The Assembly disagreed with those proposals and our views were changed. I make no elaborate constitutional point on the issue, but the hon. Gentleman will discover that the Assembly and many others believed that the money should be spent on educational schemes rather than on DHSS schemes.

Rev. Martin Smyth: The Minister is saying that the spending of the nation's money goes outside the remit of this Chamber. I am asking him why the Department did not put in bids for the specific services to which I referred. I assure the Minister that either here or in the Assembly I would have fought my corner on that matter. I have made inquiries and I understand that the Department did not put in a bid. Does the Department believe in the emphasis on community care and that we do not therefore need more money? If so, it is going in the right direction, although in the end it will cost the Department more than if it supported such people in the community.

I support the plea of my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann about the attendance allowance and ask for a little more understanding from those who conduct the final vetting. We live in an age of interdependence, but it would be utterly false to remove the pride of independence from the sick or the elderly. I have known doctors ask elderly people how well they can walk unaided. In many cases, those elderly people get up and do what we call in Ulster the rounds of the kitchen, holding on to the furniture and without using the Zimmer frame. They are then classified as being able to move unaided, and as a result they lose the mobility allowance or the attendance allowance.

I know a lady aged more than 80 who is remarkably fresh mentally and clear-eyed. She lives with her brother, who is aged more than 70. Her brother has managed to keep his car on the basic pension, but now he must give it up because they are not entitled to mobility allowance. Although he is looking after her, because of the way the axe comes down, he is not entitled to attendance allowance.

I draw the Minister's attention to the misuse of supplementary provision, which is creating an attitude that could not be described as helpful. I am thinking of a rehabilitation home for young people where those who have managed to obtain work are penalised whereas those who cannot find work are not. If a youngster is unemployed, his rent at the home is paid—it costs about £48 a week—and he is given £19 a week pocket money. His time is his own. However, if a youngster manages to find a part-time job, he is penalised by not being granted supplementary benefit. If a youngster must pay travelling expenses to go to work, he is worse off than the person whose rent is paid and who has £19 a week pocket money.

I hope that the review of the supplementary benefits system will do something more to help those who genuinely want work but who are not encouraged to find it. The Government speak about incentives and urge people to get up and do things, but in this case youngsters are encouraged to do nothing, to sit back and to relax. There is misuse of the supplementary provisions, especially of those for younger people. I am glad to see that within England, at any rate, there has been a growing awareness of this problem and I hope that the forthcoming reviews will come up with something positive.

I take this opportunity to welcome the increase in the Appropriation order, but I wish to highlight the needs and misuses. I agree with my hon. Friends about some of the abuses that have occurred. This is straying outside the order somewhat, but as the matter has been raised and as the Minister has thrown it back to us I take the opportunity of asking whether the Minister has had any reply from any sources in Northern Ireland about the possibility of the aid for transport for pensioners being put on the rates.

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): I come to this House from a constituency with the highest unemployment in the United Kingdom and with a large farming community, in which the majority of the farmers have smallholdings. I appreciate and welcome any money being allocated to Ulster, and I appreciate the Minister of State's efforts on our behalf. He has shown clearly his interest in these matters since coming to Northern Ireland a short time ago, and I appreciate his grasp of the many problems, which he displayed clearly a few days ago when he addressed the Northern Ireland Assembly.

However, I wonder whether the Government fully appreciate the effect that the milk quota system is having, especially on the small farmers in my constituency. I was led to believe, whenever the matter was discussed, that the Government had it in their mind to safeguard dairy herds of about 40 cows. However, as the milk quota system is being applied, I find that there is a genuine suspicion that there is somewhere a desire to force the small farmer into liquidation and, rather than saving the small herd, a desire that the farmer with a small number of cows should be pushed below the poverty line and forced to rely on supplementary benefit. I assure the House that these are the genuine worries and concerns of the people whom I represent.

What assurances can the Minister give to those farmers who have already been adjudicated on? Will they receive the quota that they have been promised? The tribunals have sat and listened to the cases, especially hardship cases; and an extra quota has been given. What assurances can the Minister give to the farmers of my constituency and throughout the provinces on the likelihood of getting any of this quota? The Minister drew to our attention the fact that the outgoers scheme will fall far short of the Government's intentions for the initial estimation of the amount of quota that can be spread. I should like the Minister to direct his attention to that matter.

Farmers in Northern Ireland have been encouraged to invest in agriculture and new farm units. Up until the time that the quota came into existence, farmers were encouraged by the Department of Agriculture to go into milk production. After that encouragement, it is disgraceful that farmers are now being left high and dry and with a great financial burden on their shoulders.

Dr. Boyson: I do not think that what I can say will be helpful, but the hon. Gentleman has asked me a straight question on a matter that concerns everybody, and which has concerned me since I have looked at the figures. Originally, there was a cut of 6 per cent. plus a cut of 3 per cent. The 3 per cent. cut was to provide extra resources for those who, on appeal, won the right to keep the extra number of cows producing milk on their farms. At the moment, all but 30·7 million litres of the clawback have been allocated, and that 30·7 million litres are still available for distribution. It was hoped to add to that what was expected to come back on the outgoers scheme. Originally, that was estimated to be 53·3 million litres. Since a lot of people are not going ahead with the scheme, having been given the right to do so and to get their money from it, I estimate that less than half that amount will come back. Let us assume that it is 20 million litres. That means that the total available for distribution in Northern Ireland amongst those who have won their appeals will be only about 50·7 million litres.

I have come into this in the middle of it, and the Northern Ireland farmers know about this better than I do. But it was obvious from the start to anyone who could add up that, with the tribunals being left to decide appeals, there was no means of getting the equation into balance. It depends how many appeals are allowed and the demand. We know that we can provide about 50·7 million litres, but we only know that now because fewer producers are outgoing than the number who intended to at the beginning.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether the Minister is seeking to make a second speech or whether this really is an intervention, but even ministerial interventions should be brief.

Dr. Boyson: Your intervention has saved me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Bearing in mind hon. Members' knowledge of these matters, I shall conclude my intervention immediately by saying that there was no means at the beginning of getting a balance, and there will be the Dickens of a job at the end to decide what is to be given to those whose appeals are successful.

Rev. William McCrea: I thank the Minister for his interesting intervention, though I am not sure that it was all that helpful. However, I hope that his hon. Friend, when he replies to the debate, will address himself to another question on the same subject. What has already been allocated of the 50·7 million litres by the tribunals so far? The Department should know the answer, and we shall be able to judge from it whether there is any reason for farmers to go to Dundonald house to have their appeals heard.

I suspect that, although some farmers will come back satisfied, having had their cases heard by the tribunals, they may be in for a disappointment when we come to consider the 50·7 million litres available. This is very serious, because the farmers have had a long wait. They have experienced months of deep concern and financial and other worries about this. Unfortunately, at the end of the day, they may come to a serious bump in the road when they discover that it is not possible to keep the promises that they felt were made to them at the tribunal.

Other hon. Members have raised a number of matters which are of the utmost importance to the people of the Province. Among them is the problem of housing benefit. I hope that the Minister will be able to say how the new points system for housing benefit is working in the Province. Only today I visited an estate in Watson Park, Omagh. The tenants told me that under the new rents system their aluminium bungalows, which they could be blown out of on a windy night, will be on a par with a normal Housing Executive house. That causes me great concern. Within the next few days I shall be asking the Minister about matters relating to this estate. There are many worries about it.

I draw the Minister's attention to housing benefit. I notice from the paper that Northern Ireland Housing Executive rents are going up again. I was a member of the board and felt strongly about those rents. We were always being told that rents in Northern Ireland compared favourably with those in England and Wales. Will the Minister tell the House tonight how they compare with those in Scotland? What is the average rent for a Northern Ireland Housing Executive property compared with that of Scotland? When I was a member of the board there was a considerable differential. The problems of Scotland are no different from those of Northern Ireland. I hope the Minister will answer that clearly when he replies.

Mr. Chris Patten: Would the hon. Gentleman also like Northern Ireland to have the same expenditure, pro rata, on housing as Scotland?

Rev. William McCrea: I am sure that the Minister is fully aware that spending on housing in Scotland is through the local authorities. It was taken from the local authorities in Northern Ireland. If the Minister wants to tell the House tonight that he is handing housing back to the local authorities in Northern Ireland, it will be a most interesting statement. I shall be glad to welcome that as a former member of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive board because that is an unwieldy body and unfortunately it is far removed from many of the day-to-day problems of my constituents in Mid-Ulster or those of other hon. Members. I hope that the Minister will not run away from my question. Will he, for the record, tell the House the difference between the average rent in Northern Ireland and that in Scotland?

As the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) said, I do not know where all the people who are getting an attendance allowance come from. They definitely do not come from my constituency. I am delighted that there will be 500 new beneficiaries. I strongly believe that it is desirable to keep the elderly in the community. The Ulster people have an independent character that is in many ways commendable. The Government do not desire to put an extra burden on geriatric units or hospitals because there are already insufficient for the number of elderly people who desire to enter them.

I wholeheartedly agree with the hon. Member for Upper Bann that the majority of those being denied attendance allowance in the Province are honourable citizens who do not like to complain. That is the last thing they want to do. Indeed, the elderly in Ulster have always come from a proud stock and they do not like to say that they do not have the means to look after themselves. Indeed, when a doctor visits them they get into a nervous state and deprive themselves of many of the benefits which are their right because they are unwilling to plead poverty. That is the simple substance of the situation.

Some families are anxious to look after their elderly relatives, but there are many who are not. The House should — I believe that the Minister will — commend those families who genuinely care for the elderly in the community. Everyone should salute them. Indeed, it is desirable to encourage more of that. I would wholeheartedly encourage families to show greater concern for their loved ones.

I turn to a point that has already been touched on. People rely on their local doctor. People are always told that their doctor is their professional adviser on health and that they must believe him. But he is believed only until it comes to benefits, and then it is said that the local doctor is not the man to rely on. I doubt whether the Government will disagree when I say that they probably have a better record than the Labour Administration on pensions and other benefits. Indeed, I think that I have heard the Prime Minister state that at the Dispatch Box.

But I assure hon. Members that ordinary pensioners do not find that they have a lot of money to spend at a time of cuts in the number of home helps and in the provision of telephones. Indeed, the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) mentioned that. It is like David in the scriptures, who said "no man cared for my soul". Many pensioners think that no one cares for their bodies either. Quite a few pensioners have come to speak to me about the 50p being taken off. Everyone got the addition to their pensions, but 50p was taken away from heating allowance. I know that 50p may not mean much to hon. Members, but I can assure them that it means a considerable amount to pensioners, to those on long-term supplementary benefit and to widows.

I should like to hear the Minister's comments, because I am told that the allowance amounts to practically nothing. I think that the hon. Member for Belfast, South said that his constituent got a 3p addition. Where is the allowance for inflation in that? People feel that they are worse off as a result of the change.

Like other hon. Members, I must express alarm about supplementary benefit. Every effort must be made to stop abuse. I do not believe that the number of investigators is sufficient. I speak as a former employee of the DHSS, and I feel sure that there is an inadequate number of personnel to investigate the abuse and skullduggery going on.

A few weeks ago I went to the DHSS about a very serious instance of abuse. One of the senior officials there told me that he knew that it was going on. Indeed, the mechanism of abuse was so great that there was an early warning system among the fishermen. Consequently, whenever someone from the Department was in the vicinity, the alarm was raised over the air waves, the boats were cleared and the men are able to live on supplementary benefit as well. It is alarming that a chief official at the Department should know that that is going on, yet say that there is nothing that he can do about it.

I know that many who genuinely need single payments are denied them. But many of us are worried that, although genuine cases are sometimes denied, those skilful in abuse are apparently able to get away with it. I shall give a typical example and invite the Minister to ask the business man concerned whether what I say is true. I raised the matter in another place and my case was not believed. A person desired a colour television. He was on supplementary benefit and put in for a special needs allowance. That person went to an electrician, a business man, and asked him to order a colour television and to make out an account for furniture. A television enclosed in a cabinet is regarded as furniture. To ensure that he got the best furniture and television, the person asked the electrician to ensure that the cabinet had Queen Anne legs.

The business man was worried. He asked, "Are you sure you are entitled to this?" The person promised him that he would be back immediately with a cheque. The business man thought that he would like such a television set himself and wondered whether to order it. He decided to but thought that he would never see the person again. Inside three days the person was back with a state cheque for his colour television in a cabinet with Queen Anne legs. That should be condemned, but it is not unusual. The hon. Member for Upper Bann talked about buying cheques. My friend the business man told me that he was offered £230 if he would buy a cheque. In that one-off payment he would be allowed to keep the £230. He was not willing to buy the cheque.

I find such incidents alarming. The Minister is also worried. He has said so in the Province. What action is being taken on the ground to ensure that that practice is stopped?

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would help the Minister if a close examination were made of those business premises which cash such cheques? Does he accept that honest and upright business men refuse to accept the cheques or to participate in fraud?

Rev. William McCrea: I agree wholeheartedly. That is a matter which should exercise the Minister.

As the hon. Member for Belfast, South said, there are parts of our country in which the Queen's writ does not run. Government officials cannot go to parts of the Province. In another place I described a typical example involving a television licence. The official was investigating. He was taken out of his van, stripped, sent back and told, "Appear again and you'll get a bullet through your head." In that area, licences do not have to be paid and yet people in the rest of the community have to pay their licence fees. I do not suggest that they should not pay; I suggest that everyone should pay.

A special calibre of officer is needed to go into some of the areas because he might be putting his neck on the block.

Mr. Chris Patten: Extremely committed and brave officers do such work and go into every area in the Province. I have discussed the problem with them. The hon. Gentleman makes serious and important allegations about individual firms and abuses. I hope that he will bring those cases to my attention and we shall pursue them in the normal way. General allegations are not worth much unless one has specifics on which to act.

Rev. William McCrea: I accept that the allegations are serious. As with other serious allegations, they have been brought before the House. It is appropriate and proper to exercise my right to draw the attention of hon. Members to these matters. I shall seek to do so as quickly as possible.

Whether or not the Minister accepts it, there are vast areas of the Province where few charges are brought against those fiddling the social services. I should be delighted if the Minister would reveal the figures. What charges of fraud are being brought, and how many stick?

I know that other hon. Members wish to speak. I have been glad of the opportunity to do so. Indeed, it would be wrong if I did not welcome funds for Northern Ireland.

9.26 pm

Mr. James Nicholson (Newry and Armagh): I wish to address myself to Class I, Vote 1. I welcome anything that improves the facilities of our agricultural colleges. However, I must make it clear that I only welcome improvement to the existing system—the funds should not be used to purchase additional land for the colleges.

An agricultural college in the Province recently bid for land against local farmers and the price rose to more than £3,000 an acre. It is bad enough when farmers make fools out of themselves by bidding land to exorbitant prices, but when they bid against the Department it is quite ridiculous. The Department does not have to worry about milk quotas, about the troubles in the intensive sector or whether the pigs will pay. Quite frankly, the farmer does not stand much of a chance. I hope that that will never be repeated.

There is sufficient land within the control of the Department in Northern Ireland, and the colleges should not need to bid against the farmers for additional land. There is no point in educating our young if, when they return to their farms, they cannot expand. Our young farmers must be given their heads and must be allowed to expand. When I left school I would have been severely disadvantaged if I had had to face the problems that many young people face today.

Our farmers are not allowed to expand their milk production—the one profitable area of agriculture where they can see a return month by month. More importantly, their bank managers can see that return. They can count on repayments being made against borrowing. The Government's present policy does not allow that.

Restrictions were announced last week on farm capital grants, and that will cause difficulties to the agriculture industry. I agree with the remarks of the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) about the severe difficulties that will arise in Northern Ireland from the reduced grants. The hon. Gentleman talked about a £14 million reduction out of an overall reduction of £40 million. I received a written answer from the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in which he said that Northern Ireland will suffer a reduction of £13 million. I am sure that the hon. Member for Antrim, North will not disagree with me over £1 million. However, it is most unfair that the small six counties of Northern Ireland should be asked to bear one third of the reduction in the agriculture budget for the entire United Kingdom. I do not think that that proposal will bear scrutiny. I hope that the Minister will consider it further and tell us at a later stage why he thinks that it is fair. I shall be most concerned if the proposed reduction is implemented.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the estimate of the Ulster Farmers Union is not so very far out. We often find with the Ministry that £1 million is neither here nor there, but is of much greater concern to the farmers from whose pockets it will have to come.

Mr. Nicholson: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that £1 million would be considered extremely important by Northern Ireland farmers. It is only right that we should stress that Northern Ireland is expected to accept one third of the cut for the entire United Kingdom.

I direct myself to milk quotas, the buy-out scheme, the administration of the scheme and the consequent costs. Milk quotas have been with us for a short time but they have caused many problems for farmers, politicians, the Government, those involved in the manufacturing industry, those engaged in the ancillary industries and those who depend on agriculture for their employment. We all know that there has been a reduction in employment because of the implementation of the quotas. I do not wish to repeat everything that has already been said about the quotas but there are many grey areas that must be clarified. I have spoken about those issues on a number of occasions in the House and unfortunately we have not found answers to many of the questions.

The production allocation of 65,000 tonnes remains the burning issue. In the first six months, Northern Ireland producers started paying in excess of £5 million in levy. I hope that there will be a ministerial statement this evening even if its effect is only to put off the evil day of reckoning. At least that will give us a breathing space to enable us to ascertain how things will work out as the months progress. No other part of the United Kingdom has any levy to pay, or has had to do so. The United Kingdom is still falling far short of the overall national quota that was determined as part of the Brussels agreement.

Many of us contend that the 65,000 tonne production allocation that was set in the Brussels negotiations never reached Northern Ireland. The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food maintains that it did. The whole problem has been cloaked in mystery. I still cannot accept that we have been informed correctly, especially in view of the statement made by the right hon. Member for Bosworth (Mr. Butler) when he was the Minister of State responsible for agriculture. He made that statement during a dinner on 29 April at the Ulster Farmers Union and in numerous press releases issued by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The press release of the speech made at the annual dinner of the Ulster Farmers Union stated:

"those who contributed most to the surpluses through increasing production since 1981 should stand the biggest cutbacks. Such a principle applied to Northern Ireland would have been little short of disastrous: a 15 per cent. cut in overall output against 1983. Under pressure from the United Kingdom the EC Agriculture Ministers agreed that Northern Ireland had to be specially treated. The result, as you know, was a special allocation of 65,000 tonnes to Northern Ireland. Then the Agriculture Ministries of the United Kingdom agreed a further special allocation; and the possible 15 per cent. cut was reduced to 6 per cent."

On 26 April 1984, the Minister replied to a question I raised by stating:

"The 65,000 tonnes allocation has certainly gone to Northern Ireland. The allocation between the regions of the United Kingdom was initially based on 1981 levels of production, to which was added a special quota of 65,000 tonnes agreed between the EEC Agriculture Ministries. A further addition of almost the same amount was then agreed between the Ministers responsible for agriculture in the various regions of the United Kingdom." — [Official Report, 26 April 1984; Vol. 58, c. 875.]

Those two statements complement each other. They were not off-the-cuff speeches about a one-off possibility.

Where has the 1981 allocation plus 1 per cent. quota gone? Where has the amount from England, Scotland and Wales disappeared to? The Minister, who then had responsibility for agriculture, told us what would be the solution. That was the position of the Northern Ireland Department of Agriculture until the end of June this year. What changed all that? The position was changed in the House on 3 July. The Minister of State told us when presenting the regulations that it was not the 1981 allocation plus 1 per cent. quota. That milk would not flow from England, Wales and Scotland to Northern Ireland. I do not know whether the Government were forced to change the provision because of earlier discrepancies in the regulations. The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food—the hon. Member for Norfolk, South (Mr. MacGregor) — replied to my question by stating:

"The allocation of quota between the regions of the United Kingdom was based on deliveries in 1983, but in the calculations we have taken account of the trend of deliveries since 1981, and that includes the rapid growth in deliveries in Northern Ireland as compared to the other territories."—[Official Report, 3 July 1984; Vol. 63, c. 235.]

Therein lies the difficulty that faces Northern Ireland agriculture. The important phrase is "taken account of the trend of deliveries since 1981".

That proved to be important for Northern Ireland. It meant that England and Wales received a cut of 6·25 per cent. on 1983 production; Scotland received a reduction of 6·39 per cent.; but Northern Ireland received a reduction of 10·35 per cent. That reduction of 10·35 per cent—this is the argument that is put forward—includes the 65,000 tonnes, which brings us back to the reduction, on the 1981 figure of 5·83 per cent. Northern Ireland should not have been treated differently from any other part of the United Kingdom. The Government have used that excuse to justify their action. The spirit of the Brussels agreement was not honoured.

We have spoken of the trend in deliveries. That is what the figures are based on and the argument that is used. I gave the Minister of State some figures about the trend in deliveries in other areas. If other areas had received the same treatment as Northern Ireland, we should have had more difficulty in arguing our case. The islands of Arran, Bute, Coll, Tigh and Great Cumbrae increased their production by 14·4 per cent. The Orkneys increased production by 19·4 per cent. and the Shetland Isles by 26·8 per cent. between 1981 and 1983. I do not argue that the Orkneys and the Shetland Isles should not have received the consideration that they have. I have no doubt that they were entitled to that consideration because of their remoteness. The increase in production within the Aberdeen district milk marketing area was 11·7 per cent.

Will the Minister tell the House tonight whether the areas I have mentioned received a more severe cut based on trend in deliveries than other parts of the United Kingdom? He and I know that that is not what happened. That is how the Northern Ireland argument for fair treatment under the trend deliveries has arisen. Northern Ireland's isolated position within Europe and its difficulty in reaching markets means that we should have received the 65,000 tonnes that was awarded to us in Brussels. We did not receive it, and that is our main problem.

That places Northern Ireland dairy farmers at a serious disadvantage compared with their counterparts in the rest of the United Kingdom. The figures that I have given illustrate that. Northern Ireland's case for the 65,000 tonnes is accepted by everyone but the Minister. He appears to be the only man living who does not accept it.

I shall refer the Minister to a good booklet produced by the Select Committee, which deals effectively and efficiently with the problem of the Northern Ireland milk quota. The Select Committee called upon the Minister to clear up the matter, not tomorrow but immediately. I reiterate that call tonight.

I should like to refer to the buy-out scheme and its effects. In reply to part of a speech that I made on 3 July, the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food said:

"In addition, I hope that the hon. Gentleman has noted that we have selected Northern Ireland for special treatment under the outgoers scheme. As a result of buying out 5 per cent. of Northern Ireland in the outgoers scheme, as opposed to 2¼ per cent. in Great Britain, we shall be spending £4·73 million more in Northern Ireland than if we had applied the same percentage as in the rest of the United Kingdom. We have adopted this approach because we recognise the special problems of Northern Ireland, which include an especially high number of small producers. That is why we have given it favourable terms under the outgoers scheme."—[Official Report, 3 July 1984; Vol. 63, c. 235.]

After what the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, told us about the amount that is available in the outgoers scheme, the amount of milk that is to be bought appears to have diminished. We were told that the outgoers scheme would be a panacea for the dairy problem in Northern Ireland. However, we find that it has not worked. It was never going to work, and we can now say that it has not worked. Why? Because the farmers of Northern Ireland, who depend on the milk industry, could not afford to take up the scheme. They had to cut back to the required level because there was no other option for them. They could not expand into grain or any other part of agriculture as farmers could in other parts of the United Kingdom.

I ask the Minister what proposals he has to make up the shortfall to which the Minister of State referred on 3 July. We were told that the scheme would be the panacea to solve the problem. What proposals does the Department have to make up the shortfall? If I understand the Minister correctly, there are roughly 50·7 million litres of milk left to Northern Ireland. We have been given the figure of 5,000 litres per cow. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs) is right in his calculation, when he tells me that that means that there are 10,000 cows to be shared out among all the farmers who are competing daily at Dundonald house for quota. That means that there are about 15,000 or 16,000 litres per applicant, in special cases. However, those are only rough figures. If that is so, I think that the Minister will not disagree that it will not solve the problems—and they are great; they are vast. I sometimes shudder when I wonder how they will be solved.

Daily, I receive telephone calls from farmers, not only in my constituency but outside, asking me how they can improve their position. They tell me the position that they are put in by the Department of Agriculture schemes in which they have participated in all sincerity. They tell me that they have purchased land on the strength of increasing their dairy herd and making the repayments. I cannot reply adequately to the farmers. I sincerely hope that the Minister will tell us that there is a chink of light at the end of the tunnel, because 50 million litres is nowhere near what is required to deal with the problem in Northern Ireland.

I should like to refer to farmers in the rest of the United Kingdom in a similar position, who have applied to participate in the scheme. From what the Minister told us, I do not know what percentage a farmer who has achieved a secondary quota will receive in the final analysis. I doubt whether even the Minister knows. We shall be shocked and dismayed, and there will be even more anger and resentment if farmers in the United Kingdom get 100 per cent. of secondary quota while farmers in Northern Ireland receive only 40, 50, 60 or 70 per cent.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): Or 25 per cent.

Mr. Nicholson: That may well be, but I did not want to go that low. That would be unacceptable to the farmers of Northern Ireland, just as I hope it will be unacceptable to the Minister.

Mr. Maginnis: I do not want to distract my hon. Friend, but is he aware that a particular problem affects a limited number of dairy farmers which under the present system seems to be insoluble? That is the problem of dairy farmers who over the past eight, 10 or 11 years have, through terrorism, been forced to leave farms that are close to the frontier with the Irish Republic. They have held on to their land in the hope that the violence would decrease and they would be able to return to continue dairying, which they have done for generations. But when they go to the Dairy Produce Quota Tribunal to argue for a quota, they are told that as they have stopped milk production, perhaps 10 years ago, there is no basis on which their application can be judged. Consequently, they are penalised yet again. They have received no compensation for being forced to move from their farms because of terrorism, nor have they any hope of returning to continue their farming if things improve.

Mr. Nicholson: I thank my hon. Friend for his valuable and learned contribution. He makes a valid point. The Minister has no doubt listened to it and will perhaps in due course comment on it. It is a matter that will cause concern to the farmers placed in that invidious position.

It is fair to say that no other bureaucratic body, in an attempt to solve one problem, could have created a greater one. The EEC, with which we are all saddled, has forced a monster on us. Day after day, farmers throughout Northern Ireland travel to Dundonald house to face tribunals in an attempt to secure secondary quotas, but the number of such quotas is insufficient. They must all fight for the small amount available. I must express my distaste and anger at the cost of administering and processing these appeals. It is a total waste of public money and is unjustifiable, even though those attempting to administer the regulations have a difficult and thankless task which I do not envy. The total cost is £370,000—£220,000 to run the panels and tribunals and £150,000 to the Milk Marketing Board to administer any awards that may result. When that is placed against the £800,000 which was set aside for the buy-out scheme, it means that almost half of the amount which was to be paid to farmers is being spent on administrative and bureaucratic nonsense. This has been brought down on our heads by what I consider to be the worthless organisation known as the European Economic Community.

It has been brought to my attention that there are apparent discrepancies in the awards which are made to Northern Ireland farmers. If the tribunals were able to demonstrate a 100 per cent. success rate, I have no doubt that everybody would be assured that a fair allocation had been achieved, but that is not possible. Farmers come to me and say that they have been treated unfairly. There must be another way in which to look at the small number of cases where farmers believe that they have been treated unfairly. Having fought a large number of cases at tribunals, I believe that there are some cases that do not appear to have received a fair and just reward.

I welcome the continuing aid that is to be given to the pig and poultry industry. Given help, these two industries will have a chance to survive. However, I am most unhappy about the Department's attitude towards the intensive sectors of agriculture in Northern Ireland. If they put their mind to it, ways could be found by which intervention grain could be brought from Europe to Northern Ireland. Farmers could also be encouraged to grow more grain. Although we may never be self-sufficient in grain, Northern Ireland could be encouraged to become more self-sufficient than it is now. This must be one of the top priorities for the Minister. This policy would not only help the agricultural industry but would also have spin-off effects. Intensive sectors of agriculture in Northern Ireland would result in an increase in employment throughout the length and breadth of Northern Ireland.

Marketing must be improved. However, to say that marketing must be improved could be used as a very lame excuse to justify areas where marketing is bad. Although marketing must be improved, it must be improved in conjunction with proper and planned expansion. Agriculture in Northern Ireland is showing more foresight than was shown in the past. However, it must show more determination to improve. That has been lacking for a long time.

I am not very happy about the way in which the SPP has been established. It is yet another quango. The House knows my views on nominated boards and quangos in Northern Ireland. There are far too many of them. This is yet another quango. Because of my prejudices, it may be that I am being totally unfair to it. However, I should like producers to have a greater say. They must not be abused. Similarly, the SPP must not be abused by those who have been appointed as members. I ask the Minister to keep under scrutiny at all times the funds being spent by the SPP. I hope that the special land improvement scheme will ease some of the burdens, especially by means of a reduction of the farm capital grants in Northern Ireland.

The main problem of the past nine months is that we have been so involved with milk quotas that we have not paid enough attention to other equally important problems facing agriculture in Northern Ireland. For example, we have not paid enough attention to the intensive sectors or to the beef sector. Agriculture is Northern Ireland's largest and strongest industry. I hope that Ministers will work hard to ensure that it survives and flourishes.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): The guide to Supplementary Estimates for services in Northern Ireland gives a number of reasons why such Estimates may be produced.

The reasons include securing

"the authority of Parliament to use money already voted for particular purposes to meet expenditure on other services within the same vote. This is commonly done when the allocation is substantial, likely to be controversial or involves a new service. In other cases, the authority to approve reallocations of this sort . . . has been delegated to the Department of Finance and Personnel."

I can understand the need for Supplementary Estimates when there is a new service or when a matter is controversial, though what is controversial may be a matter of opinion. However, I should like an explanation of what "substantial" means. Is it substantial in relation to the sum involved, or substantial as a percentage of the sum originally allocated for a service? Given the differing sizes of the sums allocated, I cannot see that they can all be regarded as substantial.

A number of hon. Members have spoken about the problems created by the milk quota system and about the changes in farming grants. In a press notice on 12 December, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland said:

"The planning figure for Agriculture for the coming year was increased in last year's Survey to allow for local support to be maintained at a substantial level."

When one realises that the support for certain schemes has been cut by at least £13 million, one wonders what the Secretary of State meant by "a substantial level". There appears to be a considerable decrease, both in total sums and in the percentage of the public input into Northern Ireland farming.

A Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food press release said that there would be an increase in the money available for work on hedges and for other schemes. I find it difficult to believe that there will be so little extra money for that work that the overall decrease in the rest of the United Kingdom will be as small as it appears to be. I also find it difficult to understand how as much as two thirds of the decrease will be in Great Britain. I find it impossible to visualise the farming community in Great Britain being so sparse in its grant aid schemes that only £26 million or £27 million will be chopped, while in Northern Ireland we are so anxious to spend money that we lose £13 million. We need a full explanation of how that has happened.

We must look beyond farming when we consider the sums of public money that are being invested in it. The cut will mean that schemes which were reasonable to carry out at the higher rate of grant are no longer viable. We are not considering a cut in spending of £13 million but a much larger cut in public and private spending. That is bound to have a wider effect than is generally realised. When farmers undertake a drainage scheme, they buy pipes, which provides employment right back to the smelt works, and considerable amounts of gravel. All in all, schemes provide an enormous amount of labour. That trend is echoed throughout agricultural grant schemes. When the Minister considers the loss to the commercial life of Northern Ireland, he will find that it would have been better never to have made the saving. The volume of work in Northern Ireland is such that one third of the United Kingdom's savings is made there.

Land reclamation schemes have been retained in Northern Ireland when they have been wiped out in the rest of the United Kingdom. I cannot believe that the differences in agricultural practices in Northern Ireland compared with Scotland or hill areas in England and Wales are such that there is no need for the work to continue.

I cannot envisage how much worse off Northern ireland would have been if land reclamation grants had disappeared there as well. We are to lose £30 million. How much more would we have lost if the land reclamation scheme had also been wiped out? We were told that it was kept in Northern Ireland because it was essential to maintain incomes. What is the Government's thinking regarding farm incomes in Northern Ireland over the next few years? I think that the Government expect a decrease in farming incomes and that they are saying to the farming industry that it must learn to sustain itself in a much harsher economic climate. The Government talk about maintaining incomes, not increasing them. If it is necessary to maintain hill land incomes — that is besically where land reclamation work takes place—the Government are expecting a decrease in farm incomes generally.

Finally, I shall quote a passage from the MAFF press release for supplies to Northern Ireland. It states:

"The changes will come into effect immediately in respect of expenditure under the AHGS incurred after December 11, and new applications or variations under the AHDS, and variations under the FHDS, received after that date."

Is it normal that such expenditure changes should come into effect immediately under the AHG scheme, but only in respect of new applications under the other two schemes? If this is a departure from normal practice, we should be told how it will affect the schemes that farmers already have in hand. If it represents a change, why has it been introduced now?

10.10 pm

Mr. A. Cecil Walker (Belfast, North): I join my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea) in welcoming the new Minister State, the hon. Member for Brent, North (Dr. Boyson), to his first debate on Appropriation in aid for our beleaguered Province. In the short time that he has been with us, our new Minister has pursued his brief with flair, sympathy and understanding, and he has shown great readiness to come to grips with the many complex problems of his Department. My remarks in this debate will be directed to the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Patten), who has made many fact-finding visits throughout the Province. His dedication and his wide knowledge of the matters dealt with by his Department are well known.

I refer first to Class X, Vote 1. I note the Government's anxiety about unemployment in Northern Ireland, which is shared by all those who represent the Province. I support most of the measures announced in the public spending plans, and note that there has been a slight increase over expected inflation. Although that will not improve job prospects, it will at least maintain those that we have. It is regrettable that law and order expenditure has reached such proportions, but the provision of another 500 jobs in the police force is at least a consolation.

I welcome the Government's approach to the measures outlined in Class X, Vote 2, and their recognition of the fact that additional expenditure is necessary to combat the social deprivation caused by our geographical location, the civil unrest in the Province and the poverty with which we must contend. It is generally accepted that Northern Ireland is the most deprived area of the United Kingdom. As a result, families derive substantially more of their incomes from benefits, while at the same time they must pay more for food, clothing and fuel.

I am pleased about the introduction of the severe disablement allowance, which will replace non-contributory invalidity pensions, but I am disturbed by several aspects of the implementation of the criteria. I realise that there must be a test for incapacity, and I am glad that the Government have given a lead by publishing the document entitled, "Guidance in Adjudicating for Medical Practitioners", which will be available at all DHSS offices.

Nevertheless, some cases will be more complex than others, and I am worried that people who could qualify for benefit now will not qualify because they do not meet the 80 per cent. disablement test, although they may be incapable of working. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) that people who are severely incapacitated should not have to prove such incapacity from time to time to retain their right to benefit. I should have thought that where medical records showed a permanent incapacity, such persons should not be required to present themselves at tribunals, which subjects them to a painful and exhausting experience with which they are completely unable to cope.

I am glad that in section F1, of the Autumn Supplementary Estimate for 1984-85 the Government have responded to the needs of the aged for help with heating costs. I draw attention to the plight of those elderly who have homes which are difficult to heat. Many of these are large family homes which are ideal for bringing up families but which have deteriorated and fallen into disrepair after the families have grown up and moved to homes on their own. In most cases there is no alternative accommodation available to those who are left behind. These people are left to live in unsuitable houses and such grants as are available for extra heating are soon exhausted, particularly as the price of coal is £10 per tonne more than on the mainland.

In section F2, I note that there are an increasing number of claims for single payments. There are many and varied circumstances when a single payment is necessary, but, as has been said, the system can be abused. My hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) said that in many parts of Belfast there is evidence that crooked so-called business men are ripping off customers who come to them with welfare cheques issued under the single payments system. In my constituency, I have had reports of people being given substandard and secondhand articles not worth a fraction of the grant, and when people discover that the articles are not of an acceptable quality, they are told by these unscrupulous traders that their guarantee ended when they walked out of the store.

Another abuse of the system occurs where young people have applied for accommodation as a single person. On being allocated a flat, which is usually in a hard-to-let area, they immediately apply for a single payment for furniture. However, in most cases the allocation is not taken up and the recipient uses the grant for purposes other than that for which it was intended.

A matter that is worthy of consideration is the plight of prisoners' wives and families who wish to visit their relatives in prison. Most of us know that prisoners are allowed one visit per week, but close relatives can claim the cost of their journey to prison only once every four weeks. Therefore, it is distressing that the family entitlement to visit cannot be maintained where there is financial hardship, particularly among wives of ordinary, decent criminals who do not have access to, or wish to avail themselves of, paramilitary transport.

Section G deals with housing benefits. Attempts are being made to implement the system fairly for everyone who is eligible for help. The amended scheme now brings Northern Ireland generally into line with Great Britain. I note that there is now a high level of local liaison between the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and its social security counterpart. Such a liaison highlights cases where supplementary benefit could be claimed, and the fact that the persons concerned in these cases are now advised about their entitlement is a step forward in the take-up campaign.

It has been recognised that the housing benefits scheme has had a smoother introduction into Northern Ireland, with fewer problems, than in many other parts of the United Kingdom, and the Government must be commended for their efforts in this direction. However, some Housing Executive tenants, although they appear to be gaining the benefits to which they are entitled, are nevertheless forced to live in houses which either need replacing or need expensive repairs. These are the tenants of the Orlit and similar types of houses. I ask that the executive announces its timetable for dealing with such houses.

Section A covers old pensions. Even with linked increases, inflation and increased costs are substantially reducing the real value of pensions. Any Government decision to impose VAT on printed products would undoubtedly affect them, as would an increased television licence fee.

The proposal that doctors should be obliged to prescribe medicines from a restricted list worries me. Unsuitable drugs might be prescribed which could put the lives of elderly persons at risk. The proposal must give cause for alarm. I hope that the implications of the proposal for this most deserving section of our population will be examined fully.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): I shall refer to two specific matters falling within the ambit of the order and then I shall come to two constitutional issues.

I had not meant to refer to Class X, Vote 2, until I listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker). Now that I have heard him, I want to underline what he said on the subject of the attendance allowance.

The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Patten) must be beginning to detect a certain uniformity running through much of the correspondence that he receives in his capacity as being in charge of health and the social services. I find myself writing to him rather more monotonously repetitive letters on this subject than I would wish, and I am sure that someone as sensitive as the Minister is to administrative implications will long ago have arrived at the conclusion that something must be wrong somewhere.

Something is wrong when one finds so often the irresolvable conflict between the advice given by the family doctor of an applicant and the conclusions arrived at by the doctor who examines that applicant in the course of an appeal.

There is somewhere in the application or the administration of the rules for attendance allowance a deficiency which is subjecting applicants to a great deal of harassment in the cases where they are ultimately successful—there are some of those—and is denying to other applicants the assistance to which they and their families were always intended to be entitled. I hope the Minister will say that he intends to clear the board and address himself afresh to the administration of the scheme to find where the gremlin in it is.

Included in the matters falling under Class I, Vote 2, is the "improvement of livestock" and the "control of diseases". It is in that connection that I draw attention once again to the control of veterinary medical products because —and I quote the submission made to me by the Ulster Farmers' Union—

"it is a matter of concern to our own producers that certain materials in this field are under strict control in Northern Ireland, but not of in the Republic . . . the bona fide trade . . . is . . . disquited about the traffic in medicinal products which is apparently going on from the Republic to the Province."

It is not seriously disputed that the application of existing EEC rules in this respect leaves much to be desired on the other side of the frontier but is accurately observed in the United Kingdom. I tabled a question in October in which I asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what he was doing about that. I have abbreviated the terms of the question, but the Minister's reply was even briefer. He said:

"This is a matter for the European Commission, and we have written to the commission about it."—[Official Report, 31 October 1984; Vol. 65, c. 1114.]

That is not the sort of reply which most of our constituents would long tolerate about a grievance which they had put before us. It is not good enough for the Minister to have written to the Commission about it, if he has left it there. Therefore, I hope that when the Minister replies he will be able to confirm that that matter is being directly and actively pursued with the Commission with a view to bringing into line the country which lies across the border from Northern Ireland.

One of the main topics in this debate has been the working out of the milk quota scheme. Whatever else can be said about it—there is not much that is favourable—it is certain that it has caused an enormous amount of irritation, misunderstanding, disquiet and sense of injustice. How the scheme was going to work, how it was going to be applied, what the meaning was of the various assurances that had been given from stage to stage, remained obscure and in some cases remains obscure to this moment.

It occurred to me to investigate why it was that a scheme which affected the whole farming industry in the United Kingdom, and which affected differentially the farming industry in Northern Ireland, should still remain in such confusion and obscurity for nine months after its introduction. The reason is not far to seek, and it should not be far to seek, above all, here in the House.

The seeker after enlightenment on the working of the milk quota scheme requires to deal with three fundamental documents. They are all EEC regulations. The first is regulation 804 of 1968. The second is regulation 856 of 1984. The third is regulation 857 of 1984. By a careful reading of those three documents one can, at first dimly and then with increasing clarity perceive the outlines and the underlying principles—which are even, arguably, in some respects rational—of the milk quota scheme.

They are a remarkable collection of documents. Regulation 804 of 1968 set out, as I have said, the principles. In our language it would be called the principal Act—it is the CAP for milk—I am sure that that is an unofficial description—and it is constantly referred to in the documents which immediately impinge upon the farming industry in Northern Ireland and which repeatedly refer to paragraph 5 of the principal regulations—to the bewilderment at first of the student who finds no resemblance between article 5 of that regulation and what is being talked about. What has escaped his notice is that regulation 856 of 1984 virtually rewrote, or wrote a whole new regulation into, article 5 of the principal regulations of 1968. On that article as amended was built the trigger regulation 857.

One fact which is common to all those regulations is that they are Community legislation directly applicable in the member states. Each of them is directly applicable — the CAP regulation, the amendment of the CAP regulation, and then the inauguration of the milk quota scheme — it is all legislation made in Brussels which automatically takes effect in this country.

It seems self-evident that such legislation when it reaches into the very lives and farms of individuals in the Province will not be understood—that is almost to say, it simply will not be accepted — until it has been properly and publicly debated in this country. There is one sovereign way — that is not intended as a pun — of getting such matters properly understood and debated. That is to bring them before the House. But because of the EEC's legislative procedures, all that was involved in the milk quota scheme—how it would work, how it would impinge on individual farms — how the quotas were assesed and how the levy was to be drawn—was never thrashed out on this side of the English channel. The matter was never thrashed out, and, therefore, never properly understood, let alone accepted, because it did not have to come before the House. It did not even have to go before a Scrutiny Committee.

It is for another debate to declaim against the directly applicable legislation of the EEC. Suffice it to say tonight that we and the dairy farmers of the whole United Kingdom, and especially of Northern Ireland, have learnt by an object lesson just what it means to be legislated for by a foreign body which imposes its decisions, in effect, by decree.

I turn to another constitutional matter—one that it is within the Government's power to deal with. We are given to understand that the Government are in some difficulty over their programme for the current Session. That has been brought to our attention by the unprecedentedly early date at which we are to terminate our Christmas holidays and return from all the oceans and continents of the world to resume our deliberations on Wednesday 9 January. The Government are short of time — the very predicament most feared and dreaded by all Governments, particularly by all Government business managers. Yet in every Session three whole days in effect are devoted by the House to the business of appropriation orders such as that which has claimed our attention since about 7.30 pm tonight—there is still another hour to go, if we can find the means to apply Parkinson's law. One might think that some useful or necessary purpose was served by such orders. Those hon. Members who are anxiously wondering how soon the Division will be must naturally assume from the fact that they are about to be marched through the Lobbies that those parliamentary days are being used for some practical—I do not say "good", as I put the matter more modestly—purpose. Not at all.

It is not in order to provide these sums for expenditure in Northern Ireland that such orders are brought before the House. The sums eventually come out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom anyhow and would continue to do so, subject to the decisions of the House, even if these orders were heard of no more. Nor are these orders brought before the House to give Northern Ireland Members an opportunity to air their constituents' grievances on major matters of public concern. If they were, that would be a signal and peculiar instance of generosity towards Northern Ireland and its people on the part of those who sit in the seats of power. Not so: if this order was not taken tonight and if this procedure was disused, my hon. Friends and I would still be raising exactly the same subjects, perhaps with a little more concision and thereby a little more force, in the debate which is to be held on Wednesday.

No, Sir; the only effect and purpose of this expenditure of parliamentary time and effort on appropriation orders for Northern Ireland is to preserve an ancient absurdity —the Consolidated Fund of Northern Ireland. This is a "Consolidated Fund of Northern Ireland Preservation Order." That is what it is about.

Since the Consolidated Fund of Northern Ireland performs no ascertainable financial function, being only a receptacle into which money is poured in order that it may be poured out again, hon. Members may still be inquisitive to know why the Government attach so much importance to preserving this ancient and fatuous institution that they will spend three good days of parliamentary time per Session in preserving it. And, indeed, hope is growing that the Government are approaching the time when they will no longer wish to preserve the Consolidated Fund of Northern Ireland.

The original purpose of conserving the fund, with which this pantomime started some 12 years ago, was that Northern Ireland might, as far as possible, be a separable entity which could be floated off in the direction of an all-Ireland state. It was to render it essentially self-contained and separable that it was given the same sort of distinct Consolidated Fund and financial organisation as a self-governing dominion, in the hope that one day it would take itself off and go somewhere else.

That motive was disposed of with striking and beneficent clarity by the Prime Minister during and following the recent conference at Chequers. We know now, in a way that we did not previously know, that that is not the Government's intention.

Perhaps it might be said that Her Majesty's Government are still anxious to provide Northern Ireland with another Stormont — Stormont back again with Stormont's Consolidated Fund.

Mr. Chris Patten indicated assent.

Mr. Powell: The Under-Secretary of State, clutching at a straw, thought just now that he heard something in my discourse with which he could safely be seen to be agreeing. I suppose that the Minister "indicates assent" will duly appear tomorrow in the appropriate column of Hansard.

That is also out of date, however, because the new Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has been brutally candid. With brutal candour he has explained the terms upon which—and upon which alone—administration or legislation will be devolved to the Province. They are conditions upon which there is no prospect of a devolved constitution being accepted or worked; and I do not think that the Secretary of State or Her Majesty's Government generally—if for such a purpose one can take them as a generality—are so stupid as to suppose otherwise.

So at last we have worked through to a time when the House can, without any loss whatsoever, be deprived of this tri-annual entertainment, a time when the business managers of the House can gain three days, a time when it is no longer thought necessary for any purpose — attainable or unattainable—to preserve the Consolidated Fund of Northern Ireland.

My hon. Friends and I, in expectation of that day and by way of giving, to this Government so far as is in our power, a gentle nudge from time to time in that direction, have made a habit in the last two years of marking our disapprobation of the motives behind this legislation, by voting against it. After all that, it should not come as any surprise either to the Whips or to the Ministers, to hear that we intend to do likewise tonight.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) referred to our proceedings as a triennial entertainment and as a pantomime. As the festive season is approaching, I prefer the description of a pantomime. Like the Minister of State, I have spent some time reading in the Hansard the record of the debates on Appropriation orders. Having read them, I was surprised that such dehydrated topics as milk quotas, levies, outgoers schemes, and the quality of beef cattle production could be so interesting and scintillating. I shall seek to make equally cogent arguments on the same manifold subjects, although I doubt that I can match the level of articulation of other hon. Members.

Class I, Vote 1, of the supplementary Estimates spell out clearly the nature of the supplement as it relates to agriculture. Class I covers the administrative cost of the new milk quota arrangements and the compensation scheme for farmers who want to give up milk production, thus releasing quotas for reallocation.

The hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) drew the attention of the House to the considerable bitterness about the quota arrangements in Northern Ireland. He declared that the jewel of our Northern Ireland industry had been kicked into the gutter. I originally thought that that was a mixed metaphor, but the industry would not be the worse for that—in fact, it was an accurate description of how some of the farmers feel about the quota arrangement, reallocations and penalties.

The reason for the bitterness was that the Government had announced that the first instalment of the levy on farmers who had exceeded their quota must be paid, notwithstanding that the European Commission had said that four member states had not implemented the regulations. The Minister was kind enough to tell the House that while the Government were fully committed to the mutual supplementary levy agreed by the Agriculture Council in March, Belgium, the Netherlands, the Republic of Ireland and the Federal Republic of Germany had decided not to pay any levy because there appeared to be a confusion over the interpretation the rules. Only West Germany has collected some portion of the levy. It was a timely intervention that may assist in alleviating some of the bitterness felt by the farmers in Northern Ireland.

The Minister also took the opportunity to tell the House that he had sympathy with farmers who were attempting to make unwelcome and difficult adjustments. One additional source of bitterness is that no levy will be payable in Britain because of the summer drought that resulted in a drop in milk production. Production also fell in Northern Ireland—down 6 per cent. since April—but total production will still exceed the quota and up to 5,000 farmers will face the levy payments. The Ulster Farmers Union has claimed that individual payments could be as much as £20,000. The average will probably be more like £1,000 per farmer. The Government have estimated that about 2,000 farmers will exceed their quota.

The Northern Ireland farmers are bitter about the Government's decision to collect the payments—they may now be held in abeyance—because they feel that they never received the 65,000 tonne special allocation granted by the EEC specifically for Northern Ireland. That was referred to by several hon. Members. They believe that the special quota was subsumed into the special quota allocated to the United Kingdom overall. This issue was touched upon by the hon. Member for Antrim, North. I shall not attempt to untangle the entangled questions of milk quotas and levies as expressed and interpreted by the European Community and its Agriculture Council. Grievances may be perceived as well as being real; and I am sure that the Under-Secretary of State will wish to take an early opportunity to elucidate the true facts.

The Minister of State has said that 3,430 producers have applied for special treatment as hardship cases and that the claims are still being evaluated. In the meantime, producers who regard themselves as eligible for special treatment do not know whether they will find themselves in excess of the quota. The Minister has said that decisions have been taken in 1,788 cases and that provisional awards have been made in 540. He explained that the remainder would be dealt with over the next few weeks.

There is considerable confusion over the nature of the quota and whether it will be a salable asset. I understand that 595 farmers in Northern Ireland have applied to stop milk production and that the Government have said that all valid applications will be accepted. The 595 applications will yield 53·3 million litres.

In Class X of schedule 1 the sums to be paid out by way of expenditure by the Department of Health and Social Services on important items such as old-age pensions, attendance allowances and non-contributory pensions amount to £26·118 million. That figure must be seen against the overall background of social security in Northern Ireland. According to information provided by the Confederation of Health Service Employees in Belfast, social security statistics on the payments of sickness benefit, invalidity benefit and non-contributory invalidity pension show a level of demand in Northern Ireland that is 66 per cent. above that in Great Britain.

According to the same source, the incidence of severe disablement or incapacity based on attendance allowance statistics for Northern Ireland is 35 per cent. above the figure for Great Britain. There are higher birth rates and levels of infant mortality and handicap in Northern Ireland than elsewhere in Great Britain. There is a higher incidence of mental handicap. The level of new outpatients seen in Northern Ireland in 1982 was 51 per cent. higher than the comparable Great Britain figure. There is also a higher incidence of congenital abnormality and in 1981 deaths from this cause were 16 per cent. higher than those in England.

We welcome the fact that under the Health and Social Security (Northern Ireland) Order 1984, severe disablement allowance will replace the non-contributory invalidity pension. We welcome equally the fact that the severe disablement allowance—the SDA—is for those who cannot work because of long-term sickness or disability and who have not paid enough national insurance contributions to qualify for contributory sickness benefit. It is to be welcomed that it is not means tested and is tax-free.

The Minister of State rightly said that the Supplementary Estimate of £26·12 million represents an increase of 6·3 per cent. on the original provision and declared that the largest increase sought is for supplementary benefit. We welcome, too, the reasons for the increase, which is a reduction from 70 to 65 years of age as the upper qualifying age for related heating additions and the introduction of a new, higher age-related rate. The Minister referred to an addition of £7·8 million for housing benefits. The reason for this additional supply is the increase in the number of eligible claimants and the increase in average weekly rebates and allowances.

The House has heard several criticisms of the housing benefit scheme. The hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea) pertinently asked how the housing benefits points system is working. He declared that rents were being increased again. We note that under Class X the increase to cover rent rebates, rent allowances and rates rebates is the net result of a rise in the number of eligible claimants, and that this has been partly offset by changes in the housing benefit scheme, which has reduced the extent of the assistance.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State will be well aware of the fact that the impact of the housing benefits scheme in Northern Ireland has given rise to some anxiety and criticism from hon. Members with Northern Ireland constituencies. Allegations are made that, because the scheme's administration is shared between the Department of the Environment, the DHSS and the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, there are serious cases of administrative failure. People feel that the housing benefits scheme has been based on a novel principle—robbing one set of claimants to pay another. It is therefore not surprising that the housing benefits scheme was rejected by all political parties when it was proposed for Northern Ireland. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State took that aspect into account when he gave a clear undertaking to the Northern Ireland Assembly that no supplementary benefits claimant would be worse off because of this reform. We trust that that will be the case.

We have had an inseresting and long debate. It has been well attended, in the way such debates are, by those hon. Members who have listened to most of the speeches. The Labour Opposition support the order. We accept and understand the principle put forward by the right hon. Member for South Down, who wishes to make a constitutional point about the Appropriation order. The Labour Opposition believe in public expenditure as a principle. We believe that it helps to alleviate distress and that the appropriation order will assist those recipients of non-contributory benefits. We welcome the fact that more people will receive the severe disablement allowance than received the non-contributory invalidity pension. We welcome the £800,000 for attendance allowance, although we take on board the criticisms that have been made. We welcome the fact that married women can claim the disablement disallowance, even if they are about to carry out normal household duties.

We accept that there is confusion about the milk quotas and take on board the point made by the right hon. Member for South Down about Common Market legislation. The right hon. Gentleman said that these matters are decided elsewhere and give rise to different interpretations throughout the Common Market because we deal with many different nationalities, languages and technical matters that are difficult to grasp. We accept the new input into agriculture and understand the importance of agriculture to the economy of Northern Ireland. Every help should be given, and the Supplementary Estimates go some way towards giving that help.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Chris Patten): I believe I am right in saying that I have enjoyed the privilege of responding to every debate on Northern Ireland Appropriation orders since the last general election. I suppose that if I am particularly fortunate I shall be able to notch up the dubious record of replying to every Appropriation order debate during the entire Parliament. I realise that, for constitutional reasons at least, the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) would not be too pleased with that idea, but that question is, of course, not entirely in my hands.

I welcome, as I am sure do all hon. Members, the hon. Member for Middlesborough (Mr. Bell) to our debates. I am sure that he will learn to enjoy them as much as the rest of us do. As on all these occasions, we have had a good and lively debate, which has ranged to the furthest limits of the order. The order is more limited in scope than some that we have considered in the past, but, nevertheless, the debate has covered a wide variety of subjects. I shall try, once again, to respond as adequately as I can to the main points raised. As usual, when I cannot cover a point today, or if I inadvertently pass one by in the night, I shall try to ensure that the hon. Member concerned receives a suitable reply as soon as possible from me or from one of my right hon. and hon. Friends.

A number of hon. Members have referred to social security. I shall make one or two general remarks about the Government's record on social security benefits in Northern Ireland, in view of what the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Walker) said in his customarily well-informed speech.

We shall spend about £1·2 billion on social security benefits in the current year. As the House is aware, it is our policy to maintain parity with Great Britain in the rates and procedures applying for those wide-ranging benefits, and I believe that that policy has served Northern Ireland well.

At the same time, when we introduced housing benefits, which the hon. Member for Middlesbrough mentioned, in November 1983, which was a benefit system which allowed some measure of local discretion within the national framework, I was able to provide some local enhancement of the scheme; for example, a more generous transitional protection against losses, the inclusion of water charges within rate rebates and allowances and, for the time being, more generous needs allowance for children. We were also able to tailor the administration of benefits to local circumstances. Northern Ireland has a more localised network of offices than elsewhere in the United Kingdom, and uniquely unemployment and supplementary benefits are delivered from the same local office.

The take-up of benefit in the Province already compares favourably with that in Great Britain, and is demonstrably higher in some cases. We have run some successful media campaigns in relation to particular benefits. More can and should be done. I have recently announced an extension throughout the Province of the information and advice service, which was successfully piloted in some of my Department's local social security offices.

Over the next year each local office will provide a separate advice point at which members of the public can obtain information about the range of benefits available. We are also introducing a freephone service for those who cannot easily visit their local offices.

These developments have been welcomed by many local representatives and have been commented upon favourably by the Social Security Advisory Committee, whose close interest in Northern Ireland I greatly appreciate.

In these ways, and assisted by a flourishing welfare rights movement in the Province—a point to which I shall return in the context of the remarks of the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker)—we are doing everything that we can to ensure that benefits reach everyone entitled to them. These efforts depend heavily upon the splendid and dedicated staff administering benefits in our local and central offices. I am pleased that hon. Members from Northern Ireland have often paid deserved tribute to their work.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann mentioned three matters on the social security Vote. I agree with him and the right hon. Member for South Down that attendance allowance is an extremely valuable benefit in that it can make the difference between an elderly or disabled person staying at home and having to be admitted to hospital. The view of the claimant's general practitioner is taken into account by the examining doctor, who must be satisfied that the conditions attaching to the allowance are met.

I accept the point made by the right hon. Gentleman about the administration of attendance allowance, on which, as he said, we have had a good deal of corresponsdence. I have had a good deal of correspondence on the subject with every hon. Member representing the Province. I am therefore prepared to consider further how the allowance is administered. I shall do so against the background of the Oglesby report, which reviewed the procedures for that and other benefits in Great Britain. I shall also consult the Attendance Allowance Board, which plays an important part in administering the scheme. If there are any gremlins still left in the system, as the right hon. Gentleman suggested there may be, I want to remove or perhaps exorcise them as rapidly as possible.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann will appreciate that I cannot readily deal on the Floor of the House with the case of his constituent who was denied higher rate heating addition. He will be aware that his constituent could take the matter to an appeal tribunal, or the hon. Member may wish to raise the case with me first for further examination.

The hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Belfast, North referred to single payments under the supplementary benefits scheme. This is a subject about which I have learned an increasing amount as I have visited social security offices throughout the Province. As was said, the number of single payment awards has grown significantly in recent years—from 77,000 in 1982, to 126,000 in 1983, and, I estimate, to upwards of 200,000 in 1984. Expenditure in 1984 will be more than £20 million.

Although from time to time allegations are voiced about abuse of single payments, we have no evidence that this is a major problem. Clearly there is scope for abuse, but the Department of Health and Social Services does all that it can to prevent it. Home visits are made in most cases, and Girocheques are made payable to suppliers rather than to claimants where large sums are involved.

It is fair to say that one of the main reasons for the surge in single payments is the development of a thriving welfare rights movement, which I welcome. I intend to give support to that movement through a grant to a regional welfare rights resource centre. It is also fair to say that the single payments aspect of the supplementary benefits scheme is being given particular attention by my hon. Friend, who is leading the review of the scheme. I should not be surprised—I do not put the point any more strongly, and I have no inside information at this stage—if we saw changes proposed in this aspect of supplementary benefit.

Meanwhile, I assure the House, and the hon. Member for Upper Bann in particular, that we shall do everything possible both to encourage full take-up of all the benefits to which claimants are entitled and to check against abuse.

Mr. McCusker: Will the Minister say more about this group to which he intends to offer financial assistance? Who has selected it, and what justification is there for giving it public funds?

Mr. Patten: The justification is the belief, which I hold strongly—I should be surprised if I did not share it with hon. Members—that we should do everything that we can to encourage the take-up of benefits to which people are statutorily entitled. That should involve work by my Department, particularly by local social security offices, and by the voluntary sector. That has already helped considerably; for example, through the action for community employment scheme.

I want to make sure that, wherever possible, the voluntary sector works with the statutory sector to encourage take-up. That is why we have been discussing with the Belfast law centre how we can best help provide a resource centre and training for local welfare rights groups which are legitimately involved. There are a large number of local groups which at present are helped by district councils and through the ACE scheme and in other ways. I assure hon. Members that the provision of more training and advice centrally should enable us to have a more sensible take-up scheme throughout the Province.

When I hear hon. Members properly talk about constituents who are not getting the benefits to which they are entitled, I think that there is an obligation on us, through our local social security offices and through the voluntary sector, to do all that we can to make people aware of the things they are entitled to receive.

Mr. Maginnis: Is the Minister not undermining the democratic process by encouraging voluntary groups of this sort and giving them almost statutory recognition? Can he assure us that a group such as this will be monitored in a way that will ensure that it is not exploited by organisations such as Sinn Fein—[Interruption.] I fear that it may be. Will the hon. Gentleman assure us that the members of this voluntary welfare group will be made known to those who have an electoral responsibility within the community?

Mr. Patten: The answer to the first substantive question of the hon. Gentleman is no. The answer to his second substantive question is yes. We are not talking about my Department giving grants to local groups but about giving funds to an organisation that is already heavily involved in helping local welfare rights activities. I have noted the point that the hon. Gentleman has made; it would be idiotic if we had not already done so. A great deal of this work has been carried on for some time with the Belfast Law Centre. We are discussing how it can help further.

Mr. Bell: Can I point out to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State that, while one understands the views which have been put forward tonight, we welcome the statement he has made that all those who ought to have benefit and who are entitled to benefit should be encouraged to have it and assure him that any steps that he may take in that direction will be warmly welcomed by us?

Mr. Patten: I am grateful to the hon. Member for his message of support. When hon. Members in other parts of the House note what is already happening and note also our intention to work closely with the voluntary sector to improve the quality of the advice that is provided, I hope that support in the House will be rather more widespread than it is now. The hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) asked a number of questions about social security and the expenditure covered by the Appropriation order. He referred initially to the Department of Health and Social Services and asked why we had not put in a shortfall bid for telephones for the housebound. Because shortfall money is available only for spending in the year in which it arises and because the expenditure on telephones which the hon. Member has in mind would be a recurring commitment for the health boards, it could not be covered in the way he suggested. The boards have been doing a great deal of work but they have to live within their budgets.

Hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, asked questions about the housing benefit scheme. It is fair to say that the reformed scheme, to some of whose enhancements I referred earlier, has been operating reasonably satisfactorily in Northern Ireland. We have managed to avoid some of the problems that existed on this side of the water. However, reviews of the schemes are being undertaken in Northern Ireland as well as in Great Britain, mainly because of difficulties in Great Britain and concern about the rising cost of housing benefit. In the light of the reviews we expect to be able to publish proposals for change in the new year.

Hon. Members referred to the available scale margin. This is the amount deducted from certain additional requirements of claimants on the long-term rate of supplementary benefit. It was first introduced in 1966. It was intended to reflect the fact that the long term scale rate should cover nearly all additional needs, amounting at that time to 45p, the difference between the long term and the short term rates. Although the difference is now £7·65, the available scale margin remained at 50p, having been increased to that amount in 1968. To allow the previous relationship between the available scale margin and heating additions to remain unchanged would have resulted in the continuation of an increasingly anomalous situation. The Government therefore decided that it was reasonable to increase the margin to £1 and to apply it again to heating additions, which were originally within its scope.

In response to the hon. Member for Belfast, North in particular, I stress that no pensioner has suffered an overall reduction in income as a result of the change and that, for the first time, supplementary heating additions of £2·10 p.w. week are automatically payable to householders aged 65 to 70. Householders over 70 already qualify. Furthermore, the higher rate addition of £5·20 per week is now given to pensioners aged 85 or over.

Rev. Martin Smyth: The hon. Gentleman said that pensioners over 70 qualify automatically and that no pensioner has suffered a loss as a result of the change. I have written to the hon. Gentleman giving him details of a case were that has happened.

Mr. Patten: I shall look into that case and reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as I can.

The hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea) mentioned rents. I am not sure whether it would be in order for me to dwell on that subject, but I think that the proposed increase of 4 per cent. for the coming year is not unreasonable. The hon. Gentleman referred to comparisons with the position in England, Wales and Scotland. I shall be delighted to give him the figures and, if necessary, to discuss the comparisons with him.

I assure the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster that there is no part of Northern Ireland in which the writ of the DHSS does not run. About 60 fraud investigation staff are doing sterling work throughout the Province, checking overtly and covertly on abuse and fraud. I shall be glad to supply the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members with figures of prosecutions, which are quite impressive. I have met members of the fraud investigations staff to pay my personal tribute to their work, which is often done in particularly difficult circumstances.

As hon. Members know, my remit in Northern Ireland Departments runs fairly wide, but I am sure that it is a relief to all concerned that it does not cover agriculture, though I have been called on to say a word or two on the subject from time to time. As the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Nicholson) will confirm, I am all too conscious of my limitations in dealing with the subject.

I appreciate that hon. Members have serious worries about agriculture. Many have been expressed by the hon. Members for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley), who is chairman of the Assembly Committee, for Mid-Ulster, for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) and for Newry and Armagh and by the right hon. Member for South Down, though he touched principally on some of the constitutional aspects.

I shall not deal with all the detailed points raised, because I prefer to mention three major issues. Naturally, I shall draw the attention of my noble Friend the Under-Secretary to the vigorous speeches made in the debate, and I know that he will respond to them as quickly as he can.

With reference to the payment of the milk levy, my hon. Friend the Minister of State quoted a written answer given today by the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. I do not think that I can shed any further light on that. I gather from hon. Members that they thought that that had clarified the matter a little.

There is the question of the regional allocation of the milk quota, which I enjoyed debating with the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh on a memorable evening earlier this year. When my hon. Friend the Minister of State introduced the debate, he made it abundantly clear that he has great sympathy, as we all do, with Ulster milk producers. I should like to associate myself with those remarks. Nevertheless, Northern Ireland has received the full benefit of the 65,000 tonnes from the Community reserve, and an additional amount from the United Kingdom total. As a result, the percentage amount by which the Northern Ireland quota was less than 1983 deliveries will be no more than in other regions of the United Kingdom, although deliveries of milk in Northern Ireland have increased proportionately more between 1981 and 1983 than deliveries in England and Wales. My noble Friend is aware of the need to ensure that we again receive the 65,000 tonnes for 1985-86 in the price fixing round which is about to begin in Brussels.

The hon. Member for Mid-Ulster asked whether the reserve was sufficient to meet the needs of those producers. More than 3,800 farmers—almost half of all milk producers in Northern Ireland—submitted special case claims. The local panels have many cases remaining to be considered, including some from producers complaining against the Department's decision to reject cases which, in the Department's opinion, did not fulfil the criteria.

In addition, the tribunal received about 750 appeals from producers against provisional awards made by the local panels. Further appeals are expected. There is, therefore, some way to go before all cases are finalised. I cannot give a categoric response about the reserve question, as hon. Gentlemen understand. However, indications are that it will probably be necessary to scale down substantially the awards to these producers who have claimed secondary quotas and who meet development plans.

The subject of agriculture capital grants was also raised, especially by the hon. Members for Antrim, North and for Newry and Armagh. I appreciate that at first glance it must look strange and unfair that a province which provides only 6 per cent. of the United Kingdom's agriculture production should produce 33 per cent. of the cuts. However, that is not so surprising as a large proportion of any general reduction in grant rates was bound to fall on Northern Ireland, as more than one third of the United Kingdom's capital grant expenditure of this type is incurred in the Province. If a large share of the money goes to Northern Ireland, it is inevitable that a large share of the cuts will fall on the Province.

However, there is some good news for farmers. Because of the rather different needs in Northern Ireland—this touches on a point raised by the hon. Member for Londonderry, East—for a balance between conservation and agriculture, the Government have agreed that while grant rates for land reclamation will be reduced in the rest of the United Kingdom, they will not be reduced in Northern Ireland.

The right hon. Member for South Down asked about the control of veterinary products in the Republic. The proper handling and control of veterinary medicines in the European Community is essential for human and animal health. I therefore accept that we should continue to ensure that all concerned are alive to the need for agreed Community-wide measures. I undertake to draw the attention of my noble Friend to the right hon. Gentleman's remarks.

Finally, the right hon. Member for South Down made a point, in a particularly engaging style, which he has made on previous occasions, and to which I have replied. I doubt whether he will find my reply on this occasion any more convincing than he has found it previously. The arrangements that were criticised by the right hon. Gentleman are not new. As he conceded, Northern Ireland has had separate legislation and a separate Consolidated Fund for more than 60 years. There is no secret or hidden reason why the Government persist with the arrangements. We believe that a devolved Government would best meet the special needs of Northern Ireland's divided community, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is encouraging the political parties to work out mutually acceptable arrangements to that end. The right hon. Gentleman has reservations about that policy, but the Government, with the support of Parliament, are seeking to do that. In that light, the financial and legislative arrangements for Northern Ireland are appropriate and sensible.

I hope that I have dealt with most of the main points raised during the debate. If not, I repeat that I shall respond by letter as soon as possible. I have only one task remaining, which is to commend the order to the House. I am only sorry that, once again, we shall not enjoy the company in the Division Lobby of the right hon. Member for South Down and his disapproving colleagues.

House of Commons Members' Fund

11.32 pm

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): I beg to move,

That the whole or any part of the sums deducted or set aside in the current year from the salaries of Members of Parliament under section 1 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1939, and the whole or any part of the contribution determined by the Treasury for the current year under section 1 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1957, as amended by the House of Commons Members' Fund and Parliamentary Pensions Act 1981, be appropriated for the purposes of section 4 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1948, as amended by section 12 of the Parliamentary Pensions etc Act 1984.

It will probably be convenient to discuss with it the second motion,

That in pursuance of the provisions of section 3 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1948 and of section 2 of the House of Commons Members' Fund and Parliamentary Pensions Act 1981 the maximum annual amounts of the periodical payments which may be made out of the House of Commons Members' Fund under the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1939, as amended and the annual rate of any payments made under section 1 of the said Act of 1981 shall be varied as from 1st December 1984 as follows:

(a) for paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 to the said Act of 1939, as amended, there shall be substituted the following paragraph:

1. The annual amount of any periodical payment made to any person by virtue of his past membership of the House of Commons shall not exceed £2,199 or such sum as, in the opinion of the trustees, will bring his income up to £4,067 per annum whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to length of service and need, the trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £4,245 or such sum as, in their opinion, will bring his income up to £6,113 per annum whichever is the less:

(b) for paragraph 2 of that Schedule there shall be substituted the following paragraph:

2. The annual amount of any periodical payment to any person by virtue of her being a widow of a past Member of the House of Commons shall not exceed £1,101 or such sum as, in the opinion of the trustees, will bring her income up to £2,969 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to her husband's length of service or to her need, the trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £2,118 or such sum as, in the opinion of the trustees, will bring her income up to £3,986 per annum, whichever is the less:

(c) in paragraph 2A of that Schedule for the words 'the annual amount of any periodical payment' to the end of the paragraph, there shall be substituted the words:

'the annual amount of any periodical payment made to any such widower shall not exceed £1,101 or such sum as, in the opinion of the trustees, will bring his income up to £2,969 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to his wife's length of service or to his needs the trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £2,118 or such sum as, in the opinion of the trustees, will bring his income up to £3,986 per annum, whichever is the less:

(d) in section 2(1) of the said Act of 1981, for the words from the beginning to the end of paragraph (b) there shall be substituted the words:

'the annual rate of any payments made under section 1 shall be—

(a) £1,282 if the payments are made to a past Member; and

(b) £641 if the payments are made to the widow or widower of a past Member'.

The motions stand in my name and those of hon. Members on both sides of the House who share with me, as trustees, the responsibility of administering the House of Commons Members' Fund.

Right hon. and hon. Members enjoy today pension rights under the Parliamentary Contributory Pension Fund, but, as the House knows, this has not always been so. Our colleagues who left the House before 1964 have no pensions in respect of their service in the House, and many now live in considerably reduced and often straitened circumstances. This applies especially to former Members who are now of advanced years and, even more so, to many widows and widowers. The Members' Fund has existed since 1939 to provide assistance to former Members an their dependants, but the help which my fellow trustees and I are able to provide from the Members' Fund is modest in the extreme. We are deeply conscious of the need to improve their position and are giving urgent consideration to what steps might be taken to make this possible.

A further problem is that the needs of our former colleagues, and of widows or widowers, is not always known to us. I shall be most grateful, therefore, if hon. Members will let me know, as chairman of the trustees, of any case of which they become aware of a former Member or his or her dependants who are in need of help. I strongly urge any hon. Member who knows of a case of hardship to let us see if we can help.

In the meantime, we are now increasing the present levels of grants and payments which may be made under the Members' Fund legislation in line with recent increases approved for public service and national insurance retirement pensions. This is the purpose of the motions. I hope that they will receive the unanimous support of the House, for I can assure right hon. and hon. Members that the experience of the trustees has made us realise how much further provision is needed and also how very much it will be welcomed by those who will benefit.

I need not detain the House at length in moving the motions, since the provisions for which we seek approval are set out in detail in the motions on the Order Paper. Paragraph 1*(a)* sets out the new provisions for grants to ex-Members. At present, the Trustees are authorised to make grants to ex-Members of up to £2,091, provided that the total income of the applicant, including the grant, does not exceed £3,868. The grant is now raised to £2,199, and the income limit goes up to £4,067. To that is added the provision by which the trustees will be authorised to make larger payments, having due regard to length of service and need, of a grant of up to £4,245 provided that the income of the applicant, together with the grant, does not exceed £6,113.

Grants to widows are set out under paragraph (b). At present the grant to a widow of an ex-Member is £1,047 provided that her income, including the grant, does not exceed £2,824. That grant is raised to £1,101 and the income limit goes to £2,969. There follows the provision by which, having regard to her husband's length of service, or to need, the trustees will be enabled to make grants of up to £2,118 provided that the widow's income with the grant does not exceed £3,986.

Grants to widowers are set out under paragraph (c). The provisions here are similar to those for widows under paragraph (b). In subparagraph (d) we refer to the "as of right" payments from the Members' Fund to former Members who had 10 years' service before October 1964, and to widows and widowers of such Members, provided for by the House of Commons Members' fund and Parliamentary Pensions Act 1981, which came into force on 19 March 1981. That provision seeks to increase the payments, at present at the rate of £1,218 per annum to former Members, to £1,282 per annum, and the payments to widows or widowers from £609 per annum to £641 per annum.

Those new provisions will all be retrospectively effective from 1 December 1984. They provide for increases of approximately 5·1 per cent. across the board, in line with the provisions contained in the Pensions Increase (Review) Order 1984. The additional expenditure arising is £7,200.

It is impossible on this occasion for us not to be reminded of the tragic loss of the late Member for Enfield, Southgate, who so cruelly lost his life two months ago. Sir Anthony Berry was appointed by this House as a trustee of the Members' fund in July last year and at once played a full and active part in all our work. He was most anxious to ensure that everything possible was done to help his former colleagues. He had a most genuine and humane concern for everyone who needed the help we could give. We honour his memory and shall sorely miss him.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) on moving the motion. I am sure that the House will welcome the fact that the Committee in its wisdom has decided to look after the interests of former Members and their widows and widowers who find themselves in pecuniary circumstances not of their own making. I sincerely hope that the House will join with the right hon. Gentleman and pass the resolution unanimously.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the whole or any part of the sums deducted or set aside in the current year from the salaries of Members of Parliament under section 1 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1939, and the whole or any part of the contribution determined by the Treasury for the current year under section 1 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1957, as amended by the House of Commons Members' Fund and Parliamentary Pensions Act 1981, be appropriated for the purposes of section 4 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1948, as amended by section 12 of the Parliamentary Pensions etc. Act 1984.

HOUSE OF COMMONS MEMBERS' FUND

Resolved,

That in pursuance of the provisions of section 3 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1948 and of section 2 of the House of Commons Members' Fund and Parliamentary Pensions Act 1981 the maximum annual amounts of the periodical payments which may be made out of the House of Commons Members' Fund under the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1939, as amended and the annual rate of any payments made under section 1 of the said Act of 1981 shall be varied as from 1st December 1984 as follows:

(a) for paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 to the said Act of 1939, as amended, there shall be substituted the following paragraph:

1. The annual amount of any periodical payment made to any person by virtue of his past membership of the House of Commons shall not exceed £2,199 or such sum as, in the opinion of the trustees, will bring his income up to £4,067 per annum whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to length of service and need, the trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £4,245 or such sum as, in their opinion, will bring his income up to £6,113 per annum whichever is the less:

(b) for paragraph 2 of that Schedule there shall be substituted the following paragraph:

2. The annual amount of any periodical payment to any person by virtue of her being a widow of a past Member of the House of Commons shall not exceed £1,101 or such sum as, in the opinion of the trustees, will bring her income up to £2,969 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to her husband's length of service or to her need, the trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £2,118 or such sum as, in the opinion of the trustees, will bring her income up to £3,986 per annum, whichever is the less:

(c) in paragraph 2A of that Schedule for the words 'the annual amount of any periodical payment' to the end of the paragraph, there shall be substituted the words:

'the annual amount of any periodical payment made to any such widower shall not exceed £1,101 or such sum as, in the opinion of the trustees, will bring his income up to £2,969 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to his wife's length of service or to his needs the trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £2,118 or such sum as, in the opinion of the trustees, will bring his income up to £3,986 per annum, whichever is the less:

(d) in section 2(1) of the said Act of 1981, for the words from the beginning to the end of paragraph (b) there shall be substituted the words:

'the annual rate of any payments made under section 1 shall be—

(a) £1,282 if the payments are made to a past Member; and

(b) £641 if the payments are made to the widow or widower of a past Member'.

PETITIONS

Human Embryos

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): I beg to ask leave to present to the House a petition in the names of Ann Twomey of Wetheral and Mary Delap of Great Corby and on behalf of a further 157 of my constituents of Penrith and The Border. The petition is entitled, and my constituents are responding to the Government's invitation to comment on the report of the Warnock committee.

"Petition for the Protection of the Human Embryo",

My petitioners

Welcome the Statement in the Report of the Committee of Inquiry into Human Fertilisation and Embryology (the Warnock Report) that "the status of the embryo is a matter of fundamental principle which should be enshrined in legislation" and its recommendation that the embryo of the human species should be afforded protection in law.

I entirely agree with that statement.

My petitioners go on to affirm that the newly fertilised human embryos are real individual human beings, and they therefore oppose all such practices as are recommended in the report which discriminate against the embryo or violate his or her human dignity and right to life. They conclude:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned). And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will every pray, etc.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask leave to present a petition which has been signed by some 720 of my constituents, mostly in the Shetland part of my constituency. I think that that number amounts to about 5 per cent. of the electorate of that part of my constituency. The terms of the petition for the protection of the human embryo are substantially those that have already been referred to by the hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean). The petition asks that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

The petition concludes:

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will every pray, etc.

Those who have signed the petition affirm, as I do, that the status of the embryo is a matter of fundamental principle and that the embryo of the human species should be afforded protection in law. I present the petition in that spirit of support.

To lie upon the Table.

11.42 pm

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): I beg to ask leave to present three petitions from residents within the Banff and Buchan constituency. The first petition was initiated by Mrs. Marie Stephens of 39 Prince road, Peterhead, and contains 392 signatures. The second was initiated by the Reverend I. D. Zass-Ogilvie, rector of St.

Marnon's Scottish episcopal church in the village of Aberchirder. The third was initiated by Edith M. Smith of 22 Schoolhendry street, Portsoy, and contains 47 signatures.

All three petitions are couched in identical terms and affirm the petitioners' belief that the newly-fertilised human embryo is a real living individual human being. All three petitions also oppose all practices which discriminate against the embryo or violate his or her human dignity and right to life.

The petitioners continue as follows:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

The three petitions conclude:

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

11.43 pm

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I beg to ask leave to present a public petition for the protection of the human embryo, which stands in the name of Joan Johnson and is signed by more than 500 of my constituents from all parts of Norwich, North. I present it in a spirit of support.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I have a petition to present in respect of 3,662 people in my constituency and surrounding areas that prays in the terms already mentioned tonight. I associate myself with the sentiments expressed in the petition collected by J. Fox. My constituents pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done soley for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

11.45 pm

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I also beg to ask leave to present a petition in similar terms from the constituents of Leicester, East, which I have the honour to represent, and from all parts of the city of Leicester and the county of Leicestershire.

The petition contains the signatures of 976 people, including many from Leicestershire Life. It rightly draws attention to certain recommendations in the Warnock report, particularly in relation to the status of the embryo. The petition reads:

the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

I heartily endorse all the sentiments expressed in that petition, which has been supported throughout the county. The petition ends

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Mental Health Commission Secretariat

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

11.46 pm

Mr. Stan Thorne (Preston): I am indebted to Mr. Speaker for being given the opportunity to raise an issue which, although not earth-shattering, is of considerable importance following the passage of the Mental Health Act 1983 which set up the Mental Health Commission.

The Minister and I sat on the Committee that considered that measure. Various discussions, which are not connected with the work of the secretariat, took place, although much of what we determined in that Committee gave life to the secretariat.

The secretariat's main function is to protect the rights of formally detained psychiatric patients by investigating complaints by such patients and by visiting hospitals where they are detained.

The commissioners are either professionals associated with psychiatry or interested and involved lay people. Its organisation is split into three regions—the north-west, the north-east and the south. Each region is serviced by its own secretariat, with support staff, totalling only about 15.

My debate is about the proposed centralisation of that secretariat. Before dealing with that, I shall deal with a misleading answer given to me by the Minister. He said that commissioners do not receive fees. Different classes of commissioners exist. The retired, the self-employed and those employed by private organisations, in addition to their expenses, receive fees at a rate of a little more than £70 per day. The employers of those employed by public bodies other than the Health Service are remunerated for loss of their employees' time.

I regret that, unfairly, where commissioners are Health Service employees, neither their employers—the district health authorities—nor the commissioners receive any financial consideration for their loss of working time on commission business that may involve several days per week, evenings and even weekend work. NHS-employed commissioners must be struggling to maintain an adequate input to keep their jobs going. Their hard-pressed district health authorities, with their manpower targets and cash limits to meet, must regret releasing their staff without compensation.

Many of the staff are highly experienced and valuable. After all, presumably that is why they were appointed by the Secretary of State. Many of their jobs involve direct patient services. I suggest that the discrimination against the Health Service appointees is likely to present a powerful disincentive to health authorities supporting their employees' appointment to the commission and to such employees to accept appointments in future. I urge the Secretary of State to regularise the position of Health Service-employed commissioners at an early date.

The commission consists of part-time commissioners — some of whom are in an anomolous position in respect of fees-serviced by a full-time but small secretariat organised on a regional basis. It has been in existence for just over one year. As the Minister has acknowledged, its achievements are impressive, yet already it is proposed radically to alter its organisational structure. That was admitted by a DHSS Minister in answer to my recent parliamentary question.

[Mr. Stan Thorne]

The proposal is no longer to have separate secretariats in the three regions, but to centralise them in the south-east, in London. I maintain that one reason why the commission has been able to establish credibility so quickly is that it is decentralised and regionalised. Thus, in the north-west, the commission covers two special hospitals—Moss Side and Park Lane. Much of the work of the commission is very much concerned with those institutions.

The patients in the hospitals have been able to relate to a commission which, for them, is almost just down the road. More importantly, it stands a chance of being seen as independent of "them"—the DHSS and the Home Office in London.

The commissioners have been able to establish good working relationships with the present secretariat, so that, as has been acknowledged, a commission that is part-time and largely unpaid has become an efficient, practical and working body. Yet, already, it is proposed to destroy the working relationships and replace them with what will inevitably mean more faceless relationships with more anonymous civil servants in London.

From both points of view—that of the patients served by the commission, and the efficiency and good working relationship within the commission — the proposed change cannot make good sense, especially coming, as it does, so soon after the inception of the commission. More general considerations concern me as well. The proposal represents yet another, albeit small, example of the drift of jobs away from the north-west and north-east, for example, into the south-east and London. It seems to represent yet another imposition of a doctrinaire policy of centralisation against the wishes of those concerned.

I understand that of the two commission regions concerned, the commissioners in the north-west were unanimous in their objection to the proposed centralisation, as were many of the commissioners in the north-east.

Worse than this, a centralised secretariat of civil servants in central London, dealing sometimes with highly sensitive complaints involving the DHSS, starts to sound like the beginning of the end of the independence of the commission. I consider that independence—I thought that the Minister did too—to be essential. It will no doubt be seized upon by patients' rights groups, which will perceive this, rightly or wrongly, as the first nail in the coffin for a body for which they had high hopes.

I understand that the secretariat shares the same in-line management structures as the managers of special hospitals. Centralisation into London is bound to lead to concern, justified or otherwise, that the vital and necessary independence of the commission and its secretariat will be eroded within these management structures.

The Minister may wish to claim that the proposed centralisation is necessary on cost and efficiency grounds. I dispute that. The commission has a modest budget which should not be made so modest that it cannot carry out its functions. It has a small support staff. In the three regional secretariats there is a total staff of about 15, including typists, and they have the job of organising the part-time commissioners, who are scattered throughout the country, to visit every establishment where there are detained patients at least once a year, and once a month to special hospitals. They deal with many complaints and organise second opinions for compulsory treatments within days of the request coming from hospitals, including all the paperwork and documentation that must be involved. Against that background, a staff of 15 can be considered only as minimal.

As I understand it, the proposed reorganisation will do nothing to reduce the number of secretariat staff. The proposed centralisation will lead almost certainly to more expenditure on incidentals such as travelling, telephone and office rental costs. Given the nature of the work that I have outlined, it is difficult to see how greater efficiency can ensue.

Another claim that the Minister may wish to make in justification of the proposal is that the central policy committee within the commission has agreed to the proposal. Far from being a justification, I would submit that that agreement raises other concerns. I know that some of the commissioners are concerned about the work and role of the committee, which is appointed by the Secretary of State. They consider it to be out of touch with the regions, in that it has agreed with the proposal against the wishes of the regional commissions.

The proposal to centralise the secretariat has met with considerable opposition from commissioners. It will decrease markedly the credibility of the commissioners as an independent body seeking to protect the rights of formally detained patients. The proposal represents yet another centralising drift of jobs and influence from the regions to London.

The new commission has a difficult job, and our efforts must be directed towards supporting, not undermining, it. This country's recent record on human rights has been somewhat tarnished in the eyes of the rest of the developed world. We have set up a body to safeguard civil rights and guarantee minimum standards of care and treatment to a vulnerable section of our community which, sadly, until recently as a society we preferred to lock up as far away from us as possible and forget. We must not demean our advances by petty-minded and premature bureaucratic blinkering or efforts at minuscule financial savings.

I should like the Minister of Health to give the House certain assurances. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman reconsider his decision to centralise the commission's secretariat and instead follow the opinion of the majority of the commissioners affected and ensure adequately staffed regional secretariats? If the right hon. and learned Gentleman has not yet made a decision to centralise — I must admit that an earlier reply to a parliamentary question seemed to suggest that the final decision had not been taken—will he reject the advice of his civil servants, accept the unanimous view of the north-west commissioners and at least ensure an adequately staffed regional secretariat within the north-west? If the right hon. and learned Gentleman feels unable to depart from the concept of a centralised secretariat, will he consider carefully whether it must be centralised into London? I understand that there is more than adequate office space next to the offices of the north-west secretariat and within the same building to house the whole centralised secretariat. There seems little good reason—other than dogma — why London should always be chosen as the site for the centralised secretariat, when adequate and arguably more suitable accommodation exists elsewhere.

Could the Minister leave the north-west on its own if he is determined to centralise and take in the north-east with London? The right hon. and learned Gentleman will be aware that the National Health Advisory Service consists of people who are seconded from their employing authority. Why cannot the same be done with the mental health commissioners? Whatever the decision the Minister eventually reaches, I hope that he can say that there will be no enforced redundancies among the staff of the existing secretariat.

12.3 am

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I thank the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne) for raising this matter on the Adjournment. As he said, the subject matter is hardly earth-shattering, but I agree with him about its importance. We served on the Standing Committee on the Bill which eventually became an Act and paved the way for the creation of the Mental Health Act Commission. During the Committee's proceedings we agreed on rather more occasions than we are accustomed to do when considering more general political issues in the House. We both share and support the broad objectives of the legislation and support the work of the new commission. We wish to defend its independence, which was a matter which the hon. Member mentioned. I am sure that we both congratulate it on its work so far.

Both of us are fairly defiantly provincial, which is an interest we share, and, as the hon. Gentleman said, the present secretariat is divided, with five people in London, four in Liverpool and four in Nottingham. I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman speaks with an interest in Liverpool, but I represent part of the county of Nottingham and assure him that I have no innate desire to see the secretariat of this or any other body situated in central London if there are compelling reasons to the contrary.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman in supporting the work of the commission. It was established in 1983 under an order and regulations following the powers contained in the Mental Health Act 1983. Its work began on 30 September 1983. I am pleased to join in the tribute which, by implication, the hon. Member paid to the work of the chairman, my noble Friend Lord Colville, and his fellow commissioners, who have made impressive progress.

The principal purpose of the Act and the commission's work is to look after the interests of patients who are suffering from mental illness. The commission must protect the interests of those patients whose mental disorder takes such a serious form that they must, in their interests and for the protection of others, be compulsorily detained.

People in such a position suffer a double disadvantage. They suffer a serious mental disorder and they lose the freedom of movement, which is such a valued possession of all in a society such as ours. The law therefore has to make special provision to protect the interests of detained patients. The Act was intended to make radical changes to the law to bring it up to date and to add to the protection of patients.

The commission was set up to look after the legal and more general rights of those patients. It has four main functions. First, members of the commission pay regular visits to hospitals where patients are detained to monitor the standards of care and treatment provided and to ensure that the various requirements of the Act are being satisfied.

Secondly, the commission's members operate the statutory provisions relating to consent to treatment. In some limited circumstances, those provisions affect informal patients also. At the moment, the commission is interested mainly in the consent to treatment of detained patients. Some of the medical members of the commission undertake second-opinion visits in connection with consent to treatment. The commission also provides the doctors to carry out that work.

Thirdly, the commissioners receive and act on complaints or other representations made by or on behalf of detained patients. Fourthly, the members of the commission are preparing a draft code of practice which will contain guidance on compulsory admissions to hospitals or nursing homes and guidance on the treatment of patients suffering from mental disorder.

The purpose of the code of practice is to promote good practice generally throughout the service. After we have undertaken the required consultations, we shall table the code for Parliament to consider. That is a wide range of work, which the commission is undertaking with vigour and enthusiasm. The commissioners, in the first year of operation, as part of the regular visiting programme already have paid one or more visits to hospitals where there are detained patients throughout England and Wales. They are also dealing with a considerable number of complaints from patients and their friends and relatives.

The commission is a large body. It must be, to undertake all this work across the country. There are 90 members. By discipline, the largest group is doctors. The other main disciplines represented are nurses, social workers, psychologists and lawyers. There are also lay members, and one or two members with a special knowledge of mental health services. The members are drawn from all parts of England and Wales.

While individual members bring their experience and specialist knowledge to the commission's work, one of the impressive features of the first year's work is the way in which members have seen themselves as commissioners first and not as representatives of specialist interests. A strong corporate team spirit has been forged.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the fees paid to the commission's members and suggested that we were in some way making divisions between them according to classes and not dealing with them fairly. It is true that we pay some compensation for loss of earnings to those in private employment, and we also make arrangements to pay the travelling expenses of all commissioners. There are some special arrangements to pay for additional work done by doctors who give up parts of their practice to serve on the commission but do extra sessions to provide a service to patients in their localities. Otherwise, in drawing up the statement of compensation for members of the commission, we try to act fairly between them all.

I shall write to the hon. Gentleman setting out fully and clearly the precise arrangements, in order to try to answer his fears that we are being unfair as between one category and another. He was, however, particularly concerned about those who worked for health authorities and thought that we might be deterring the authorities as employers, or the employees themselves, by not providing either with compensation for loss of earnings.

We believed that, for those working for health authorities, work for the Mental Health Act Commission would be regarded as part of their ordinary service to the NHS. I have no evidence that anyone has been deterred, and I have no evidence that any health authority has discouraged any of its employees from serving on the commission. I hope that that has not happened, but I shall look into the matter and give the hon. Gentleman a full letter. He can then respond if he feels that our arrangements are in some way unfair and discriminatory.

The hon. Gentleman's main concern is with the organisation of the commission. In drawing up the organisation we followed, but did not exactly match, the organisation of the parallel mental health review tribunals. They are slightly different bodies created under the Mental Health Act 1959. Their members are appointed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor. They hear appeals against detention by detained patients, and have been working for many years.

The tribunals have found that a large proportion of their hearings arise from patients who are detained in the four special hospitals located in Berkshire, Nottinghamshire and near Liverpool. Because a significant proportion of all tribunal hearings take place at those hospitals, the secretariat offices of the mental health review tribunals are located in London, Nottingham and Liverpool, and from there the tribunals derive the secretarial support that they need.

I mention those because when the Mental Health Act Commission came into existence that pattern was to some extent followed. The commission divided the NHS regions in the country into three groups, one covering the southern half of the country, one the regions on the western side, from the west midlands northwards, and the third the eastern side, from Trent northwards. Each of these three territorial teams has its own chairman and vice-chairman, and organises its own programme of regular work under the various headings which I have described.

Essentially, my noble Friend Lord Colville of Culross is supported by a small central policy committee. When the organisation was first being set up, we rejected the suggestion that it should share the secretariat with the mental health review tribunals, because the two bodies have quite different functions and ought to have separate identities. However, we followed the pattern which I have described, which the tribunals had previously followed, and we now describe our areas within the Mental Health Act Commission as the southern, north-eastern and north-western regions of the commission.

There is a total of 15 staff in the commission's secretariat, all but one being seconded officers from my Department, and almost all of them serving with one of the three regional teams. All those staff have thrown themselves with great enthusiasm into the work of the commission, and their work has been much appreciated by the commissioners.

A little while ago it was decided that as it was now 12 months since the new Act was introduced, and it was time for the Department's staff inspectors to examine the work of the secretariat staff of both the mental health review tribunals and the Mental Health Act Commission. We use staff inspectors regularly inside our Department, just as we do inside every Department of central Government. It is a well-established procedure for looking at the distribution of the work load and making sure that organisational questions are addressed in a way which ensures that work is undertaken in the most efficient and economical manner.

The inspectors in this case interviewed individual staff members and looked at the replies to standard questionaires. After discussion of a draft report with local management, they drew up a final report with their recommendations. It was those staff inspectors who recommended the centralisation of the services.

In due course I can provide the hon. Gentleman with a list of the eight reasons which led the inspectors to recommend the centralisation of the secretariat. They were first drawn in by a request from the regions for more staff, because various problems had arisen in organising the work properly with such comparatively small numbers in each of the centres. It was very difficult to cover for staff absence, holidays or sudden surges of work. It was found that that difficulty had been overcome by a rather heavy use of casual labour. No fewer than 42 man weeks of casual labour had been used in the period 1 October 1983 to 30 June 1984. Therefore, the recommendation was that greater efficiency of operation could be achieved if all staff were located at the London headquarters office of the commission.

I listened to what the hon. Gentleman said. No final decision has been taken, although the central committee, despite some misgivings on the part of some members, has supported the recommendation. I shall put the points made by the hon. Gentleman to my noble Friend Lord Colville of Culross and will look into the matter again to see whether the commission is really satisfied that it needs to centralise its staff. We do not want more staff, but we do want efficient organisation. We do not want unnecessarily to increase costs. We are both agreed that we want to support the work of the commission. There is no point in centralising it if that is not useful to the commission. Therefore, I promise the hon. Member that I shall take his points on board and come back to him in due course with a considered response. I shall hope to amplify the reasons for centralisation if that goes ahead or to come back to the hon. Gentleman with the reasons for its reconsideration if my noble Friend considers that, on balance, this matter is worth reopening.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes past Twelve o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

EMPLOYMENT

GCHQ Cheltenham

1. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Employment what recent discussions he has had with the International Labour Organisation about the withdrawal of trade union rights at Government Communications Headquarters.

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Tom King): The International Labour Organisation has written in connection with the report on GCHQ by the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Government will be responding to this report within the next few weeks.

Mr. Dalyell: Can the Secretary of State explain to the ILO why, if there was a real, serious threat to national security, the Government took no action for three long years after the events of which they complain? How could competent Ministers allow themselves to be involved in such dereliction of duty?

Mr. King: I see that the hon. Gentleman recognises that there is a case for taking action because of the deliberate campaign to damage defence readiness, which was part of the Civil Service dispute. I believe that the time scale shows the lengths to which the Government went to see whether alternative routes were available.

Mr. Budgen: When the Government said at the beginning of the dispute that they would be bound by the domestic legal process, did they mean that they would not accept the jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights in this matter?

Mr. King: The question of being bound by the domestic legal process had relevance to the request from the trade unions for a stay of any further action with regard to the employees affected at GCHQ.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Will the Secretary of State therefore give an assurance that national security will not be used as a pretext for banning trade unions in other Government Departments?

Mr. King: I think that that assurance has been given very clearly indeed throughout the main generality of the Civil Service. The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the specific provision of convention 151, that "employees whose duties are of a highly confidential nature should be determined by national laws and regulations."

Mr. Bill Walker: When my right hon. Friend meets bodies, such as the ILO, will he point out that GCHQ is unique in that a vital part of its work is carried out within our intelligence framework, that the individuals working there understand and have always understood that and that that is why they never took action in the past? Is he aware that when I represented them 20 years ago they would not even have considered such action?

Mr. King: Yes, but the Opposition never seem to accept that. They fail to recognise that it was the boast of the Civil Service unions during the campaign, to quote an actual campaign document, that "The use of selective strike action by members in sensitive areas is a key part of our campaign. Our ultimate success depends upon the extent to which . . . defence readiness is hampered."

Mr. Prescott: Is the Secretary of State aware that ballots can still take place at GCHQ, that in a recent ballot an individual was elected by 89 per cent. of the participants to represent them in pay negotiations, that that is a far greater proportion than the 85 per cent. required for a closed shop, but that the individual has nevertheless been forced to resign? Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to continue to encourage management to conduct ballots until it finds someone acceptable to it and to the Secretary of State?

Mr. King: The internal affairs of GCHQ are a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs. I suspect, however, that it would be interesting to know exactly who were the participants in that ballot.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the unsatisfactory nature of the reply, I beg to give notice that I shall seek to raise the matter on the Adjournment at the earliest opportunity.

Adult Training

2. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of adult job retraining places within the Greater London council area.

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Peter Morrison): We plan to train approaching 12,000 people this year in Greater London through the training opportunities scheme. In 1985-86 we expect to support nearly 17,000 adult training places in Greater London.

Mr. Cox: Is the Minister aware that the reply that I recently received from his Department made it clear that there are well over 65,000 men and women over the age of 50 who are unemployed in London? As many of them still have commitments — their children may be at school, or they may be buying their house—they have little hope of taking up a place on an adult retraining scheme. At this Christmas season, what message of hope can the Minister offer to those people? In particular, what can he tell them about their future employment prospects?

Mr. Morrison: I am aware of what the hon. Gentleman says about unemployment in Greater London. However, the numbers to be trained next year will substantially increase because of the rejigging of the adult training strategy. Some £75 million will be spent through the Manpower Services Commission on training and retraining in London.

Dr. Twinn: How many training places are provided in Greater London through the Greater London Training Board, as opposed to the Manpower Services Commission?

Mr. Morrison: The Greater London Training Board, by way of topping up the work of the MSC, has spent £7 million this year, compared with expenditure of £75 million by the MSC.

Industrial Relations

3. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will meet the Confederation of British Industry to discuss the long-term improvement of industrial relations.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): The long-term improvement of industrial relations is an important topic of discussion in our frequent contacts with representatives of the CBI.

Mr. Knox: Does my hon. Friend agree that greater employee participation has an important part to play in the long-term improvement of industrial relations, and will he emphasise the importance and urgency of the matter when he next meets the CBI?

Mr. Bottomley: Yes, Sir. Employee involvement and participation and the spread of share ownership help to persuade people to work together for the prosperity of the country and the security of their own jobs.

Mr. James Lamond: How can there be any improvement in industrial relations when the Government spend all their time bashing the trade union movement, legislating against it and trying to destroy it? How can such a Government turn round and make mealy-mouthed statements about their interest in good industrial relations?

Mr. Bottomley: If the hon. Gentleman believes that spreading democracy within the trade unions amounts to bashing them, he takes a different view from that taken by most people and members of trade unions.

Youth Training Scheme

4. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest figures for the numbers of people entering the youth training scheme and finding a job immediately in the Manpower Services Commission area serving Basildon; and how these figures compare (a) with the national figures and (b) with the local and national figures one year ago.

Mr. Peter Morrison: An informal survey of managing agents and sponsors in Essex shows that, to the best of their knowledge, more than seven out of 10 youngsters leaving the youth training scheme are going into jobs. A recent national sample survey indicated that almost six out of 10 leavers were in work at the time of the survey.

Mr. Amess: Is my hon. Friend aware that the success rate in Basildon is even higher, and is he encouraged by that fact? Does he agree that the youth training scheme offers excellent training and every prospect of a permanent job at the end of a placement?

Mr. Morrison: I agree that Basildon has done particularly well and that, whatever Opposition Members may think, the youth training scheme is successful in every possible way. That success is demonstrated particularly clearly by the fact that the youngsters themselves approve of and like it.

Mr. Madden: Will the Minister assure the young people of Basildon, Bradford, and many other places, that he has no proposal to deny them supplementary benefit if, for whatever reason, they refuse a youth training scheme place?

Mr. Morrison: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, I have seen some of the schemes in Bradford, and they too, are very successful.

In June 1982 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry — then Secretary of State for Employment — in a statement about supplementary benefit, said:

"We have therefore decided that withdrawal of supplementary benefit will not take place in September 1983 and that there will be a further review after a year's operation of the scheme."—[Official Report, 21 June 1982; Vol. 26, c. 23.]

Mr. Prescott: Can the Minister confirm that youngsters aged 16 will face a fine of £17·30 a week if they refuse a place on the youth training scheme? Many young people, who see the scheme as cheap labour, prefer to take the advice to get on their bikes and look for jobs. Should not the Minister consider the advice of the Select Committee to use whatever spare places are available to provide such opportunities for the 1 million young people under the age of 25? Is it not strange that a Government who believe in freedom of choice should be recruiting young people into forced labour schemes?

Mr. Morrison: I can confirm that, apparantly unlike the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends, the Government are working towards unemployment for 16 and 17-year-olds not being an option. I can also confirm that, for 18 to 24-year-olds, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced that of the 130,000 community programme places, 50,000 would have training. More than half of the places on the community programme are occupied by 18 to 24-year-olds.

Young Workers Scheme

5. Mr. John Townend asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people are employed under the young workers scheme in firms which come under the Distributive Trades Wages Council.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Alan Clark): The Retail Trade (Non Food) Wages Council has chosen to set a weekly minimum rate of pay for 17-year-olds which, by just 5p, is too high to enable employers in that trade to claim support under the young workers scheme.

Mr. Townend: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is nonsense for the Government to set aside funds to encourage employers to take on young people at realistic rates of pay when wages councils make any employer who takes advantage of that scheme in breach of the regulations? How many young people are on the dole because of this stupidity, and when will the Government act?

Mr. Clark: As my hon. Friend knows, we are examining wages councils. We encourage representations from all quarters, including his, which, though not unpredictable, is welcome. The fixing of a limit which is so narrowly calculated to frustrate the working of a Government scheme is unlikely to be accidental.

Mr. Nellist: Perhaps for the information of the House and others who are listening the Minister will say how much the wages council rate is in pounds and pence. Will he confirm that when Sir John Hoskyns, who I believe now has something to do with the Institute of Directors, was the head of a policy unit under the Prime Minister, he produced a paper which said that the aim of the young workers scheme and the youth training scheme was to increase the differential between adult rates and young workers' rates — in other words, to create a pool of cheap youth labour?

Mr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman is waxing very indignant about wage rates, but he must decide to which he attaches the greater importance: the wage rates of those who are in work, or to the job prospects of those who are seeking work.

Young Persons

6. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of young people aged 16 to 24 years, not currently in full-time education, are without full-time, permanent employment at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The labour force survey a year ago showed that the approximate percentages were: 46 in full-time employment, seven in other employment, making 53 in all; 20 in full-time education, three in training and employment schemes, making 23; 10 were not seeking work, including those looking after a home or family; and 13 were unemployed seeking work.

Mr. Davies: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply. Does he understand what a personal tragedy it is for the third of a million young people who have been out of work for more than one year? Does he appreciate that if the Government intend to bully young school leavers on to youth training schemes there will be massive and widespread opposition? Will he give an assurance that he will undertake realistic and widespread consultations with people who are involved in YTS before the Government take a decision? Will he also undertake, in view of the gravity of the Government's proposals, to arrange for a debate on the Floor of the House before such a scheme is implemented?

Mr. Bottomley: The Gentleman will have heard what my hon. Friend the Minister of State has said, and the hon. Gentleman's final question should be addressed to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. I can say, however, that it is common ground that we must build up the quality of training, encourage people to take that training and ensure that all school leavers get the best possible opportunities to meet the needs for jobs in the future and to create the prosperity on which our future depends.

Mr. Madel: If there are to be more courses on computer skills and similar subjects in further education, which means local authorities being involved in more expenditure, will the Government take care to ensure that expenditure which is designed to help young unemployed people will not push local authorities into penalty zones with regard to the rate support grant?

Mr. Bottomley: I hesitate to answer on behalf of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Education and Science and for the Environment. I believe that my hon. Friend will recognise that much of what he has been pushing for has led to greater attention being paid to technical and vocational education in and out of school.

Mr. Wigley: Yesterday the Prime Minister said that every 16, 17 and 18-year-old had an opportunity to go into either training or further education. Does the Under-Secretary of State agree that that is not a real option when many young people going into further education receive a grant of only £200 a year, which, in effect, debars them from obtaining that education?

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman is encouraging us to do more and to do better. We shall certainly take on board his remarks.

Mr. Maples: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the best ways of helping to create jobs for the young unemployed and others who are unemployed is to reduce employers' national insurance contributions? That would be a more effective way of helping to create jobs than raising tax thresholds.

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend is right, but we need to recognise that employers take part in wage bargaining, and at present wage rates are rising faster than the growth in output or productivity.

Mr. Ashley: Is the Minister aware that, as many young people are out of work for so long, long-term unemployment is becoming a social cancer? Will the hon. Gentleman ensure that the re-employment of the long-term unemployed is a top Government priority and that the level of long-term unemployment is the main criterion for Government aid?

Mr. Bottomley: There is agreement on both sides of the House that trying to create opportunities for the long-term unemployed, whether young or old, to return to employment is a high priority. I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's support.

Skillcentres

7. Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received recently on the closure of skillcentres.

Mr. Tom King: Since my statement in the House about the skillcentre proposals being made to the Manpower Services Commission by the Skillcentre Training Agency, my colleagues and I have received some 50 letters on the subject.

Mr. Sheerman: Is the Secretary of State aware that throughout the country numerous firms have declared their opposition to the closure of skillcentres, which provide the up-to-date and relevant skills for their industries? I have received letters on this matter from Taylor Woodrow and Lonhro and from the sunrise and sunset industries, if one must use that terminology. Will the right hon. Gentleman instruct the MSC to consult all bodies — not only employers, but trade unions and education authorities — before any of these closures are brought forward?

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the officials in the MSC and the Skillcentre Training Agency gave evidence to the Select Committee and agreed to defer making any decision at their last meeting on this subject. I understand that the Select Committee will hold a further meeting with the Civil Service unions concerned in this matter. I know that the MSC will be anxious to hear the views of anyone who wishes to comment on these proposals.

Mr. Jessel: Will my right hon. Friend reconsider whether the Twickenham skillcentre, which he visited last year and which he knows does excellent work, can be saved? Failing that, will he ascertain what other openings within easy reach of the area can be offered to staff and trainees?

Mr. King: I know that my hon. Friend was extremely prompt in expressing his interest in the skillcentre in his constituency and that he sent one of the letters that we received on the subject. I know also that he has spoken to my hon. Friend the Minister of State. We shall certainly consider the points that he has made.

Mr. Corbett: How will the proposed closure of the skillcentre at Castle Bromwich help people to acquire the skills they need to obtain a reasonable chance of getting a job?

Mr. King: If the hon. Gentleman has a chance to look at the proposals, he will note that they will establish a wider range of adult training and ensure that we provide more opportunities. The figures for the midlands show that there will be an increase of 157 per cent. in the number of people who will be able to receive adult training under the new proposals. That is on the basis of the proposals made by the Skillcentre Training Agency.

Mr. Stanbrook: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the devil makes work for idle hands, and that all useful training must be beneficial?

Mr. King: The answer to the first part of my hon. Friend's question is yes.

With regard to the second part, we are most anxious to ensure that training provision is relevant and appropriate and covers as many people as possible and that resources are available to give people the best possible chance of getting into jobs.

Youth Training Scheme

8. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish figures showing the number of trainees with special education or special training needs currently training within the youth training scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: These figures are not available, as youngsters with special education or special training needs are not separately categorised. However, all youngsters who are eligible for the youth training scheme are offered training designed to meet their individual needs.

Mr. Ashdown: As the Education Act 1981 requires that special educational needs should be met, does the Minister believe that those figures should be kept to ensure that the Act is being followed? Does he realise that in present circumstances the buck is being passed between the MSC and the local education authority as to who should provide for those needs, in such a way, for instance, that in Yeovil only 2 per cent. of the estimated 20 per cent. are receiving the special education required?

Mr. Morrison: As I said to the hon. Gentleman the other day, if there are cases that he wishes to bring to my attention, I shall look at them. There are a variety of different schemes under modes A and B. They are tailored to help all youngsters, whatever their needs may be.

Mr. Lawler: I am sure my hon. Friend agrees that most young people regard YTS as a worthwhile scheme which will help them to secure permanent employment in the future. What proportion of relevant school leavers this year have gained YTS places, and how many are left to fulfil the pledge that all eligible youngsters will receive a place before Christmas?

Mr. Morrison: On the latter point, I can assure my hon. Friend that we are confident that the Christmas undertaking in respect of minimum age school leavers will be kept. What is gratifying at this stage is that the number of youngsters joining the scheme is substantially up compared with last year. I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for what he does to help the scheme along.

Mr. Eastham: Is it not a fact that mode A is run privately by the employers, who make virtually no provision for handicapped people, while mode B is, in the main, provided by local authorities? The Government cut mode B last year, which will be to the detriment of handicapped students.

Mr. Morrison: I am not sure from what facts and figures the hon. Gentleman is talking. There are a substantial number of disabled youngsters on mode A schemes. On mode B, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that it is a waste of taxpayers' money to have schemes open but not filled at a cost of £2,000 per approved place. That is not what either of us wants.

Job Sharing Scheme

9. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Employment what progress he has made in encouraging job sharing and job splitting.

Mr. Alan Clark: My right hon. Friend announced in the debate on the Address that he would be improving two experimental Government initiatives, namely, the job splitting scheme and the part-time job release scheme, designed to encourage changes in working patterns and to help in reducing the problem of unemployment.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Has my hon. Friend considered using reductions in national insurance contributions to encourage job sharing? Does he agree that in larger businesses that would permit more people to be employed, and that the net cost to the Government would be small?

Mr. Clark: As my hon. Friend will be aware, the starting point for national insurance contributions is £34 a week, which means that such contributions are not required for many part-time jobs. We are worried about the legislative burden, including national insurance contributions, on employers which might hinder the creation of new jobs. I shall ensure that my hon. Friend's comments are borne in mind by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Golding: Is the Minister aware that only 990 places have been created by the job splitting scheme? Is he further aware that in March 1983 the Government justified spending on 338,000 places by saying that there had been 9,000 inquiries? What has happened to those inquiries?

Mr. Clark: I believe that the hon. Gentleman meant £338,000. He said places.

Mr. Golding: No.

Mr. Clark: I admit that the result of the job splitting scheme has been disappointing, which is why my right hon. Friend announced improvements to it. Naturally, it was appropriate to have an advertising campaign of a limited nature in the first instance, to draw the attention to the scheme of those who might be interested in it.

Mr. Rowe: Is it not an undesirable paradox that at a time when many people are unemployed many of the most prosperous people in society appear to be working longer hours than ever before? Will my hon. Friend consider having discussions with professional bodies and others to see what progress can be made in sharing some of the work among people whose take-home pay is such that it would be easier for them to do so than it would be for people lower down the pay scale?

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend's suggestion is interesting. Essentially, wage rates and hours of work should be negotiated between employer and employee.

Mr. Evans: Will the Minister concede that, despite the thousands of pounds spent on advertising the job-splitting scheme, it is a dismal failure? Why does he not spend the money more wisely and extend the provisions of the job release scheme to 62-year-olds, among whom there is an obvious demand for this popular scheme?

Mr. Clark: I note the hon. Gentleman's characteristic lack of generosity, which he always displays in relation to this scheme, and I applaud his concern for the public borrowing requirement.

Labour Statistics

10. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been unemployed in Lambeth for more than six months.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On 11 October, the latest date for which the figures are available, there were 13,162 claimants who had been unemployed for more than six months in the area covered by the Brixton, Stockwell, Streatham and West Norwood jobcentres, which corresponds closely to the London borough of Lambeth.

Mr. Fraser: Does the Minister realise that that is a catastrophic figure and comprises more than half of the unemployed in Lambeth? Is he aware that long-term unemployment is a disease that eats at the heart of that community? Why have the Government chosen this moment to close a skillcentre in Lambeth, to create redundancies by rate capping in three local authorities and to cut the housing programme? Have they taken leave of their senses?

Mr. Bottomley: On 23 November the hon. Gentleman had the opportunity to make his speech and to listen to the reply from my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment. He will agree that if Lambeth has managed to double its rates per job in the past two years, it is time that rate capping was introduced to give employment in Lambeth, which is rising, a chance.

Mr. Marlow: Why is it that loony Left-wing authorities and high unemployment go together? Which is the chicken and which is the egg?

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend hints at the serious point that if Lambeth and other local authorities in London want more employment they should pay more attention to the needs of employers and those who need jobs, and less to party politics that seem to be paid for by the rates.

Youth Training Scheme

11. Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Employment what improvements he proposes to introduce into the youth training scheme to make it more relevant to today's training needs.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We shall continue our efforts to ensure the youth training scheme provides quality training and responds flexibly to industry's needs.

Mr. King: Does my hon. Friend appreciate that many Conservative Members would welcome a youth training scheme which was extended to all school leavers and was based on an increasing use of apprenticeships?

Mr. Morrison: My hon. Friend will appreciate that we are considering that now. I agree that there should be a flow through from the scheme into apprenticeships based on standards and not on time-serving.

Mr. Penhaligon: Does the Minister agree that if the YTS is to develop into the fully grown plant, as Conservative Members frequently describe it, it must be seen to be attractive and relevant to our young people, and not as a punishment for failing to find a job, which will happen if attendance is made compulsory?

Mr. Morrison: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I have seen schemes in his constituency which are attractive and relevant. In my opinion Cornwall does particularly well. Regarding his other point, he has already heard what I have to say.

Mr. Alexander: Does my hon. Friend recollect that in the early days the YTS was ridiculed by Opposition Members and others as being useless for providing future jobs for young people? Does he agree that the record of the YTS has totally vindicated the claims made for it?

Mr. Morrison: I agree with my hon. Friend in all but one respect. I regret that some Opposition Members still try to ridicule the scheme. That does no good to the youngsters who are not part of it. It must be better to have a scheme of work experience than to have none.

Ms. Clare Short: Why, if the YTS is so popular, is the Minister proposing to make it compulsory? Will he admit that the real reason is that he wants to reduce the minimum level of supplementary benefit above which the YTS allowance operates, so that the allowance can be reduced to a level even lower than the present one?

Mr. Morrison: I do not know why the hon. Lady uses the word "compulsory". I have always maintained, and will maintain, that the YTS is voluntary.

Mr. Nicholls: Does my hon. Friend accept that the proposal that school leavers who do not wish to take a place on the YTS should not be entitled to supplementary benefit is welcome to many Conservative Members? Is it not remarkable that Opposition Members would far rather that a youngster started his working life on the dole than have a scheme of training that would equip him for a working life?

Mr. Morrison: It is remarkable that Opposition Members believe that it is better for youngsters to go on the dole when they have the opportunity to go on a training scheme.

Mr. Sheerman: Is it not true that what youngsters want most are jobs? They want a decent start in life. Will the Minister stop being mealy-mouthed and fudging this issue? Does he believe that supplementary benefit should be withdrawn from those who choose not to go on youth training schemes? Is that Government policy? Does he realise that at the stage when the youth training scheme could begin to become a much better quality scheme it will be undermind completely by those proposals? Finally, does he understand that he will place a stigma on youth training from which it will never recover?

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman heard what I said about supplementary benefit. He must accept that relevant training is necessary to find jobs. That is precisely what the youngsters on YTS received last year, and are getting this year.

Trade Unions (Postal Ballots)

12. Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many trades unions have applied for public money to cover the cost of postal ballots under the provisions of the Employment Act 1980.

Mr. Tom King: I am informed by the certification officer that 26 trade unions have applied for public money under the provisions of the Employment Act 1980 towards the cost incurred in holding secret postal ballots.

Mr. Rowe: Does my right hon. Friend derive encouragement from those figures, or does he believe that they show that there is no need to provide public money to encourage trade unions to carry out ballots?

Mr. King: One can draw some encouragement from the fact that, after an unpromising start, there is clear evidence that several trade unions understand the opportunities that exist in the legislation. I said that 26 unions had applied for public funds to hold secret ballots, and I understand that more major unions may follow that course, which will mean better opportunities for democratic choice for their members.

Mr. Skinner: Does the Secretary of State accept that it is nothing short of hypocrisy for the Government to tell trade unions that they should have postal ballots, when on 30 September the Government, under the guidance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, told a group of business men to get together at the Bank of England to save Johnson Matthey bankers, at the same time as they are closing uneconomic pits——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I gave the hon. Gentleman the opportunity to ask a question about postal ballots, not about Johnson Matthey.

Mr. Skinner: Is there not one law for the City, which does not need postal ballots to use taxpayers' money, and another one for the trade unions, which are told by the Government to have secret ballots?

Mr. King: I hope that that made the hon. Gentleman feel good, but it did not have much to do with the question.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Is it not particularly to be welcomed that postal ballots are to be used by so many trade unions? Does this not show that trade unions are finally becoming democratic and truly wish to reflect the views of all their members and not just those of some of their Left-wing executive members?

Mr. King: Hon. Members will have seen the further statements from a number of trade unions, and one can take encouragement from the fact that, increasingly, trade unions are bringing their procedures into line with the legislation that we have passed, which I hope will be helpful and in the interests not only of their members but of better and more orderly conduct of industrial relations.

Mr. Ashton: How can the Government try to compel trade unions to ballot their members when the Government do not ballot their Back Benchers on measures such as the recent students grants measure?

Mr. King: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman is opposed to ballots of trade union members——

Mr. Ashton: No.

Mr. King: I am glad to see then that he supports our proposals and that that view is spreading to the Labour Benches.

Wages Councils (Inspections)

13. Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many inspections by the wages councils have taken place in the last 12 months; and how many prosecutions there have been as a result of such inspections.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In the 12 months ending 31 October, the Wages Inspectorate checked the pay of workers at 43,079 establishments. One of the employers was prosecuted.

Mr. Dixon: Is it not a disgrace that all these inspections resulted in the prosecution of only one employer of the many who are robbing the lowest paid, while in the miners' strike hundreds of miners are arrested, handcuffed and put into gaol, simply for standing on the pavement, or simply for shouting "scabs"?

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman will realise that the level of prosecution is roughly the same as in the early years of the last Labour Government. I prefer to leave the rest of his question to a different debate.

Mr. Fallon: Does my hon. Friend know that the arrears paid in wages as a result of these visits was £1·8 million, whereas the Wages Inspectorate costs £3 million to run? Would it not be better if, instead of fussing about regulating wages and conditions, we allowed young people in the north to price themselves into work?

Mr. Bottomley: As my hon. Friend knows, the Government are considering the future of the wages councils system. The point about young people will be taken on board, but even my hon. Friend will recognise that not every young person in every region will get a job, at whatever level of wages.

Dr. McDonald: Why are the Government so keen to listen to their hon. Friends who suggest that they should abolish the wages councils on the pretence that this would greatly increase the number of jobs available, particularly for young people? Is the Minister not aware that even if the wages councils were abolished, at best only 8,000 more jobs would be created—a tiny proportion of the number of jobs needed to deal with the 3 million unemployed?

Mr. Bottomley: I fear that the hon. Lady was not listening to my other answers. The position of young people now is rather different from what it was 10 years ago, and the rise in the relative wages of young people has been associated with a reduction in job opportunities for them.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

14. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many jobs are estimated to be created for each entrant to the enterprise allowance scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: In addition to the 60,000 people directly assisted by the enterprise allowance scheme to set up their own businesses, we estimate that about 25,000 additional jobs have been created by those businesses so far.

Mr. Oppenheim: Does my hon. Friend agree that, despite the many Labour detractors, this scheme has been highly successful and has greatly benefited many of my constituents and created jobs in my constituency? Is it not an extremely economical way to create jobs, unlike many of the hare-brained schemes proposed by the Labour party?

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend is entirely right, although I do not think, to do them justice, that Labour Members criticised the scheme, which is welcomed by the House as extremely effective. Its most obvious merit is that it survives after the grant has ceased and generates additional jobs on top of jobs for those who apply successfully.

Mr. Dobson: Why do Ministers take the view that for the rich it is an incentive to get more money while for the people working in wages councils industries it will be an incentive for them to get less?

Mr. Clark: I do not wish to prevent the hon. Member from offering philosophical reflections, but the enterprise allowance is only £40 a week.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Will my hon. Friend confirm publicly what the Minister of State told me in a letter today namely that those who are not in receipt of unemployment benefit or supplementary benefit, but who are in receipt of a war disability pension, will now qualify for enterprise allowance?

Mr. Clark: I would not choose this occasion to disagree with my hon. Friend the Minister of State.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 December.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend is paying an official visit to the People's Republic of China.

Mr. Hamilton: Will the right hon. Gentleman inform the Prime Minister, when she returns, of the great anger on both sides of the House and outside at the imposition of VAT on each record sold in aid of the Ethiopian disaster fund? Is the Prime Minister aware that it is estimated that £500,000 has been raised by that record? Will the right hon. Lady recognise this as a one-off appeal? Bearing in mind that the Government changed their minds about student grants, cannot they change their minds on this?

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate the motivation of those involved in the records production. I fully appreciate that many hon. Members on all sides are disappointed that the Government cannot find some discriminatory fiscal arrangement for the sales of the record, but in their stand the Government are following the tradition of successive Governments. The real test is to set that decision against the amount of money spent on aid by this regime.

Mr. W. Benyon: Will my right hon. Friend draw the Prime Minister's attention to the trial in Northern Ireland last week of private Thain of the Light Infantry? Will he tell the Prime Minister how deeply disturbed many of us are at the sentence imposed in the dangerous conditions applying in Northern Ireland? Has not the time come for a radical review of the working of the yellow card?

Mr. Biffen: I shall, of course, carry out my hon. Friend's request.

Mr. Steel: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain to the Prime Minister when she returns that one of the reasons for the Government's drop in popularity at the Enfield, Southgate by-election, and in opinion polls, is that on a range of matters the Government are completely out of touch with the public's mood? Does he understand that that applies particularly to the relatively simple case of imposing VAT on the Christmas record made to benefit Ethiopia? Why does the Chancellor refuse even to see an all-party delegation on that subject?

Mr. Biffen: The physical embodiment of the success at Enfield, Southgate will soon be at this Table. The right hon. Gentleman has to live with the bitter harvest of not very near misses.

Mr. Penhaligon: We would have the right hon. Gentleman on that swing.

Mr. Biffen: I should be more than delighted to have the hon. Gentleman's posse campaigning for me in Shropshire, North. I can think of no better counter-production than that.

The case for the record causes genuine sentiments of charity and compassion for the Ethiopian famine. However, the Government are following their well-proven record of not making discriminatory gestures. The real test of our policies can be measured by the £35 million that we are giving to Ethiopia and by the £5½ million to £6 million to the Sudan.

Mr. Gregory: Will my right hon. Friend ensure that county councils and all those engaged in the welfare of former prisoners are instructed by the provision of clear guidelines so that there is no repetition of the appalling tragedy that took place concerning the sex pervert who killed four-year-old Marie Payne? Will he ensure that clear guidelines result in proper social welfare for ex-prisoners so that children are not put into such tragic danger?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises a matter which I know will cause the gravest disquiet within the House and outside. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will pay particular attention to his point about vetting and investigation.

Q2. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 18 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Did not the Government completely misread the feeling in the country and, I believe, in the House over VAT being imposed on the Band Aid single by sheltering behind bureaucratic traditions? Is there not a feeling throughout the country that in this instance the expression of concern for Ethiopia should be recognised and that the Government should not be the sole beneficiary of VAT revenue from this record?

Mr. Biffen: I do not think that I can helpfully add to what I have already said.

Mr. Lawrence: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the entire House will welcome the visit to Britain of Mr. Gorbachev and the Russian delegation? Is he aware that they are here to engender a feeling of trust, which we all welcome? Does he agree that the best way in which they can engender that feeling is to show that they are trustworthy in their undertaking to abide by the Helsinki agreement and their undertakings on human rights? If they give us the trust that will enable us to believe that they will honour those commitments, it will be so much easier for us to believe their promises on peace and security.

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend speaks for the whole House when he talks of the welcome that there is for the visit of Mr. Gorbachev and the Russian delegation. I agree with him that the real hope lies in the development of trust, which is a patient plant which is nurtured by long and quiet negotiations rather than in a hothouse of propaganda. He is right in saying that the way in which it is monitored, both in the House and by the British public outside, is the extent to which human rights are upheld.

Mr. Kinnock: When the Prime Minister said yesterday evening that the Government can give training to every young person up to the age of 18 years—"and we know that we can do that" — did she mean that the Government will provide two years of training for all those who leave school at 16?

Mr. Biffen: The answer depends very much on the outcome of the investigation that is now being undertaken by the committee under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Lord Privy Seal join me in regretting that the Prime Minister appears to have raised false hopes in what she said yesterday before she went off on her visit? May I prevail upon the right hon. Gentleman to urge upon the Prime Minister, when she returns, to recognise that an extension of training to two years—universally—would be very welcome, especially if such a training programme ensured training of high quality, permitted satisfactory education provision, leading, if necessary and where appropriate, to qualifications, ensured adequate pay and led to a job? Lastly, and importantly, the right hon. Lady should ensure that such a scheme is not compulsory or takes the form of conscription or coercian by the withdrawal of benefits to make young people destitute.

Mr. Biffen: The remarks of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister yesterday were some sound and robust observations that were legitimate and consistent with consideration of an issue that is under discussion by a committee. Of course I shall convey to my right hon. Friend that the right hon. Gentleman is now a convert to the Government's policy and their highly successful youth training scheme. The scheme is at the centre of the Government's policy against unemployment for the young and its growing success will be a part of our fortune.

Q3. Mr. Maples asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Maples: Will my right hon. Friend find time today to congratulate the England cricket team on coming back from the dead so spectacularly, and will he join me in expressing the hope that the Opposition do not discover how to pull off the same trick?

Mr. Biffen: I should be happy to comply with both parts of that request.

Mr. O'Brien: Will the Leader of the House convey to the Prime Minister the situation facing the unemployed in my constituency, which covers Leeds and Wakefield metropolitan district areas? Will he inform the Prime Minister that, over the past five years, eight collieries have closed in the West Yorkshire county council area and that the plight of the unemployed, particularly miners, is serious? Will he advise the right hon. Lady to do something about bringing in some resources to reduce unemployment in west Yorkshire?

Mr. Biffen: Of course I shall pass on that message, but I must say to the hon. Gentleman that a campaign to bring about greater employment must be run throughout the United Kingdom, not merely in one selected region or another. In that context, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take comfort, as I do, from the fact that 250,000 people are at work today who were not at work a year ago.

Q4. Mr. Fallon asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Fallon: Does my right hon. Friend accept that on the day when the victor of Enfield, Southgate is due to take his seat, many people outside the House will be appalled to learn that its facilities are extended to convicted terrorists, whatever their cause?

Mr. Biffen: I think that there was a hidden message in that question, and if it is what I imagine it is, I do not think that anything that I could say would be half as adequate as what was said by the Labour Chief Whip, the right hon. Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks).

Mr. Benn: In congratulating the Prime Minister on her visit to Communist China to hand over British colonial control in Hong Kong, may I ask the Leader of the House to teli the right hon. Lady that that creates an excellent precedent for ending colonial control in the Falklands, Gibraltar and Northern Ireland?

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman is in the market place of politics, and, very rightly, is marketing a very exotic brand that enables those issues to be linked. I think that we all understand why he sits where he does.

Q 5. Mr. Dover asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dover: Does my right hon. Friend accept that any announcement made later today about the reduction in the percentage that local authorities can spend on capital expenditure from receipts from council house sales will be a bitter disappointment and a let-down to hon. Members on both sides of the House who have supported council house sales when the construction industry is at such a low level as it is today? Would that not show that the Government are able to control public expenditure only by cutting capital spending?

Mr. Biffen: I note with interest what my hon. Friend has to say, and I am sure he will realise that I cannot anticipate what may be said later by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Q 6. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hughes: As it appears that the youth training scheme is to be compulsory, wjll the Leader of the House ask the Prime Minister whether she will ensure that machinery is set up to make sure that the scheme is not used, under any circumstances, for cheap labour?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman is getting a little over-excited in this pre-festive season. I merely ask him to await the outcome of the inquiry that is being presided over by my hon. Friend the Minister of State.

Mr. Ward: Is my right hon. Friend surprised that, in order to get the electors of Enfield to read its election literature, the Liberal party found it necessary to disguise it as Labour party propaganda?

Mr. Biffen: There must be a very snappy and succinct answer to that question, but, alas, it eludes me. All that I can say is that that did not seem to succeed.

Q7. Ms. Clare Short asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Ms. Short: Given the propaganda from the Government Benches suggesting that the answer to unemployment is to cut wage levels, is there any decent minimum which the right hon. Gentleman thinks the people of Britain should earn in return for employment, or does he want our wage levels to drop to the standard in Third world countries?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Lady is confusing the argument that we should keep an increase in wage levels to below the rate of inflation with all those other arguments which she now makes and which are a total distortion. Again, I must ask her to judge the policy, not her own rhetoric.

Ethiopia Refugees

3.30 pm

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport) (by private notice) asked the Minister for Overseas Development what urgent steps are being taken to fly in aid to the refugees from the Tigre province of Ethiopia who are now in camps in Sudan?

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): Eleven thousand, seven hundred and fifty tonnes of cereals aid from Britain for the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees were landed at Port Sudan in late November. We have just received a further appeal from the High Commissioner, and I have today decided to give £1 million to help him with this extremely serious problem.

Dr. Owen: While £1 million is helpful, does not the right hon. Gentleman recognise that supplies are now urgently needed, as day by day the number of people in these camps increases and no extra food is scheduled to come in through the ports until the end of January? Is not there an urgent need for Hercules aircraft to be made available to fly in from Cyprus, through Egypt, to Sudan and which could land at the airstrip at Kassala? That should be done in the next few days if we are not to see a repeat of terrible hardship.

Will the Minister also comment on the stories that these refugees are being bombed by MIGs of the Ethiopian air force and that those who are supporting the liberation force in Tigre are being compulsorily moved south? One of the reasons for moving into Sudan is their fear that they will be unable to continue to live in Tigre. They are being compulsorily moved into the south of Ethiopia in order to take them out of the province of Tigre. This is a serious humanitarian issue which is getting worse day by day. I hope that the Minister will make RAF aircraft available as urgently as he can.

Mr. Raison: I accept that this is a serious problem, to which I am giving close attention. One must think cautiously about whether it is best to move substantial quantities of grain by aircraft. The important thing is to get the supplies there, and that we aim to do.

As to the attacks that are reported to have been made on people coming from the Tigre area, I have today asked our Ambassador in Addis Ababa to make it clear to the Government there that we hope that they will do nothing to damage the movement of people or food in these areas. I discussed resettlement with General Mengistu and others when I was in Addis Ababa recently, and I made it clear that we would watch cautiously anything that was happening in this regard. We are absolutely right to do so, and I was right to resist his plea for endorsement of their resettlement policy.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): At the outset I wholeheartedly welcome my right hon. Friend's timely initiative. Having visited the camps concerned with my right hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery) only three weeks ago, I know that the situation on the ground is truly desperate. In the first camp we visited there were 25,000 Eritrean refugees and we were told that they were bombed by the Ethiopian air force, harassed by the Ethiopian army and driven from their homes by the Ethiopian armed forces. The Tigrean refugees were in a hideously desperate state. Unless the western Governments can find some way of dealing with the problem at source, and can get aid into those two provinces—huge areas of which are controlled by the Liberation forces and not by the Ethiopian Government—it will be difficult fully to alleviate the problem. Nevertheless, the Government of Sudan require every assistance, and what my right hon. Friend is providing is timely and welcome.

Mr. Raison: There is no doubt about the difficulty of getting food to these areas. I believe that the right way to get it there is through the medium of the experienced voluntary agencies. As for the bombing, I have already made my position clear on that point.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): If the Minister has not already done so, will he take steps to estimate the total likely drain of refugees into the Sudan in the next two to three months or more?

Mr. Raison: The best estimate I have is that arrivals by 15 December totalled 110,000 and that a further 150,000 to 160,000 might be expected by the end of March. Those are very substantial figures.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the only possible excuse for the vast grain mountains which are being piled up in Europe under the common agricultural policy would be the adoption of a policy of the utmost generosity towards not only the Sudan and Ethiopia but also the other countries of the southern Sahara which are desperately affected by the present famine and drought? Will my right hon. Friend consider the suggestion that Hercules aircraft should be provided? It is not just a question of supplies but of getting them there in time.

Mr. Raison: I accept entirely the point made by my hon. Friend that it is imperative to find ways of getting supplies to where they are most needed in time. We are considering carefully the best way to do this. As for the European grain mountain, I am sure that my hon. Friend will have noticed the recent decision of the European Community to provide no fewer than 1·2 million tonnes of grain before the next harvest. That is a very substantial quantity.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Is the Minister aware of the scale of the wheat surpluses not only in continental Europe but in Britain? Authoritative estimates suggest that 3 million tonnes of surplus wheat will be carried over from the current year into the crop year after the next harvest. Can the Minister not make a virtue of this surplus and ensure that before it is too late sufficient of this vitally needed food is transported to the areas where it is desperately needed.

Mr. Raison: I really do believe that the total of 1·2 million tonnes to which I have just referred represents a very substantial quantity of grain. It will be supplemented by very large contributions from the United States, Canada and other large scale grain producers.

Mr. Jim Lester (Broxtowe): My right hon. Friend's announcement is indeed to be welcomed, but will he also recognise from his visit to Ethiopia that not only food but blankets and all sorts of medical supplies are urgently required in these camps? The figures which my right hon. Friend has been given of the number of people on the move from Eritrea and Tigre into Sudan are only part of the problem. My right hon. Friend probably knows that 150,000 refugees from within the Sudan have moved to the Gezira region. It is a much bigger refugee problem than we realise.

Mr. Raison: I believe that I do understand the vastness of the problem, and I hope that I am taking appropriate action to deal with it. I accept my hon. Friend's point that it is not just a food problem. Immediately upon my return from Ethiopia I ordered a further consignment of 18,000 blankets to help to deal with the very severe problem of cold in some of these areas.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): How many trucks has Britain sent?

Mr. Raison: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): Will my right hon. Friend accept that although he is being implored by all sides of the House to send more and more aid, this country and the western world have to remember that the root cause of many of these problems is not just the drought but the viciousness of the régimes and complete administrative collapse. If we continue on this course, will my right hon. Friend accept that we shall be sending aid to almost every country in Africa, not just for one year but for the foreseeable future?

Mr. Raison: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend that the problems of Africa owe a great deal to maladministration and occasionally to viciousness on the part of the Governments concerned. But the fact remains that the human need is so enormous that we have no alternative but to respond as effectively and quickly as we possibly can.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Is the Minister aware—[HON. MEMBERS: "Boo."]—that this year the Government are likely to spend some £30 million on storing grain for no good purpose whatsoever — [Interruption.] Will he tell the House exactly how much money is being spent on food aid this year to the African countries that are suffering drought? Is not the continual production of grain for stockpiling in Europe an insult—[HON. MEMBERS: "The hon. Gentleman is an insult"]—to the poorest people in north Africa and should not his Government in future be diverting resources to development aid to those countries that are suffering so badly this year?

Mr. Raison: I have already given the House an idea of the substantial quantity of grain that is being committed to the support of Africa in the coming year. One fully understands that grain in store appears to be instantly available for dispatch, but there is a real cost to that. The cost of storing a tonne of grain for one year is about £25, but distributing it on the ground in Ethiopia is about £245.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that 80 per cent. of aid from the EEC is allocated to francophone countries and none to Sudan? If that is so, will he make certain that those decisions are reversed?

Mr. Raison: I very much doubt whether that is the case, but I shall certainly make sure that in discussions about how to use community aid in the coming year we shall ensure that it goes where it is most needed.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Is the Minister aware that my constituency has one of those grain warehouses stuffed to the roof with food grain? My constituents cannot understand, and neither can I, why that grain should remain there when there is famine in Africa.

Mr. Raison: As I have just said in reply to an earlier question, we must realise that there is a substantial cost in moving grain. Nevertheless, the Community, and our other major Western partners, have agreed to the shipment of substantial quantities of grain over the coming months.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Will my right hon. Friend explain why only 1·2 million tonnes are being released from the European intervention stocks, in view of the cost of keeping it there, when I was told by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food the other day that 10 million tonnes are currently in surplus in intervention stocks?

Mr. Raison: The point that I have just been making is that the cost of moving the grain is incomparably greater than the cost of storing the grain. We cannot doubt that fact. The 1·2 million tonnes which will be provided by the Community will make a major contribution to the problem that faces us.

Mr. Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Is it the case, as reported in The Times today, that voluntary workers have been critical of the way in which the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has conducted affairs in southern Sudan? Has the right hon. Gentleman made any representations on that? I urge the right hon. Gentleman to be generous with grain, but will he point out that if many of the hon. Members who have been making the point about it had their way, there would be no grain in surplus to distribute?

Mr. Raison: It is certainly true that the surplus stocks produced by the common agricultural policy do enable us to get hold of grain fairly easily when the need arises.

I have not had detailed complaints about the operations of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in Sudan, but if there are feelings that he is not doing his job properly, I should be willing to take that up with him.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Of all the causes of mass starvation in Africa, including overpopulation and bad government, there is one—famine—which is not now beyond the capacity of man to overcome. What are the United Kingdom Government doing to lead an international campaign to eliminate famine?

Mr. Raison: We have this year, either bilaterally or through our membership of the EC, provided over £66 million of drought-related assistance to Africa, and we intend to continue, in conjunction with our partners—the Community, the World Bank and so on—to play a big part in trying to tackle the enormous development problems which face the African continent.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): The Minister must be aware of the judgment by War on Want and other agencies that, if there were no war in this area, there need be no famine. Why is he still washing his hands of the war? When he saw General Mengistu, did he or did he not ask for the Dergue Government to declare a cease-fire in response to the offer of safe passage made by the liberation fronts? Surely he is aware that the British public are scandalised by the fact that, while through aid efforts we are seeking to save life in Ethiopia, the Addis Government appear ready to take it.

Mr. Raison: I said to the Ethiopian Government that I hoped that they would do all that they could to allow the movement of aid to those areas where it is most needed. As I have told the hon. Gentleman and the House before, I believe that the best way of dealing with the problem is by working through the voluntary agencies and the International Red Cross. To ask the Ethiopian Government to do something that they certainly would not do will not really help to deal with this very difficult problem.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take points of order afterwards.

Mr. Snape: With respect——

Mr. Speaker: There is no "with respect" about it. I shall take points of order afterwards.

Local Authority Capital Expenditure (England)

3.45 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I will make a statement about local authority capital expenditure in England in the coming financial year. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales will be making a statement later.

Since May 1979, local authorities in England have sold more than 600,000 homes to their tenants. The success of this policy, coupled with sales of other assets, has generated very substantial capital receipts which local authorities have been able to spend over a period of time. This statement is about the consequences for next year's capital spending programme.

On 18 July I explained to the House that in 1983-84 there had been an overspend of £368 million on the main local authority cash limit for capital expenditure. I warned that we could be heading for a much larger overspend this year. That was why I had to ask local authorities to exercise restraint.

Most authorities have complied with my request and I am grateful to them, but some have chosen to ignore it. So although the amount of the overspend this year has certainly been reduced it is still likely to be higher than in 1983-84 and I must therefore maintain my appeal for restraint for the rest of this financial year.

Consequent upon the Government's decisions published by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his autumn statement, I have to announce that plans for local authority capital spending in England for next year will be just over £4 billion. Receipts are expected to be about £2·1 billion and the cash limit on net expenditure is therefore being set at £1·95 billion. This net figure forms part of the Government's public expenditure planning total for next year. Any excess would be a potential charge on the contingency reserve.

Unless corrective action is taken, local authorities could well breach the cash limit next year as happened in 1983-84 and is happening this year. The problem arises because the accumulated reserves of capital receipts are now estimated at some £5 billion.

Those reserves belong to the local authorities. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"] What is at issue is the pace at which they may be spent. To reduce the risk of overspending next year we have to reduce the proportion of receipts which an authority may spend in any one year. For housing receipts, the prescribed proportion will be reduced from 40 per cent. to 20 per cent. from next April. For other receipts—for example, from the sale of land —the proportion will be 30 per cent. Local authorities will continue to have the right to use the balance of their receipts, but spread over a longer period. Without these changes, there is little doubt that there would have been substantial overspending next year. This in turn would be bound to lead to disruptive mid-year corrective action. It is clearly in the interests of local authorities to reduce that risk.

We shall be notifying individual authorities of their allocations shortly. I am honouring the assurance that I gave last year that housing allocations would be at least 80 per cent. of those for the present year.

Authorities that have complied in full with my request for restraint this year will receive an extra allocation next year amounting to an extra 5 per cent. across all service blocks. I estimate that this may add about £100 million to the total of allocations.

To help local authorities to plan their capital programme we are increasing from 2 per cent. to 5 per cent. the right to carry forward an underspend of the national cash limit from one year to the next. There will also be a margin of 5 per cent. above the cash limit up to which no corrective action within the year will be sought.

Subject to the same sort of provisos as last year, I can repeat last year's assurance that for the housing and other services blocks, allocations for 1986-87 will be at least 70 per cent. of those for the current year. For 1987-88, authorities can count on receiving at least 80 per cent. of 1985-86 allocations.

Apart from those assurances, the decisions that I have announced today relate only to 1985-86. I am consulting the local authority associations about possible changes to the system for the longer term.

Hon. Members: Resign!

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): Is the Secretary of State aware that his statement will be received with horror by people on housing waiting lists, by those waiting for improvement grants, and by workers and management in the building industry? Does not his announcement represent another humiliating defeat for himself and his Department at the hands of the Treasury? Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that, stripped of the jargon, he has today announced a cut of £400 million in housing investment and the freezing of £1·2 billion of local authorities' own assets—their own money? Will not the consequences of this decision be appalling for all those in difficulty in the housing sector — for people wanting homes as well as those engaged in the industry?

Does not the statement show to be sheer hypocrisy the comments of the Minister for Housing and Construction last Friday? The Minister said:

"Homelessness is taken into account in deciding housing investment".—[Official Report, 14 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 1339.]

Does the statement not mark the introduction of another draconian control by the freezing of local authorities' own cash in the bank? Will the Secretary of State tell us how his statement will help the homeless, the building and contruction industry or unemployed building workers? What credible macro-economic arguments can he adduce to support his decision?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there are 1·25 million households on local authority waiting lists, almost 200,000 households living in overcrowded accommodation, 2,500,000 dwellings requiring repairs and 78,000 households which are homeless at present?

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): The Government do not care.

Dr. Cunningham: The right hon. Gentleman's announcement today will have a catastrophic effect on owner-occupiers, more than 100,000 of whom are currently waiting for improvement grants. Will the right hon. Gentleman assure us that we shall have a debate on his announcement in Government time so that the House can debate these crucial issues and decide whether it will agree with what has been announced today?

Will the right hon. Gentleman also confirm that, in the best year of the Government's housing policy, there were 214,000 starts, a figure which fell short by 50,000 of the lowest total achieved under the preceding Labour Government? Will the right hon. Gentleman also recognise that the current building programme is heading for the lowest number of completions of council houses ever recorded, and the second lowest total for all housing completions?

The statement is a kick in the teeth for the building and construction industry. It flies in the face of all the advice that the right hon. Gentleman and his ministerial colleagues have received, right across the board, from employers' federations, the Royal Institute of British Architects, the CBI, the TUC, Shelter, the Shelter Housing Aid Centre, the Institute of Housing and everyone concerned with housing problems.

Will the right hon. Gentleman finally admit that his statement is yet another blow to the shire counties, because their authorisation for expenditure of their own receipts is reduced from 50 per cent. to 30 per cent.—and that in a week when the Audit Commission urged that capital investment by education authorities should be increased to meet the problems of education, especially in the shire counties?

Since the Government came to office, there has been a 64 per cent. cut in real terms in housing investment programmes. Even when capital receipts are taken into account, the figure is still 54 per cent. The Government are now spending less than 50 per cent. of what the Labour Government spent on Britain's housing needs. It is a disgrace.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman does not seem, even now, to have hoisted on board the fact that it has been the Government's policy consistently since we took office in 1979 to——

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): To cut everything.

Mr. Jenkin: —to help the private sector to recognise that the great majority of people wish to become owner-occupiers. It is in the context of the expansion of owner-occupation that the success of the Government's policy is to be seen.

The hon. Gentleman seems to be under the illusion that, somehow, the announcement that I have made today represents a further reduction in spending on housing beyond what was announced in the autumn statement. He is quite wrong and he ought to know that the figure which was agreed last month for housing investment was £3·055 billion. It remains £3·055 billion. The measures that I have announced today are intended to ensure that that figure of £3·055 billion is delivered. As for the effect on the building industry, perhaps I might remind the hon. Gentleman that its output grew last year by 4 per cent. in real terms. It has grown by a further 4 per cent. this year and the latest forecast, which has taken account of the autumn statement, says that that output is likely to be maintained or even increased slightly next year. The forecast was produced by the Building Materials Producers Association.

The hon. Gentleman referred to homelessness. He might note that there are today more than 25,000 local authority homes which have been empty for more than one year. [HON. MEMBERS: "They need repairs."] They are homes that local authorities could well use to deal with the problem of homelessness. As for improvement grants, I made it clear when the autumn statement was published that the Government gave a substantial boost to home improvement grants to the private sector and that the number increased tenfold over what had been done by the Labour Government. However, we did not see that as a permanent feature of housing policy—it was a two-year boost. The hon. Gentleman asked whether there would be a debate. That is a matter to be fixed through the usual channels, but the change in the prescribed proportion requires to be made by order.

Hon. Members: Resign.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand, and even hear, the strong feelings of hon. Members on this matter, but another statement and an important Estimates debate are to follow, I propose to allow questions on this statement to continue for half an hour before I call the next statement.

Mr. Geoffrey Rippon (Hexham): Into what state of decay is our physical environment to be allowed to sink before the Government recognise the distinction between just spending money and investing it to create real jobs and real wealth? Will we have to wait for a typhoid epidemic or some other disaster before the Government will permit essential expenditure on infrastructure in our towns and cities?

Mr. Jenkin: The Government maintain a substantial programme of spending on infrastructure. Because my right hon. and learned Friend chose to mention typhoid, may I remind him that only this year we announced a significant increase in the capital investment in the water industries. I hope that that investment has his approval. A higher proportion of local authority capital expenditure is, rightly, spent on the refurbishment and renovation of defective housing stock. Only this year, we added a new factor to the generalised needs index to take account of the obligations of local authorities to improve defective housing.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): How is it that the Secretary of State can tell the House, as he did in July, that capital spending makes a valuable contribution to this country's infrastructure and then be party to a policy which, a few years ago, first told off local authorities for not spending their capital, then provided them under the right-to-buy law with an opportunity to have more capital to spend, and now tells them that they cannot do as they choose with the money which, as the right hon. Gentleman says, is theirs? That leaves 800,000 people without homes this Christmas. How is that justifiable by any Government's policy at any time?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman has ignored the fact that since the system of capital control was introduced, it has always been recognised that local authorities could spend in any one year only a proportion of their receipts and that the balance would be carried forward for spending in another year. The proportions that operated during the last couple of years have led to a substantial capital overspend on the national cash limit. I have announced a reduction in the proportions that may be spent in one year, but the local authorities will keep their receipts and will be entitled to spend them in the years ahead. The local authorities will phase their spending more sensibly to be within the Government's cash limits. That is a perfectly sensible policy.

Mr. Francis Pym (Cambridgeshire, South-East): Does my right hon. Friend appreciate that this highly restrictive policy will be greeted by local government with a sense of injustice? Is this not another example of central direction and control? Is there any prospect of my right hon. Friend unlocking historic receipts which represent a substantial fund of assets that could be invested for the benefit of the community and, incidentally, help employment? Can my right hon. Friend hold out any hope that he will establish a long-term basis upon which the relationship with local government can be conducted unmolested by frequent ad hoc intervention by the Government?

Mr. Jenkin: Taking the last point first, my right hon. Friend will have heard that I am discussing with the local authority associations revised arrangements for the capital control system, which is not perfect and cannot be in operation for next year. I hope that a satisfactory arrangement can be operated in the years ahead. My right hon. Friend talked about unlocking capital receipts, but, in recent years, local authorities have made substantial use of their capital receipts. Our problem is that the overhang could give rise to a large potential overspend on the national cash limit which forms part of the public expenditure total. As my right hon. Friend knows, for years it has been the practice of successive Governments when drawing their bottom line to include a maximum figure for local authority capital spending. I am trying to ensure that that figure will be delivered and not substantially overspent.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): In the face of the decay of housing in part of my constituency, did the Secretary of State instigate this policy and take it into Cabinet, or can it be called the revenge of the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Mr. Jenkin: The right hon. Gentleman should not read some of the nonsensical statements in the press about that. Before the autumn statement, the Cabinet agreed the total of £3·055 billion to be spent on the housing programme next year by local authorities, new towns and the Housing Corporation. That is the figure that stands today. I have announced measures to ensure that the cash limit is not substantially overspent. The Government of whom the right hon. Gentleman was a distinguished Member followed that practice. It is a responsible practice. On 6 December, the House approved the autumn statement and its figures. It is necessary to ensure that those figures can be delivered, and that is what I have announced today.

Mr John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that £2·3 billion is locked up in local authority coffers in long-term mortgages granted to people who have exercised their right to buy? In view of falling interest rates, would it not be in the interests of those council's ratepayers, as much as in the interests of the borrowers of those mortgages, if that money were made available to building societies, thereby releasing money for local authorities to spend?

Mr. Jenkin: I can confirm the figure of £2·3 billion on the local authority books. If local authorities can sell their mortgage books to building societies or other financial institutions, there would be an addition to their receipts and a prescribed proportion of those receipts could be added to the sums local authorities spend on capital investment.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the Secretary of State aware that, because of his Christmas message today, tens of thousands of families continue to live in housing misery and some 25 per cent. of all building workers will remain on the dole? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, if he had the slightest sense of self-respect he would resign rather than allow the Chancellor to have this victory over him today?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman seems to forget that I am announcing capital expenditure by local authorities of more than £4 billion. That is a substantial sum by any standard. In these circumstances, and when the building industry is happily expanding—it has grown by 4 per cent. in two successive years—it is not unreasonable that the public sector should be expected to live within the cash limits that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has published.

Mr. Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): When these matters were discussed in Cabinet, did my right hon. Friend tell his colleagues that this country urgently needs a major new house building programme to provide homes for the homeless and jobs for the jobless?

Mr. Jenkin: I am sure that my hon. Friend recognises that, overwhelmingly, people want to buy and live in the homes they own. It is right, therefore, that the private sector of the building industry should be given every encouragement to provide those homes for potential home owners. There is, of course, a need for housing for special groups — the disabled, elderly, and so on — [Interruption.] The programme I have announced allows substantial sums to be invested next year by local authorities and the Housing Corporation to provide for those special needs. I do not regard it as part of the normal duty of local authorities to provide huge volumes of new housing for general occupation.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): What sort of house do you live in?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Is the Secretary of State aware that many of us accepted the principle of the sale of council houses as rational and reasonable and, in fact, in some ways overdue? That sale was sought on the basis of the fact that the receipts from the sales would accrue to local authorities. What the Secretary of State is doing today will be regarded by those local authorities as a sordid swindle.

Mr. Jenkin: The right hon. Gentleman is quite wrong. Nothing that I have said takes that money away from the local authorities. All that I am asking them to do—many people would regard it as a sensible way to spend capital money—is to phase spending over a number of years, so that the total of capital spending is in accordance with the Government's overall spending priorities.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend understand that most local authorities will look upon this as yet another hammer blow against their freedoms of action? Does he further understand, or has anyone advised him, about the housing decay and the infrastructure that decays by the day in our cities? Will he explain to the House how it can be harmful to the economy to turn one capital asset into repairing and maintaining other capital assets? Does he not understand that, if we go on as we are now, with these voodoo economics, where we stick pins in all those people who carried out the policies that most of us believed in, we shall have no freedoms left, we shall have no homes left, and we shall have no sound and sane cities left. Will he change those policies at last and restore some sense and balance between local and central Government?

Mr. Jenkin: I admire the inventiveness of my hon. Friend's language more than the economic logic of his argument. My hon. Friend has considerable understanding of financial matters. He will be aware, therefore, that local authorities, which have used accumulated receipts to pay off loans or reduce the overall balance between their borrowing and lending, and which now want to use those receipts to undertake new capital expenditure, will inevitably have to increase their net borrowing to finance it. That is bound to bring pressure upon the public sector borrowing requirement. Although it is entirely right that substantial sums should nevertheless be spent on housing and other local authority capital projects — I have already given the House the figures—it is necessary to phase it over a number of years and not to allow substantial sums to be concentrated in a single year and so put the borrowing requirement under pressure.

Mr. J. D. Concannon (Mansfield): Does the Secretary of State hold clinic mornings in his constituency? If he does, he must realise that more and more people are going to see their Member of Parliament about not having a house, or about a house that is falling down and requires repairs, and about a lack of grant? Will the Minister answer those points, and at the same time inform me and many other people why anyone should want to be a councillor under this Government?

Mr. Jenkin: Local authorities have a wide measure of discretion in what they spend——

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Can you hear?

Mr. Jenkin: —but most local authorities have always recognised that for revenue and capital spending they live within the broad limits which the Government propose and the House approves. All I am asking this year is that, after two years—[Interruption.] No, what I am asking—it is for the House to decide—is that after two years when the local authorities capital cash limit was substantially overspent and involved substantial claims on the contingency reserve, and faced with the potential overspend next year, we should take steps to do what we can to keep it under control. That is a reasonable thing, which any Government faced with the same problem would do.

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): As there is apparently now some £5 billion accumulated reserves, can my right hon. Friend explain why we should be asking councils to pursue our policy of selling council houses, when plainly that is no longer of much benefit to them? Will he be kind enough to explain to me why those reserves cannot be used to help the manifest deterioration of the housing stock which is visible in many of our large cities?

Mr. Jenkin: On the first point, the main engine for the sale of council houses has been the right to buy. That gives the tenant the right to demand, subject to the legislation, that he should be entitled to buy the house in which he lives. That right to buy is unimpaired. It is as strong as ever. It will result in substantial further sales of council houses to their tenants. I know that that has a great deal of support on both sides of the House. The question of how far and how fast local authorities may spend their accumulated capital receipts must be considered in the context of the public expenditure programme as a whole. It would make no sense to allow the expenditure to become bunched, as there is every prospect that it would, so as substantially to exceed the cash limit which the Chancellor has established, and which was approved by the House when it approved the autumn statement. It would throw the Government's economic planning into disarray.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): The Secretary of State will be aware that, during his visit to Liverpool, he recognised that Liverpool had the worst housing in the United Kingdom. What prospect does that local authority have of improving it, in view of the fact that today he is turning the screws again on local authorities, ignoring their needs, and further damaging the construction industry, in which there is unemployment of about 30 per cent. in that area?

Mr. Jenkin: I am well aware of the serious housing conditions in Liverpool. I and my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction have been to see them. I hope that the leaders of Liverpool city council will now agree to resume discussions with officials of my Department in the normal way, as every other local authority has done, so that we can agree a sensible HIP allocation. There is no sense in starting to shout and indulge in slogans accusing me of breaking promises when I have done no such thing.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): My right hon. Friend will remember that the Housing Act 1980 contained a special provision designed to prevent houses in designated rural areas migrating from homes into holiday homes. Will he therefore exempt the operation of the buy-back provisions from the capital controls? The sums of money involved are small, but, without that exemption, the will of Government and Parliament in that respect could, in practice, be frustrated.

Mr. Jenkin: I understand the importance which my hon. Friend attaches to that matter. I shall, if I may, write to him about it.

Mr. Janner: What possible logic can there be in requiring a city such as Leicester, as the Minister has now done, to freeze its housing money after last week requiring it to use its reserve to put down the rates? When a council is thereby forced to cut its contracts and to go back on its contractual obligations, who will pay the penalties? Will it be the Government or the ratepayer? Who will benefit? Will it be the unemployed?

Mr. Jenkin: The ratepayers of Leicester will benefit because Leicester city council, having built up substantial revenue reserves, is only to be asked to disgorge some of them for the benefit of its ratepayers. It has nothing to do with capital reserves.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): What calculation has my right hon. Friend made of the effect of this economically incomprehensible statement on the number of unemployed in the construction industry?

Mr. Jenkin: The economics of this statement are in support of a policy that my hon. Friend has supported consistently for the past five years — that the Government should keep their borrowing and spending under tight control. That is the policy upon which we are engaged with the support of a large number of people in this country. Capital spending by local authorities next year at over £4 billion is as provided in the autumn statement. All that I am asking is that the spending of the accumulations of capital should be spread over a reasonable period. That is why I am proposing the alteration to the prescribed proportion.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): Will the Secretary of State accept that thousands of council tenants in constituencies such as mine will never be able to afford to buy their homes and are condemned to live in damp, vandalised, substandard accommodation? Does he accept that thousands of building trade workers are looking for a job, and that local authorities are sitting on more than £4 billion of capital receipts? In those circumstances how can he justify preventing local councils from spending their money on what needs to be done now, not at an unspecified date in the future?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman should know that in many inner cities there have been between 40 and 50 successful examples of housing estates, where councils have entered into partnership with private developers to refurbish the estate. I hope that more councils will see that as a solution to the problem of their run-down inner city estates. Regarding the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I have nothing to add to what I have already said.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the housing stock in the royal borough of Kingston upon Thames is extremely well managed, and that that council began selling council houses to tenants before many other councils? Will he ensure that the council is not penalised because of the profligacy of authorities represented by many Labour Members? Will he guarantee that the council will be able to carry out Government policy by renovating run-down, inter-war stock and providing improvement grants for owner-occupiers?

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. Friend will have noticed that I announced an additional 5 per cent. to the allocations of the majority of authorities which complied with my request for restraint last year. He will also note—the point was impressed hard on us by a number of those who came to see my hon. Friends and me about the request for restraint—that the complaint was made that we were penalising authorities that had already sold assets and had receipts, to the advantage of those that still had assets to sell. The new prescribed proportions that I announced today will apply equally to in-year receipts and accumulated receipts. Therefore, there will be no discrimination against those who have already acquired them.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): When the Secretary of State says that he has not announced any new cuts in housing expenditure in his statement, is he saying that the figures for housing expenditure in the Chancellor's autumn economic statement included the prescribed proportion of accumulated capital receipts? Or will he admit that in announcing a reduction in that proportion today from 40 per cent. to 20 per cent., he has announced a new cut in housing expenditure?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. I have announced measures that will be necessary to deliver the housing figures that were in the autumn statement. The autumn statement included figures for local authority capital expenditure, and the measures are to prevent a substantial overspend of those figures.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): I am sure that my right hon. Friend will accept that the powers enjoyed by local authorities are derived from powers given to them by the House. However, is he not worried that at a time of recession capital expenditure has been cut more than current expeniture, and that as a result, the type of investment that can lead us out of the recession has been needlessly docked?

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. He will know that during the past four or five years local authority revenue expeniture has substantially exceeded the guidelines laid down by the House. For that reason, we have inevitably had to consider other areas of expenditure to keep the Government's total within the limits approved by the House. I entrirely agree with my hon. Friend that if we can get local authorities' current expenditure down —we are doing that through rate capping—we can take an easier view of their capital spending.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): Why does not the Secretary of State come clean? Is he not forcing local authorities to increase their balances so that he can further cut their grants next year? Is he aware that not even the Prime Minister defines overspending as spending one's own money?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman is confusing revenue balances with capital balances. They have nothing to do with each other.

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): Is my right hon. Friend aware that a number of reasonable district councils are becoming increasingly frustrated at seeing their reasonable ambitions thwarted in spite of the fact that they are based on the successful implementation of a very popular policy? Will he consider their exasperation? Do I understand that the implications of his remarks are that if his number-crunching does not come out right this year, he will consider a moratorium next year?

Mr. Jenkin: In answer to my hon. Friend's first point, I am well aware of the disappointment of authorities. He is right to mention small district authorities, which may not have large capital expenditure programmes but whose programmes are dear to their hearts. I ask that programmes are phased over a period of years so that in aggregate the spending does not exceed the limits laid down by the Government. On my hon. Friend's second point, I hope that the measures I have taken will avoid any severe mid-term disruption. I have already said that we agree that there can be a 5 per cent. margin, with no question of coming to the House and asking for futher restraint. If an excess goes substantially beyond that, I do not rule out the need to come to the House and ask for restraint.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Is the Secretary of State aware that if we accept the Treasury cuts —they are Treasury cuts—his Christmas message, as clear as a bell, will be no homes for the homeless? Instead of passively accepting the Treasury's decision, why does he not recognise, in the light of our exchanges this afternoon, that nearly the entire House is against the Treasury, and that it can be defeated? If he mobilises hon. Members on both sides, he can ensure that the Treasury treats these cuts as it treated the proposed cuts in student grants.

Mr. Jenkin: I hear what the right hon. Gentleman says. I would quarrel with him in his use of the word "passive". I recognise that the measure will be a disappointment to local authorities because they will be asked to spread their capital spending over a longer period than they had hoped. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to accept that the measure is in the interest of the overall management of public spending and that it is part of the policy that the Government have followed for many years.

Mr. Den Dover (Chorley): If the Secretary of State sincerely believes that construction has increased during the past few years, why has the number of building workers out of work increased? Is he fully prepared to listen to the view of the construction industry, which will be exasperated and frustrated, and will show sheer disbelief at his announcement?

Mr. Jenkin: I assure my hon. Friend that I took many opportunities to listen to the views of the construction industry. The figures that I quoted about the 4 per cent. in real terms expansion last year, the further 4 per cent. in real terms expansion this year, and the prospects of maintaining or even increasing that growth next year, are accepted by the construction industry. They represent a welcome turn-round from earlier years.

Mr. Reg Freeson (Brent, East): Is it not the case that DoE officials have great doubts about those statistics? Will the Secretary of State please tell the House and my constituents in Brent how many of the 1,000 families who are living in bed and breakfast accommodation and other temporary hostels will be rehoused if the Government continually cut capital expenditure? Will he tell the construction industry and the House how we shall carry out the £10 billion worth of work on faulty houses and the £20 billion of expenditure required on private housing to bring them up to a decent standard? How does he expect that work to be done while he cuts capital expenditure?

Mr. Jenkin: To take the right hon. Gentleman's last point, the Government have never accepted and do not accept, that it is the responsibility of the taxpayer to maintain private houses. It is the responsibility of their owners. However, for people at the bottom of the incomes scale there can be a limited system of housing improvement grants, and I ask the right hon. Gentleman to await the consultation paper that we shall publish soon. There was a full debate on homelessness in the House on Friday and I commend to the right hon. Gentleman the speech made then by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Is it not true that authorities such as Bromley, which have enthusiastically carried out the Government's policy of selling houses and land, are being positively penalised by the Government? Can my right hon. Friend explain, in layman's terms that non-economists can understand, why he will prevent authorities such as Bromley from carrying out projects that would create local employment, that would be paid from their resources and that could not possibly affect the PSBR?

Mr. Jenkin: I must ask my hon. Friend to accept that it has been a continuing policy of the Government for five years to try to control the general level of public spending and borrowing. There is no way in which that can exclude capital spending. I share my hon. Friend's aim, whereby, by achieving better control over local authority revenue overspending, we could devote more resources to capital spending. But until we can do that I must ask local authorities to live within the overall cash limit that the Government have laid down and that the House has approved.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I said that I would end questions on this statement at 4.30 pm, but there appears to be great interest in it. Therefore, I propose to allow questions to continue for not more than another 10 minutes. Then we must move to the next statement, in fairness to those who are anxious to speak later.

Mr. Simon Hughes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think I shall take a point of order now. It simply takes up time.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Can the Secretary of State advise me about what I should tell my constituents in my surgery this Saturday when they ask me why the local authority is refusing to give them improvement grants, to repair their homes or to carry out modernisation, when they know that next year Allerdale district council will be carrying at least £3·5 million in its balances on capital receipt account? How can we answer the complaints of those constituents who have a genuine grievance and who demand action from the public authorities?

Mr. Jenkin: The first answer that the hon. Gentleman should give to his constituents is that it is for the local authority to determine its priorities within the overall spending limits that have been laid down. The hon. Gentleman should be able to explain to his constituents that there cannot be unlimited spending either on capital or revenue accounts, and that inevitably, if the figures are to add up at the end of the day, the Government are responsible for laying down the rate at which capital receipts can be spent—[Interruption.] I understand their problems, but it is the primary responsibility of those who own their homes to maintain them, not to ask the taxpayer to do so.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): Does my right hon. Friend accept that what really matters is not a Treasury forecast of what might become an overspend but the creation of jobs, and that there are few more sensible ways of doing that than by renovating the housing stock, which is not import-intensive? Is he aware that many of his colleagues sympathise with him, in that he and not the Chancellor has been forced to come to the House to present this defence? Does he not believe that the power of the Treasury has increased, is increasing and should be diminished?

Mr. Jenkin: I assure my hon. Friend that my announcement today is the policy of Her Majesty's Government, as determined by the Cabinet. There is no question of it being the policy of one Minister or another. My hon. Friend knows that there must be a limit on public spending if we are to maintain the strategy on which we have embarked. That must include capital spending. We cannot stand by idly and allow massive overspend on local authority capital accounts or any other capital accounts. That is the purpose of cash limits.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Should not two broad conclusions be drawn from the statement: first, that the Secretary of State has no support from Conservative Members for his miserable statement; and, secondly, that the Government and the Conservative party no longer give a damn about the poor and deprived who live in desperate housing need in the many deprived areas of Britain?

Mr. Jenkin: I refute completely the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question. We are making provision for more than £4,000 million of local authority and Housing Corporation investment, which will provide overwhelmingly for those at the bottom of the incomes scale. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw that accusation. On the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I am bound to say that I did not expect a warm welcome for my statement, but it is part of the responsibilities of office to come to the Chamber and tell people the truth.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): In his statement last week my right hon. Friend clobbered many local authorities run by his friends. What steps has he taken with this announcement not to clobber the same authorities?

Mr. Jenkin: I hope that my hon. Friend recognises the fact that we have deliberately set aside a sum that we estimate to be about £100 million to be added to the allocations of the responsible authorities which complied with my request of last July. I hope that that goes some way to meeting my hon. Friend's anxiety.

Mr. Jim Callaghan (Heywood and Middleton): Is the Secretary of State aware that earlier this year an all-party delegation of members of Rochdale borough council visited the Minister for Housing and Construction to express their grave anxiety about the housing stock in the Rochdale area? Is he further aware that, following our invitation, the Minister for Housing and Construction visited the borough and, at my personal invitation, visited the worst housing estate that I have ever seen — the Back o' the Moss estate—where he saw the dreadful conditions in which those human beings must exist? What Christmas message of good cheer do I have to take back to those good people?

Mr. Jenkin: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take time off during the Christmas recess to inspect in neighbouring Oldham the former Strinesdale estate, which conformed precisely to the description of the estate that he has just given but which, with the help of the private sector, has been substantially refurbished and is now a pleasant place in which to live. I hope that Rochdale borough council and many other councils that have similar estates will try to achieve in partnership with the private sector what they have been clearly unable to achieve on their own.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Did not my right hon. Friend hit the nail on the head in his previous answer? Is not the reality that £4,000 million is a hell of a lot of money? It amounts to £75 for every man, woman and child in the country, which every year represents £6 a week for a family of four? Is not the worst housing crisis in those areas, with largely Labour-controlled authorities, where housing resources have been violently mismanaged? Is not the answer to the problems of the taxpayer, the ratepayer and the homeless to privatise large sections of public authority housing?

Mr. Jenkin: I hope that we shall achieve greater private investment in inner city housing. There have been some successful pioneer schemes by several local authorities. My hon. Friend is right to say that that is the way in which we shall bring new hope and life to many decrepit, run-down areas.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Is the Secretary of State aware that the most pitiful aspect of his statement is that he seems to lack all knowledge of what is happening on the ground? Is he aware that Lawrie Barratt and others in the building industry have recently said that the joint venture schemes that the right hon. Gentleman has just described will no longer be able to continue as a result of the imposition of 15 per cent. VAT on building charges? Is he aware that the Sefton Conservative-controlled county council is one of the wax models into which he is sticking pins? Is he aware that there are already cases of dysentry in the Church Street estate in my constituency because that local authority, following his request for voluntary restraint, introduced a moratorium and has not got the money to put the drains or the houses right? Is he aware that today he has announced the death of the public sector building programme and that this is a worthy Christmas present from this Government to the homeless and the badly housed.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman is talking a great deal of rubbish. To describe expenditure of £4,000 million as the death of the public sector building programme is hyperbole which goes even beyond the hon. Gentleman's normal standard. My right hon. and hon. Friends and I are aware of many of the difficult housing conditions in our inner cities but we have to recognise that, over the years, despite the expenditure of large sums of public money, many of those problems have become worse. I point out the contrast where the private sector has come in, and many black spots have been turned into nice places in which to live.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Will my hon. Friend accept that effectively he is being accused of a cut in national investment? Will he put that accusation into perspective by confirming what I understand is the position, which is that last year there was an increase in both public and private investment and that, if current trends are followed, there will be an increase in that investment next year as well?

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. Friend is quite right. Construction output in the first three-quarters of this year is around £750 million up on the same period a year ago and the latest figures for new orders show a 6 per cent. increase in the 12 months up to the end of October over the previous 12 months. Private industrial orders are up by 30 per cent. and private commercial orders are up by 11 per cent. Hon. Members should bear those figures in mind when they complain about the impact on the construction industry.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): What has happened since November 1982? The Prime Minister said then, in the debate on the Queen's Speech:

> "We need more capital spending by local government and in the public sector generally."—[Official Report, 3 November 1982; Vol. 31, c. 21.]

Today, the Minister has announced a major change in Government policy. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the figures that he has just given for the construction industry show how badly the construction industry has been affected? Today, it is working at a level that is 50 per cent. lower than in 1974. Will he put a figure to the question that he was asked earlier about the effect of today's announcement on jobs? Does he agree that the effect, counting the indirects, will mean 100,000 fewer jobs in construction and building next year?

Is it not desirable that we should, whatever the mix of public and private investment, get housing building starts back to the level of even the lowest year under the last Labour Government? Does the Minister accept that we should improve, maintain and repair the housing stock at a rate that is at least equal to the rate at which it is deteriorating? I should like, and I think that the House would welcome, firm solid answers to those questions.

Does the Minister know what it is like to be homeless on a waiting list, knowing that the local authority does not have the money either to build or repair? Why has the Minister launched such an attack on young owner-occupiers, who have been encouraged to buy both in the public and private sectors on the firm Government promise that there would be improvement and repair grants to put in inside toilets, proper bathrooms, kitchens and to re-wire electrical systems? Why has the Minister produced such a policy today? In the 11 years that I have been in the House, this is the most contemptible and disgraceful statement that I have ever heard from any Minister.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman has asked many questions, some of which were repeats of questions that have already been asked——

Mr. Rooker: But not answered.

Mr. Jenkin: They were answered earlier in the exchanges.

The hon. Gentleman's last point was about home improvements grants policy. The Government have made it clear that the system of mandatory grants for essential amenities is an important part of our housing provision. That will remain, and I hope that those who have bought houses without basic amenities will be able to apply for those grants. They are mandatory. On the wider discretionary improvement grants, there is no question of anybody having been promised that there would for all time——

Mr. Rooker: Yes they were.

Mr. Jenkin: No. The hon. Gentleman should examine what has been said. There is no question of any promise that for all time there would be a system of discretionary grants, whether on the miserable level left behind by the Labour Government, or on the very much higher level that we achieved last year and the year before. It is primarily the responsibility of home owners to maintain their houses, and it is not the responsibility of the general body of taxpayers. That principle is warmly supported in many parts of the House.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Dr. Cunningham: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I normally take points of order at the end. Does this point of order rise directly out of the statement?

Dr. Cunningham: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a point of order to give you and the House notice that, following the next statement, I shall be seeking the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 so that we can have an immediate opportunity to discuss the implications of this statement.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is a point of order rising out of the statement.

We all understand that you have a somewhat difficult task, Mr. Speaker, when a Minister has to come to the Dispatch Box, and we understand that it is your job to select the people to ask him various questions. On this occasion, we understand that it was even more difficult. We realise that your job is to provide balance and to call a number of hon. Members supporting the Government and a number of hon. Members against. Is it not reaching a sordid level when Tory Whips have to go round to nobble a few people at the fag end of questions to get people to support the Government because everybody else is against them?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Marlow: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The last point of order was spurious, but in fairness, and as the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) called for balance, I shall take the further point of order.

Mr. Marlow: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The last remark made by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) was about Whips talking to Government Back Benchers. The Whips may have spoken to Back Benchers, but they did not speak to me.

Mr. Concannon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I shall be brief, and, as you know, Mr. Speaker, I do not usually raise points of order. However, I notice that the Leader of the House has been toing and froing during the statement and I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to make a statement on the future of this announcement, which has found few friends in the House? I understand that the Leader of the House has been out talking to the Patronage Secretary, and I have seen him out of the corner of my eye talking to you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have no idea why hon. Members leave the Chamber.

Local Authority Capital Expenditure (Wales)

4.47 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): Mr. Speaker, with permission I wish to make a statement about the future arrangements for controlling local authority capital spending in Wales and the level and distribution of capital resources in 1985-86. The decisions that I am announcing this afternoon—[Interruption.]

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think that I have had the desired effect, as things are quieter now. I could not hear a word that the Secretary of State was saying.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thank the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Edwards: The decisions that I am announcing this afternoon have to be seen against the background that since 1979-80 Welsh local authorities have invested, at 1984-85 prices, £2·2 billion in a wide range of projects which have significantly extended and improved the social and economic infrastructure in Wales. The Government's expenditure plans to be published in the forthcoming Public Expenditure White Paper, envisage that over the next three years they should invest a further £1 billion, again at 1984-85 prices. The largest service element within this total of £3·2 billion is some £1·4 billion in respect of housing.

In the course of the review of the control system which was announced in July, I have considered carefully the views both of the Welsh Counties Committee and the Committee of Welsh District Councils. They have emphasised the need for greater flexibility. They attached particular importance to being given a better view of the future trend in resources, and argued strongly for continued access to their reserve of accumulated receipts. Discussions on the way in which the system could be developed will continue in the new year.

Having taken full account of the associations' representations, the Government have decided to make a significant change to the rules governing the operation of the national cash limit. The present facility for carrying forward to the following year an underspend of up to 2 per cent. against the aggregate planning total, will be increased to 5 per cent. In addition, corrective action will not be taken to restrain spending if the cash limit is on course to be exceeded by less than 5 per cent. Any overspending will be taken into account when determining provision for a subsequent year. These changes should greatly reduce the possibility that we have to take corrective action part way through the year, and ensure that resources are not lost if there is only a moderate degree of underspending.

A principal reason for the capital overspending experienced in Wales in the last two years is that the allocation mechanism has not so far taken account of the inherent spending power provided by accumulated receipts. These are expected to amount to over £300 million next year, all but £10 million being in the district tier.

Districts argue that they should have complete freedom to spend their accumulated receipts; but not only would this have serious consequences for public expenditure control generally—and the level of PSBR—but it would enable them to spend a major part of their receipts twice. This is because while housing allocations issued since 1981-82 have been calculated to include a large proportion of receipts forecast to accrue in each year, at the same time districts have been able to borrow to finance the bulk of their housing spending without needing to use the receipts built into the allocation. For this reason, they have been able to accumulate large reserves. It is reasonable to place a measure of constraint on their ability to use these receipts for a second time.

I have, therefore, decided to phase the use of these receipts by reducing, but not eliminating, the proportion which can be used to enhance the spending power of allocations in any one year. In the case of housing the proportion will be reduced by 10 percentage points from 25 to 15 per cent.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Shame!

Mr. Edwards: For non-housing receipts the prescribed proportion will be 50 per cent. These changes should significantly reduce the pressure on the all-Wales cash limit.

Last year I gave authorities forward indications of capital allocations based on 80 per cent. and 70 per cent. for the two later years. This year I intend giving forward indications again, but linked to 80 per cent. for each year to provide a firmer basis for planning.

I turn now to the resources available for 1985-86. Gross expenditure provision underlying the cash limit for the coming year will be £349 million, marginally higher than the level of provision for the present year. When the law and order services are added the total is £354 million.

Within this figure gross provision for local authority housing is £146·5 million. Each authority will receive sufficient to cover the forward indications given them in July 1984. In addition, bids for an allocation to meet expenditure needs on privately and publicly owned prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings will be met in full. Bids for expenditure on enveloping schemes not covered by previous allocations will also be met in full. I am making provision to enable the two existing Welsh priority estates projects to continue and for a new scheme to commence.

The Housing Corporation's net capital provision will be £39 million. I expect receipts and private sector finance to enhance that total by another £3 million to £4 million.

Total resources for roads and transport, taking into account new receipts, amount to £64 million. Within this sum I have accepted just over £53 million for TSG purposes. This will enable the three new major highway projects announced in the Welsh Grand Committee last Wednesday to start in 1985.

Gross capital provision for other service blocks in 1985-86 is over £10 million higher than the projected level of spending in the current year—an increase from about £125 million to £135 million.

The enterprise zones have been given additional resources amounting to £2·3 million to further their development. In recognition of its regional status, the Polytechnic for Wales has also been given an individual allocation of £500,000 per annum over the next few years to promote its technological development.

Other allocations have been made for major coast protection works at Prestatyn, urgent refuse disposal schemes in Swansea, Rhondda and Ynys Môn, flood alleviation works in Denbigh, repairs to the Brecon and Monmouth canal, and towards the cost of replacing the headquarters of Powys county council, which have become structurally unsound.

The cash limit provision for 1985-86, which is gross spending less forecast receipts, is £249 million excluding law and order services. To calculate the total available for allocation the cash limit has added to it a proportion of housing receipts, and deducted from it estimates of expenditure not counting against allocations, such as leased vehicles and derelict land clearance. The total calculated in this way is £263 million. Of this sum about £14 million is being withheld from those district authorities which resolved to spend in excess of the voluntary restraint level for the present year. If the authorities concerned are able to realise sufficient additional receipts, all or part of the allocations withheld will be restored to them as soon as possible after the end of the present financial year. Details of allocations have been placed in the Library of the House, together with an explanatory note on the new arrangements.

I believe that the new framework for managing local authority capital spending in Wales represents a fair and reasonable compromise between the objectives of local and central government. Coupled with the level of resources that I have announced it is clear proof of the Government's desire to provide a firm foundation for a wide and effective programme of worthwhile capital schemes.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): Has not the bad news been camouflaged? However, the allocation for technological development at the Polytechnic of Wales and the 80 per cent. forward indications will be welcomed. The statement can be described as being serious for housing authorities. It has grave implications for district authority powers to spend on services other than housing.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the proportion of prescribed housing capital receipts. Does not a reduction to 15 per cent. represent a £27 million cut which will restrict the use of capital receipts for housing authorities in Wales? Is not this Scrooge-like and a poor Christmas present for the Welsh authorities?

Is not this bad news when added to the loss of about £30 million of capital spending power in the next year from non-housing capital receipts? The right hon. Gentleman appears to have had a drubbing from the Treasury. Clearly the Chancellor is out of control in terms of Welsh public expenditure needs.

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Association of District Councils believes that casualties are inevitable in environmental improvement schemes, tourist projects, plans for seaside towns, the building of factories, infrastructure services for the entrepreneurial industrial innovator and recreational projects? Does not private enterprise insist upon such services before it locates industries?

Does not the statement mean fewer jobs in the building and construction industries than there were when the right hon. Gentleman took office? Does not the 1983-84 gross housing expenditure, compared with the proposed figure for 1985-86, point to a £60 million reduction? Is there not a decline in real terms of 25 per cent. for 1985-86 when comparison is made with the 1979-80 gross housing capital expenditure? Does the right hon. Gentleman guarantee that the new rules will prevent overspending and that the midnight moratorium is a thing of the past? Are not the Welsh housing associations pottering along at only one sixth of their capacity, being prevented from making a dynamic contribution to the solution of our housing problems? Has the right hon. Gentleman not failed to give them an effective boost?

Is he aware that about 4,000 skilled building workers in Wales are now on the dole and that at least 14,000 unskilled building workers have lost their jobs since he took office? Are there not immense queues for renovation grants throughout Wales? Does he know that 39 per cent. of housing in Wales is of the pre-1919 era, especially in the south-east valleys? Is he aware that one third of these properties are in serious disrepair? South Wales has one of the worst records of homelessness of all areas in the United Kingdom and there are bleak forecasts of worse to come for teenage young and single-parent families. Local authority housing starts in 1983-84 totalled a miserable 1,500.

Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that his proposed funding of housing will not encourage a major attack on the problems to which I have referred? What of the backlog of housing renovation grants? Have the Government not decided, in effect, to deny themselves the chance of launching an imaginative programme of house building to the advantage both of the homeless and the jobless? This statement is a cruel disappointment. Wales will be disappointed today.

Mr. Edwards: At the beginning of his questions and later the hon. Gentleman drew attention to an important feature of what I said. He welcomed the future 80 per cent. indications and asked about mid-term moratoriums. A prime objective of the system that we are introducing and developing with local authorities is to give some certainty to local authorities so that they can plan their capital programmes over a period of years, have a degree of flexibility on cash limits and avoid both underspends and overspends from year to year and the necessity to take mid-term action. The previous Government were faced with the problem of massive underspends, giving encouragement to spend and then having to haul in the spending powers of local authorities. We have had both underspends and overspends, and the system that we are introducing will give a great deal more certainty and assurance. It will reduce greatly the risk of mid-term action.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the effect of the reduction in the prescribed limit. He appeared not to understand that the reduction has been offset by a 27 per cent. increase in net provision for housing. He has missed the relationship that exists between the allocations made to authorities and their freedom to spend their accrued receipts. Housing provision is close to last year's figure. Estimated receipts are down and we are making a realistic assumption of housing receipts. To offset that, we have substantially increased — by 27 per cent. — the net provision for housing that is funded by the Welsh Office. We are maintaining at a high level expenditure on housing through the Housing Corporation. The corporation's power to spend will be enhanced by the new financial arrangements which we have made with the private sector for that purpose.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of the disrepair of the housing stock in Wales. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the Labour Government whom he supported took practically no action on improvement grants. We have launched a major improvement programme which has substantially improved the condition of the housing stock. We have a 5 per cent. increase in the cash limit overall, which is above the inflation rate in Wales. We have a rising level of investment in the housing area and in the industrial sector. In addition, we have a massive road programme. That gives tremendous opportunity for the building industry in Wales in the year ahead.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, within impossibly tight constraints, and given the Treasury's obsession with the public sector borrowing requirement, to the exclusion of pretty well every other economic objective, he has had a remarkable achievement in carrying the acquiescence hitherto of most Welsh local authorities with his policies for local government financing? Will my right hon. Friend say something about the future of the urban aid programme? Is it likely to be sufficiently ample to accommodate essential redevelopment work in town centres? Is the special project school likely to be large enough to cover certain essential works?

Mr. Edwards: In introducing this system of control I have tried to avoid the stop-go process from which we suffered and to maintain a consistent and reasonably high level of spending. Welsh local authorities have benefited from the restraint that they have shown in keeping down current expenditure. In per capita terms, capital expenditure in Wales is considerably higher than the corresponding figure in England. That is a recognition of need and of the current expenditure policies that are followed by local authorities in Wales.

In the programme that I have announced there are moneys to provide £19 million in capital for the urban programme. That sum is broadly in line with what local authorities tell us they will spend this year. The urban programme also includes current expenditure and the total to be spent on the urban programme will be over £25 million. I can tell my hon. Friend that there is provision for the continuation of special project expenditure. We have good examples of notable housing improvement that has been carried out in that way at Wrexham and in the Rhondda.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Secretary of State not disguising the reality by the way that he has mischievously used statistics? Over the five years from 1979-80 to 1984-85, there was a capital investment level of £440 million per annum. Over the next three years the level will drop to £330 million per annum. That is a drop of 25 per cent. in local authority capital investment at the very time when housing, roads, schools and everything else provided by local authorities require more capital spending and not less. Will the right hon. Gentleman come clean and admit that there has been a U-turn in Government policy? Both he and the Under-Secretary of State for Wales the hon. Member for Conwy (Mr. Roberts), are on record as saying that capital receipts will be available to local authorities to make up for the lack of finances for housing, housing repairs and renovation. He and his hon. Friend are on record as saying that. There has now been a U-turn, so let the right hon. Gentleman be honest with the House and with Wales.

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman's accusation is incompatible with the figures that I announced in my statement. Over the six years from 1979-80, local authorities in Wales will have invested about £2·2 billion in capital projects, and over the next three years they will be investing a further £1 billion. The hon. Gentleman's allegation was wrong.

I have already told the hon. Gentleman in my statement that local authorities increased their reserves and did not spend their receipts on housing improvement at a time when they could have done so. At that stage they were underspending. We are merely asking that they should not spend for a second time in a single year or in a short period, action which would destroy the Government's public spending programme as a whole.

Mr. Stefan Terlezki (Cardiff, West): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement. It would be marvellous if we had money that we could throw about like confetti so that all the local authorities in Wales could spend it indiscriminately, but the time has come when we must be accountable to our ratepayers, and the local authorities must be good housekeepers. I am sure that Opposition Members will agree that if local authorities did not throw money away on nuclear-free zones, the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament and all the fringe lunatics on whom they are spending money it would be available to build more roads and houses and for the social services. I welcome my right hon. Friend's support for the redevelopment of the Cardiff docks.

Mr. Edwards: I agree with my hon. Friend about unnecessary and frivolous expenditure by local authorities, but Welsh local authorities have made a considerable effort to meet our current expenditure targets, which is one reason why the per capita expenditure that I am announcing is nearly double that in England. It is a direct result of having lower current expenditure. I should also like to make it clear to my hon. Friend that that has enabled us to meet our commitments to cover the 80 per cent. forward indications that we gave local authorities, to meet provision for prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings in full, to provide continuing enveloping schemes in Wales and to provide for the priority estates that have already been mentioned.

Mr. Coleman: May I tell the right hon. Gentleman that, despite all the flim-flam at the end of his statement, he does not put us off the scent that he is guilty of the crime of robbing local authorities of the right to spend their own money? Does not he recall his hon. Friend the Under-Secretary telling us repeatedly that the receipts from the sale of council houses would be used to build more houses? Will he say now how many houses will not be built in Wales as a result of his U-turn?

Mr. Edwards: The so-called U-turn to which the hon. Gentleman refers is that I have increased net provision to local authorities by 27 per cent. to take account of the fact that we shall have lower receipts in the year ahead.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): My right hon. Friend's references to the enveloping schemes will be welcomed in Cardiff. Last week mention was made of a child's guide to help one to understand the rate support grant settlement. May I suggest to my right hon. Friend that it would be desirable if there were a child's guide on why our local authorities may not freely spend their own capital receipts?

Mr. Edwards: The reason why local authorities in Wales may not freely spend their capital receipts is that they have already spent them once and increased their reserves by some £300 million. If they now spend all of them in a single year, that will have a significant effect on the Government's spending policies and on the level of the public sector borrowing requirement. All that I am seeking to do is to ensure that, if they spend that money for a second time they do not do it all in a single year, but in a controlled way over a period.

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): I wonder whether the Secretary of State, having been in office for five years, is proud of his record towards county councils and district councils in Wales? How does he think they will react once they know the contents of today's statement? I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman three questions. What effect will today's statement have on employment in Wales? Will there be an increase in the number of houses to be built in 1985? Finally, when will the Secretary of State stand up for the people of Wales and their rights in the Cabinet?

Mr. Edwards: I believe that I have a good record with regard to local authorities in Wales. That is why they have had a good settlement for current expenditure and why we are now able to maintain a substantial capital programme. The hon. Gentleman asked about employment. The biggest single contribution to employment will be provided by the rising investment that is taking place in Wales as a result of the Government's firm control of public spending and borrowing, which is keeping interest rates down, restoring company profitability and providing jobs for the future.

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): I welcome the additional amount for enterprise zones and the special allocation for coastal protection works at Prestatyn, but is my hon. Friend aware that Delyn borough council has accumulated capital receipts specifically for the purpose of developing Holywell, a town ravaged by unemployment, most recently by the proposed redundancies of one third of the work force at Courtaulds greenfield, and that unless the council receives a special allocation, that desperately needed development will not go ahead?

Mr. Edwards: As my hon. Friend has recognised, his constituency has already done well out of the allocation for coastal protection and the additional amount for the enterprise zones. I have announced the continuation of a major urban programme, including the provision of urban development grant. Of course we shall consider carefully any applications submitted by his local authority.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Why does the Secretary of State for Disaster in Wales continue to try to persuade us that cuts are good for us when the news that he gave us this afternoon is evidently another slap in the face for the homeless, those on housing waiting lists and those who live in substandard accommodation? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that my constituency of Cynon Valley has the worst housing in the whole of Wales, and the second worst housing in the whole of Britain? What hope does he hold out for my constituency, with the news that he gave us this afternoon?

Mr. Edwards: I say two things to the hon. Lady—first, that the one thing that local government has said consistently over the years is that it dislikes a system of capital planning that does not enable it to plan over a period of years and involves stop-go. I am seeking to introduce a consistency that will enable local authorities to plan for the future. Secondly, the Government whom she has supported in the past did practically nothing to tackle the problem of the housing conditions in her area. This Government have undertaken a massive programme of housing improvement, and are continuing to do so through a whole range of measures.

Sir Raymond Gower (Vale of Glamorgan): Is my right hon. Friend fully satisfied that, with careful administration and good housekeeping, Welsh local authorities will be able to meet their statutory obligations and fulfil the tasks that he has set them?

Mr. Edwards: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Is it not clear that, behind all the camouflage, we have yet another chapter of cuts when the need in Wales, particularly in housing, is rising all the time? As the Secretary of State said that he was proud of his record, may I recommend to him a new year's resolution, that he makes the worst year of the Labour Government in terms of housing completions his target for his best year?

Mr. Edwards: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman refers to the Labour Government, who slashed capital expenditure on housing over a period of years. At a time when housing receipts are falling, I take credit for having increased the net provision for local authorities by 27 per cent.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Will not the Secretary of State take on board the fact that the capital overspending that he talked about in his statement is the result of the need and subsequent demand for adequate housing in the valley communities? In the constituency of the Rhondda, which I represent, as a result of the right hon. Gentleman's exhortations we have one of the highest rates of owner-occupancy in the country, and 18,000 people are waiting for improvement grants. What hope can the right hon. Gentleman give those people for next year?

Mr. Edwards: The need was there when, three and four years ago, the same local authorities substantially underspent. What I am trying to do is to introduce a system that eliminates both the underspends and the overspends, and enables local authorities to spend in full the provision that is given to them. I remind the hon. Gentleman that he has one of the best examples of a priority estate project being undertaken, in his constituency.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): May I give the Secretary of State some comfort? May I welcome his decision to maintain support for the PRC improvement programme? However, does not the right hon. Gentleman appreciate and understand that the maintenance of that programme will put a further strain on the budget available for other housing sector programmes? Will the Secretary of State confirm that one of the prime justifications for the sale of council houses was the release of receipts for local authority capital programmes? Will not his decision now mean that as well as being unable to meet their existing needs, local authorities will not even have the confidence to plan for the future? Does not he realise that he has demoralised and shattered the confidence of local authorities in Wales?

Mr. Edwards: No, because I have set a prescribed limit at this level to increase the allocations to local authorities and spread them widely and to meet the commitment to provide for PRC schemes in full. I again repeat that the bids which have been made have been met in full.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): Does the Secretary of State appreciate that the decorative parts of his statement do not disguise the fact that this is another major blow to the economy of Wales, let alone to local government, which is tired of being made a scapegoat for the failure of the Government's monetarist policies? Does he also appreciate the devastating effect that these measures will have on the building and construction industry? This industry should be providing jobs and new homes, and should be improving those homes which are so badly in need of improvement.

Has the right hon. Gentleman drawn the Treasury's attention to the report of the chief housing officers of Wales, who in a recent report forcefully pointed out that the bulk of Welsh housing will be fit only for slum clearance by the end of this century? Has he also drawn the Treasury's attention to the report of Mid-Glamorgan chief officers, who have graphically illustrated the effect which bad housing is having on health and mortality rates in their county?

Why does not the right hon. Gentleman at least admit that this is local government money which he is holding back? Does not he appreciate that by acting in this way, the Government are destroying local government, which has such a proud record in British history?

Mr. Edwards: By acting in this way I hope to avoid the kind of mid-term corrective action which local authorities rightly resent and which interferes with sensible capital planning. The hon. Gentleman referred to the so-called decorative aspects of my statement. I do not know whether he means the 27 per cent. increase in net provision — that is additional Government grant to local authorities to offset falling receipts—or whether he is criticising the fact that to meet the particular problems of Wales, and in recognition of the Welsh authorities' good record on current spending, Wales has been given about £100 million more than it would have received on the equivalent English per capita basis.

Local Authority Capital Expenditure

5.26 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the statement made today on local authority capital expenditure in England and Wales."

I gave you, Mr. Speaker, as well as the House and the Secretary of State, as much notice as I could of my intention to raise this matter. The House has just learned of the contents of those statements which were discussed in a mood of considerable anger and dismay.

These are specific matters of crucial importance to every hon. Member and his constituents. I believe that no one would contest that. That the matter should have urgent consideration is the point that I particularly want to stress. The House listened with increasing dismay to the Secretary of State for the Environment, who made a number of statements which, in effect, were a new departure in policy, even for this Government — first, further to restrict local government control of its own money and resources; secondly, to betray the promises made to owner-occupiers and people buying older premises, particularly young married couples; and, thirdly, to betray commitments given to the building and construction industry. Commitments to the homeless and to people living in substandard accommodation have also been broken as a result of today's statements.

This is an urgent matter because local authorities will have to make immediate changes in their plans and programmes for the coming financial year. They will have to begin immediately to adjust to the new circumstances under which they are expected to operate by the Government. When I say local authorities, I mean not just housing authorities but also the capital programmes of the shire counties.

In view of the overwhelming resentment and anger displayed by the House of Commons following these statements, the House should have the opportunity to discuss the matter as soon as possible, certainly before the Christmas recess. The Secretary of State said—I think I quote his words correctly—that he was operating "under decisions of the House". The House should be given an immediate opportunity to debate the implications of his statement and to record its view before it is too late and before local authority capital expenditure programmes, the building and contruction industry and the homeless are plunged into further problems and difficulties.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the statements made today on local authority capital expenditure in England and Wales."

I am satisfied that the matter raised by the hon. Gentleman ought to be discussed under Standing Order No. 10. Has the hon. Gentleman the leave of the House?

[The pleasure of the House having been signified, the motion stood over under Standing Order No. 10 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) until the commencement of public business tomorrow.]

Arts Funding

5.30 pm

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): After the decision which you have just made, Mr. Speaker, I am optimistic but unsure about the position tomorrow if this application is also granted.

I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the cut in funding for the arts for the coming year".

This cut was announced yesterday without warning having been given to the House and without initial notification of it to any of the Opposition parties. It is a specific matter of Government funding to which you, Mr. Speaker, have already agreed in relation to another aspect. It is of general interest to many hundreds of thousands of people outside the House and it is of specific concern to those whose livelihood depends upon the continuation of specific companies and organisations within the arts, both in theatre and music and in the museums and galleries of Great Britain.

Secondly, the importance of this matter has been stressed by many outside who do not normally object to the actions of this Government or of any other Government. Sir Peter Hall, the director of the National Theatre, has described it as a tragic day for the theatre. Sir Michael Levey, the director of the National Gallery, said:

"I am appalled and gravely perturbed by the implication of the Minister's decision. . . . A cut of such magnitude is unprecedented in recent years."

The British Museum has been taken aback by this decision. The chairman of the Arts Council, Sir William Rees-Mogg, said:

"Many of our clients, faced with grants increasingly below inflation, will find their very existence in jeopardy".

If that is not enough, when making the statement—not, I may say, in this House—the Minister for the Arts said that the award was "rather mean". It is indeed mean. It is not only mean but serious for those who are concerned with the future of the arts in Great Britain. Because of the anxiety which has been created, because we shall soon be going into recess and because of the lack of opportunity which has been given to the House to discuss the implications, I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will give sympathetic consideration to this application.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the cut in funding for the arts for the coming year".

I have listened with care to what the hon. Member has said, but I regret that I do not consider the matter which he has raised to be appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

Later——

5.39 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I fully understood your reasons for not accepting the Standing Order No. 10 application of my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan). In your capacity as someone who protects the interests of the House, particularly the interests of Back Benchers, will you say something helpful about the repeated occurrence of major Government announcements on the arts taking place outside the Chamber? No Minister with responsibility in this Chamber comes to the Dispatch Box to give us the opportunity of perhaps mauling the Minister with responsibility for the arts in much the same way as we were able to maul the Secretary of State for the Environment. You gave way to the application under Standing Order No. 10 on that matter but you were not prepared to give way to the application under Standing Order No. 10 on the arts.

Mr. Speaker: "To give way" is an unfortunate phrase to use. I exercise my discretion in the matter. I fully understand that the arts are important. We have questions on the arts and there has been some discussion of whether sufficient time is given to that. But, if the hon. Gentleman reflects, he will see that he will have opportunities, perhaps before the House rises, to raise the matter.

Mr. Buchan: Further to the point of order of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), Mr. Speaker. May I make a point that I was unable to make under Standing Order No. 10? On this occasion a separate Department announced its public expenditure for the year. We have just had a lengthy set of exchanges when another Department announced its public expenditure for the year. Yet in the case of the arts, which is dealt with by a separate Department, a written statement is made by a Minister in another place, accompanied by a parallel statement by someone speaking on his behalf in the House. No announcement was made to the House and no warning was given. Nothing would have been known about it had I not phoned the appropriate Department because of a rumour that I heard.

Therefore, it is necessary that the arts, which are profoundly important to many millions of people in Britain, should have their rightful place in the House. I know that this is a monetarist Government but they should not seek to prove themselves to be a philistine Government as well.

I hope that you, Sir, will defend our rights and ensure that that is done. Unless pressure can be brought to bear upon the Government, either by yourself or the House, to come forward with an opportunity in January, we shall have no opportunity to discuss this important statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that it is generally accepted in the House that I do my best to protect the rights of the House and its Members. Where statements are made is not a matter for me.

Civil Aviation Bill

5.34 pm

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In Committee this morning on the Civil Aviation Bill the Government, for the second time in a week, failed to carry their own sittings motion. May I take this opportunity—it is the only one I have—to ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether or not he now intends to proceed with the Bill and, if so, when? In doing so, would the Secretary of State bear in mind that it is apparent from the decisions of the Committee at its two previous sittings——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I heard the hon. Gentleman say that he was asking the Secretary of State. The hon. Gentleman should be asking me.

Mr. Snape: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. How on earth I could have confused the Secretary of State with you I do not know. May I therefore ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether you have received any intimation from the Secretary of State regarding how the Government intend to proceed with the Bill, since it is apparent from the two sittings of the committee that there is no majority upon it for the Bill as it stands. I and other hon. Members on both the Labour and Liberal benches are entitled to ask what the Government intend to do. I cannot of course speak for the opposition on the Conservative benches.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is not what occurred a failure on the part of the Committee of Selection to reflect the will of the House? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not raise a point of order with me about what goes on in the Committee of Selection.

Mr. Jessel: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Further to that point of order. What remedy is available to the House when the House has decided by a large majority in favour of the Bill on Second Reading—in this case 232 to 154 votes, which is a ratio of 60 to 40 in favour of the Bill —and the Committee of Selection then unknowingly appoints a Committee which is against the Bill? How can the interests of the House be protected?

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Following the point of order from the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape), might it not be for the convenience of the House if one of my right hon. Friends — either the Secretary of State for Transport or the Leader of the House — were to make a statement that the Bill will be withdrawn pending a debate on the Floor of the House about airports policy and pending a decision in the light of that debate by the Secretary of State for Transport, taking into consideration the findings of the airports policy report? If not, will not the Secretary of State be prejudicing his quasi-judicial capacity?

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is not the difficulty due to the fact that the inspector's report on airports policy was published a few days after the Second Reading in this House and that the Standing Committee is reflecting the resulting confusion that has arisen over the Secretary of State's quasi-judicial position? May I therefore support the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) in believing that the right and better course for the House as a whole would be the withdrawal of the Bill at this stage?

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am not a member of the Committee which is considering the Bill. I voted against its Second Reading. The points which my hon. Friends have made are important. I should have thought that they would be of benefit to the Secretary of State. Certain hon. Members may be uncertain whether the Bill is or is not linked with Stansted. I think that most of those who have studied the matter recognise that it is linked with Stansted and believe that the House ought to drop the Bill until a decision on Stansted has been reached by the Government.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Surely it is unprecedented for a Standing Committee to fail to approve the sittings motion at two meetings. This in itself is worthy of considerable comment. Is not the truth of the matter that, since the House of Commons gave approval to the Second Reading of the Civil Aviation Bill, certain events have taken place and reports have been published which have led to a fundamental reappraisal of the principle of the Bill? Is it not therefore essential for the Leader of the House and his colleagues to consider whether or not the time has come to withdraw the Bill and introduce more appropriate legislation?

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): Perhaps it might help the House in the difficulty which has been created for it by a Bill which has been given a Second Reading by a large majority, although the Committee appointed to consider it has not yet seen fit to begin its consideration, if I were to seek to make a statement about it either tomorrow or the next day, and certainly before the House rises for the Christmas recess. The matter requires a certain amount of consideration. I should like to ask for your leave, Mr. Speaker, to make a statement in due course.

Mr. Speaker: I think we should leave the matter there.

BILL PRESENTED

MILK (CESSATION OF PRODUCTION) BILL

Mrs. Peggy Fenner, supported by Mr. Secretary Younger, Mr. Secretary Edwards, Mr. Michael Jopling, Mr. Peter Rees and Mr. John MacGregor presented a Bill to provide for payments to be made for the purpose of compensating persons, who are or have been registered in the direct sales register or a wholesale register maintained under the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1984, for discontinuing milk production and to make provision in connection with payments to such persons whenever made: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 46.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the House, I shall put together the questions on the three motions relating to the statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the Local Government (Interim Provisions) (Consultation) Regulations 1984 (S.I., 1984, No. 1760) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Agriculture and Horticulture Development (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1984 (S.I., No. 1922) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Farm and Horticulture Development (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1984 (S.I., 1984, No. 1924) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Lang.]

Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958 (Amendment)

5.42 pm

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958 to compensate investors with licensed dealers.

The Bill is directed at licensed dealers in shares, a growing sector of the market in shares. There are, governing licensed dealers, nine associations which constitute self-regulatory bodies.

Last year the Department of Trade and Industry tightened up the regulations governing licensed dealers in shares. Nevertheless, in spite of that the Under-Secretary of State with responsibility for corporate and consumer affairs, admitted to me in recent correspondence that the present statutory framework could be improved and extended and that is what the Bill is about.

For a number of reasons it is necessary to protect investors with licensed dealers in shares against fraud, bankruptcy or mismanagement, by setting up a compensation fund to provide for their losses in those events. It is necessary in this case because the risks that the would-be small investor with licensed dealers in shares can face are many.

First, it is difficult for a recipient of a cold call—an unsolicited telephone call — to know whether the supposed licensed dealer is respectable. Whether he is a member of one of the proper associations and has a licence.

It is also difficult to know in what kind of trading in shares the company engage. There is a danger that a company may take a worthless share at an artificial price and set up a company abroad, say in the United States or on the continent, and push the price up by hiking up the shares in the foreign market. That creates an artificial market in Britain. That is a fraudulent manipulation of shares, yet the practice occurs. It is not clear whether the Department of Trade and Industry investigates and controls such actions rigorously enough.

Let us take Ravendale, for example. That company is owned by Mr. Singh, the second largest licensed dealer in Britain. He forged the transatlantic ties with Marsan Securities, a New York brokerage house, which, as The Observer and the Securities and Exchange Commission subsequently revealed, was a distinctly unsavoury concern. The Federal Bureau of Investigation has expressed great anxiety about trading between Ravendale and Marsan Securities. The Department of Trade and Industry, in a letter to me, claimed to have carried out an investigation, but just how rigorous it was and what form it took remains unclear.

Before Marsan ceased business, it promoted Ravendale sponsored shares and Ravendale, in turn, marketed Marsan favourites. Ravendale's offshoot, the London Venture Capital Market, planned the unlisted securities market placing of shares in Video Turf, owner of the rights to a horse race gaming machine. Camseal, Video Turf's parent, had disturbing associations with individuals connected with Signal Life and the Cavendish Life frauds. In the event, Video Turf never came to market. Camseal collapsed and recently the shares were quoted at a mere 25 cents. They were formerly valued at $30 million.

Other allegations have been made against Mr. Singh and Ravendale by the Checkpoint programme. Those include connections between Mr. Singh and Thomas F. Quinn, a disbarred American lawyer imprisoned for stock fraud. He is believed to have connections with the Mafia.

Chartwell Securities AG, a company with which Thomas F. Quinn appears to be intimately associated, and Zurich and Trafalgar Capital (UK) owned by one Neil Bruckman, appeared to be acting in concert to manipulate a market in shares. Abraham Margolis was a major shareholder in Ravendale Securities. He and his brother, Robbie Margolis, according to the FBI, are associates of the Mafia.

That is just a small part of the complex activities of Ravendale. But to the small investor, as the recent Checkpoint programme showed, it appeared to be a respectable firm of stockbrokers. Such firms advertise in the national press and sometimes the names chosen—for example the London Venture Capital Market — make them seem solid and respectable. They issue glossy brochures, and, as I said, they sometimes contact people cold, which is illegal and entice them to part with their money, sometimes to their loss. The Checkpoint programme recently featured a Mr. Dunstan, a disabled man who has lost all his savings.

The Bill is designed to fill a gap in the legislation by providing a compensation fund for investors with licensed dealers to reimburse them if funds have been lost either because rules have been broken or ignored, because of commercial misjudgment or because the company concerned has collapsed.

The collapse of Norton Warburg in 1981 showed the necessity for compensation. More than 500 investors suddenly discovered that the five companies in which they had invested through Norton Warburg had lost nearly £4·7 million.

The Government are determined to encourage small shareholders even if, as in the case of British Telecom, it means selling shares to them at half price. If that is the Government's aim, they must be prepared to protect small investors in the circumstances that I have described. The tightened rules for licensed dealers introduced in 1983 go part of the way. Even the Gower report points out the necessity for a compensation fund. This part of the market is growing. The privatisation of British Telecom has meant that many small investors have gone to licensed dealers because their investments are too small for a stockbroker's attention. Some licensed dealers have made a killing out of BT shares. One has carried out £18 million worth of trading so far. If that is the position, the associations of licensed dealers should be obliged to set up a compensation fund. It would probably be sensible to have just one association rather than the present nine. Setting up such a fund would not be so prohibitively expensive now as it was in the past due to recent change in the rules, forcing the separation of clients' money and investments from the firms' other money.

If the Government are determined to encourage small investors they must be prepared to ensure that the small investor is properly protected and that the part of the market in which small investors deal is properly regulated and controlled.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Dr. Oonagh McDonald, Mr. Kevin McNamara, Mr. Robert Hughes, Mr. Stewart

Randall, Mr. Stewart Bell, Mr. Jim Callaghan, Mr. Derek Foster, Mr. Frank Dobson, Mr. Harry Cowans, Mr. Jack Straw, Mr. John McWilliam and Mr. Robin Corbett.

PREVENTION OF FRAUD (INVESTMENTS) ACT 1958 (AMENDMENT)

Dr. Oonagh McDonald accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958 to compensate investors with licensed dealers: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 18 January and to be printed. [Bill 47.]

ESTIMATES DAY

[1ST ALLOTTED DAY]—considered

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES 1984-85

Class IV, Vote 5

Industrial Support (Department of Energy)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a supplementary sum not exceeding £45,000,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in the course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1985 for expenditure by the Department of Energy in connection with the energy industries including related research and development, selective assistance to industry, energy conservation, oil storage, and certain other services including grants in aid and an international subscription. —[Mr. Buchanan-Smith.]

5.52 pm

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): Last, but not I think least, we come to energy. The Select Committee on Energy and I as its Chairman are grateful to the House and to the Liaison Committee for the opportunity to discuss the issues raised by our report on the £45 million allocated to the financing of BNOC in the winter Supplementary Estimates.

Before dealing with the report, I wish to thank very warmly the members and staff of my Committee for the stupendous efforts that they made to complete and publish a report within 15 days of the decision to make the inquiry. In my view, that very creditable achievement conceals two things. First, we were unable to take evidence, as we would have wished, from a number of other significant witnesses such as the recipients of the letter from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. As Chairman of a Select Committee which has always sought to base its conclusions very firmly on the evidence, I believe that that fully justifies our first conclusion—that if the spirit of Standing Order No. 19 is to be observed the Government should not put this kind of pressure on Select Committees. Secondly, the Government have yet again refused to disclose important evidence which in my judgment could have been disclosed without prejudicing commercial confidence. This may limit the report, but I do not believe that it invalidates our conclusions.

Two documents are especially relevant. The first is the Government's letter to the oil companies in August this year. A summary of that document, still marked "confidential", disclosed nothing of interest or importance but in my judgment it is clear that the letter influenced both BNOC and the oil industry's actions. I shall return to that later. The second document, which I requested after my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had mentioned its existence in his evidence, was a review of oil price policy carried out by the Department. Our Clerk was advised that this was "advice to Ministers" and an "internal working document" and could not be provided.

Technically, Select Committees have power to send for papers and persons, but it seems that our power to send for persons is significantly greater than our power to send for papers. That being so, I believe that the discharge of our responsibility to Parliament and to the nation is becoming seriously deficient in a significant respect. We could have been shown those papers—in confidence, if necessary—but we have not seen them. They might even have vindicated the Government's position completely, although I doubt it. Certainly I believe that our suspicions will be justified long before the year 2014. My conclusion is, however, that the rule should be redefined to reflect the present reality—in other words, that Select Committees have power to send for persons and for any papers except those which the Government of the day consider too important or sensitive to be disclosed. All Governments would find that convenient and it defines the real limits to our power. It also seriously limits our ability to provide Parliament and the nation with a second opinion on its affairs which has real value and relevance. I believe that that is a matter for the House as a whole.

As regards the issues involved in the report, the inquiry began in April 1983 when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was Secretary of State for Energy and gave important evidence to us on oil prices. At that time, there was no immediate prospect of BNOC making losses. The memorandum on the subject from the Department of Energy was quite specific. It stated:

"Neither B.N.O.C. nor the Government can intervene in the pricing of North Sea oil in defiance of market forces and the underlying changes in the pattern of energy use and consumer behaviour".

The memorandum continued, saying that BNOC would not have to make frequent price changes and that it would build up "long-term relationships" with its customers and agree prices which "reflected their longer-run commitments of interest".

We were told that the Department itself did not make short-term forecasts, disliked and sought to avoid "sharp and sudden changes" in the price of oil, considered that

"our interests, overall, were not the same as O.P.E.C."

and argued that price stability in the short term

"depends very much on O.P.E.C. agreeing and adhering to restrictive production programmes."

The then Secretary of State confirmed the position in a most important evidence session, the conclusions of which marked the beginning of the present inquiry. I shall mention just three. First, he said:

"B.N.O.C. are price-takers, not price-setters . . . must interpret market signals . . . and cannot stand in the way of market forces".

Secondly, he said that while seeking "stability" the Government allow the companies

"to produce as much as they like"

and make no attempt

"to control the price".

Thirdly, he said:

"it is not the case that I, having any idea or view on what the world price of oil is, seek to try to use B.N.O.C. as an instrument to achieve that price. Nothing like that at all".

What, then, is the reality? The evidence since April 1983, as my Committee and I see it, seems to point in exactly the opposite direction. The Government now derive so much of their revenue — comparatively painlessly to themselves, if not to the final consumer—from oil or from the North sea, that their loud protestations of unconcern about price levels simply do not square with their actions. They are not concerned merely with the suddenness or sharpness of any change in direction. Indeed, they seem to me to be almost obsessed with the consequences of what they fear most, which I would define—and I believe that they would define—as the collapse of the highly artificial price structure inflicted on the world by OPEC at a time when we produced no oil and had virtually no short-term options open to us. The apparent permanence of that price structure has been converted by that remarkable mechanism, the market, into a worldwide response of immense power and significance. The production of non-OPEC oil has boomed. The North sea has boomed. The Government's tax revenues have boomed.

The figures for tax revenue are noteworthy. For all the years to May 1979, the figure was £970 million. For the period from May 1979 to this year, it was £29 million. The community still pays much the same price as it paid to OPEC. It is the beneficiaries who have changed. Whatever the national interest may be—and it is debatable—no one can deny a vast overlap of interest between the Treasury and OPEC In 1984, the Treasury's tax take from the North sea was £22 billion gross and £16 billion net, after allowing for related imports, interest, dividends and repayments of capital.

The scale of the national dilemma may be gleaned from the fact that in 1983 the trading profits from all United Kingdom companies amounted to £56 billion, of which North sea companies alone accounted for £15·6 billion.

OPEC makes no bones about its views. At this moment it may be making them plain — for all I know — in Geneva. It is we who equivocate about our views. OPEC stated not long ago that its policy was to "regulate and determine oil prices".

It believes in holding prices when demand is falling and in raising them when demand is rising. It believes that the purpose of its oil revenues is to finance the industrial transition and restructuring of its members' economies. It believes that its members would be appalled by a price collapse and must refrain above all from "competition in prices".

The demonstration of those views and that interest has been the steady decline of OPEC output from a peak of over 50 million barrels a day to some 16 million barrels now. OPEC believes that it remains in its interests to sell a small quantity at a higher price rather than a larger quantity at a low price. An OPEC think tank has stated openly:

"Competitive discounting has no theoretical floor above the marginal cost of production"

and:

"Economic recovery will not cause a commensurate increase in oil demand".

The House might be interested to know why that is so. In 1978-81, the energy used per unit of gross domestic product in the OECD area fell by 8 per cent., but the oil component of that energy fell by 24 per cent.

So much for OPEC. I have already summarised what we ourselves have said. What we do, however, is different. Broadly speaking, our policy response to the situation has been twofold. Under the OPEC umbrella we have created a significant domestic oil capacity. Much, but not all, of that capacity is dependent on OPEC price levels. When he was Secretary of State for Energy, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor stated in evidence to us that North sea fields would not go out of business at a low price. He said:

"obviously . . . there is an oil price at which they would not be profitable, but it is a very low price indeed".

That was a most significant statement. The Brown Book itself discloses that the average cost of production of oil in the North sea is in fact $10 a barrel. That judgment was confirmed by a recent analysis supplied by Professors

Kemp and Rose which estimated the development costs for some 23 new oilfields in the North sea with a total reserve of 2·6 billion barrels.

For fields of more than 250 million barrels, the cost would be $6 per barrel. For fields of more than 100 million barrels, the cost would be $7 per barrel. For fields producing over 50 million barrels — the most uneconomic to develop — the cost would be $10 per barrel. Anticipated operating costs are $12 per barrel for the larger fields and $17 for the smaller. The margin, therefore, remains very large. The parties that are interested in those margins are not the oil companies but the Government who tax them, either for development in the middle east, or, in the west, to satisfy the insatiable public expenditure budgets.

The position is summarised in a remarkable table published by Shell for 1982. Of the $62 received from a typical OPEC barrel in western Europe, $52 disappears in Government revenue—$33 to OPEC and $19 to other Governments. For the North sea, as I have said, the proportion is even higher—somewhere between 85 and 90 per cent. at the margin, though the percentage varies with the field and the location.

OPEC stands to lose $7·4 billion for every fall of $1 in the price of a barrel. I have been unable to find out what the United Kingdom figure is, but it is certainly proportionate.

Those are the real forces at work. That is the scene in which, so we were told, in some mystical and undisclosed combination, in a sort of immaculate co-determination, the Government and BNOC strove desperately not to influence the price of oil—which they tell us they have neither the power nor the wish to do—but to achieve that equally mystical objective, stability. Over and over again, the word "stability" appears in the evidence. Both Lord Croham and my right hon. Friend the Minister of State declared that stability is the goal. How does one achieve stability without exercising a direct influence on the market? And how does one exercise that influence without influencing either supply or price? Politicians may know, but, for once, the economists are speechless.

It is clear from BNOC's recent evidence that a deliberate decision was made to hold the BNOC price above the spot market. BNOC feared that the market was misguided, and that it might collapse and never recover. That is OPEC's view. Lord Croham was quite frank. He stated that North sea output levels were a matter for the Government but that BNOC accepted the Government's view that "any sharp fall in oil prices would be detrimental to North Sea development" and that, if prices fell,

"other things might collapse".

He added, however, that the European system of price support was designed to keep oil prices

"permanently above what is a competitive price".

Made by a former head of the Civil Service, that is a most authoritative statement. It is also very frank. I submit that it defines a reality that is fundamentally different from that which the Government, in their evidence, sought to imply. The reality involved BNOC in supporting the price and the market, created the losses, ensured that BNOC would have to come to Parliament for money and confirmed that it must have acted on instructions from the Government.

In his turn, my right hon. Friend was most disarming. He denied Lord Croham's conclusion. He reminded me very much of a bishop in a confessional. If he is to be considered human and truthful, he must disclose something. However, he dare not disclose anything of real significance that might totally destroy his authority in the pulpit. My right hon. Friend, too, sheltered behind the shield of "stability" — that overworked and jaded criterion that has concealed the true objectives of every cartel throughout the ages, whether or not it has been supported by a Government. However, my right hon. Friend added that there were "special factors". There always are. What distinguishes a market from a bureaucracy is that the former accepts and responds at once to special factors. The latter dislikes them intensely, attributes them to Machiavellian forces and wishes that they would go away and allow the plan to be fulfilled as if the special factors had never arisen.

What we discovered, and now know, is that the interference did not work. The price continued to fall and the taxpayer had to pick up the bill. Moreover, we suspect that the bill will be larger—much larger—unless a few of the realities which I have outlined are accepted, and quickly. That is the background to what I believe to be my Committee's most central and significant conclusion. Perhaps I might remind the House of its terms. It said:

"The Committee believes that the distinction drawn between promoting stability and resistance to market forces is an artificial one. We find it hard to believe from the evidence of the past year or so that the Government has not taken the view that a certain price level for oil is desirable in the national interest and that it attempts to intervene in the market, as any other body with a considerable vested interest would, to secure that price."

On that rests essentially all that follows.

We need a much wider debate than this Estimate allows. The debate should include the future of BNOC and the framework within which it has to operate, whether the national interest as a whole is best served by high or low oil prices, high or low energy prices, the energy development scenarios which might follow one set of oil price policies or the other, and the cost to the west of any formal or informal support of the present OPEC/North sea cartel arrangements.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): The hon. Gentleman has mentioned several factors in regard to the Government's policy but has omitted a significant one—the level of output. Does his Committee take a view on the current level of output from the North sea, which is about 2·5 million barrels a day?

Mr. Lloyd: I am sure that my Committee would take a view on the current level of output if it considered the matter. What has impressed us far more is the fundamental change in the composition of the world output of oil, during the past 10 years. OPEC occupied about two thirds of a columnar illustration at the beginning of the decade whereas it now occupies just a little more than the top one third. The North sea is a significant factor in that change but the most significant is the decline of 10 billion barrels a day in world demand and the greater decline of 13 billion barrels a day in OPEC output.

I believe that we have blown the top off this can of complexity, half truths, secret initiatives and economic distortion which is disguised by some of the world's most powerful pressure groups as expressions of unqualified public interest. If, as I believe, the world's oil industry has responded to the OPEC price level by creating—very much to its credit—a massive alternative supply system, we should at least discuss whether and how the nation, or the west as a whole, is to receive the full benefits of that and whether and to what extent OPEC will react in the short, medium and long term. There is a significant rather than a negligible overlap of interests between us and OPEC. We should also discuss how we can avoid a recurrence of the serious cartel exploitation which occurred in the 1960s and the 1970s. This must be an open and continuing debate. We have established the bridgehead. It is up to the House and the country, if I might put it this way, to follow through with an armoured division of debate and analysis. Nothing less will do.

6.10 pm

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I am grateful for the opportunity to congratulate the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) on his introduction of his Select Committee's report. Many of us agree that this might not be the most appropriate time to debate that report—it justifies a separate debate. I should like to address myself to the dominant issue in the energy industry with regard to public cost—the current miners' strike.

We are told that the Government's case in the dispute is the need to close uneconomic pits. There are three levels of argument.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I shall be interested to see how the hon. Gentleman relates his speech to the Estimates.

Mr. Strang: I have had advice to the effect that it would be possible to refer to the coal industry in this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. A passing reference is one thing, but choosing the dispute in the coal industry as the theme of a speech is quite another.

Mr. Strang: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall therefore make a rather modified speech. If you are telling me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that it is not possible to refer to the coal industry in a debate on the Estimates, I shall take your advice, but that is not the advice that I have been given.

We are talking about public expenditure and the Department of Energy. Oil, gas and coal are crucially important but our most important energy resource is coal. We should therefore concern ourselves with the cost of its production. Bearing in mind the fact that there has not been one special debate on the coal mining strike——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have told the hon. Gentleman that it is in order to make a passing reference to the coal industry by way of analogy but he must not make the dispute the theme of his speech. The House is considering Estimates that relate to BNOC and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will direct his remarks to them.

Mr. Strang: Well, I should therefore like to draw a comparison between the case for oil and the case for coal. It is right to consider the level of North sea oil production. As the hon. Member for Havant said, bearing in mind the huge world market for oil, Britain could be considered a factor in determining the world price of oil. As we are concerned about the economics of oil production as opposed to other forms of energy, it is right to examine the costs involved. I hope that it will be possible for me to refer in passing to the cost of coal production.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman and I have different opinions about what he may refer to. I hope that he will have regard to what I have already told him at least twice.

Mr. Strang: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It seems that the earlier advice which I received from a good source——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There are many seats in this place but there is only one Chair.

Mr. Strang: I am happy to make it absolutely clear that in no way am I challenging your judgment, Mr. Deputy Speaker. For that reason I shall conclude by saying that the case for oil is strong but oil must be considered in the overall context of energy production and supply. It is nonsense to debate these issues without taking account of the fundamental economic and social costs. I make that point without considering just one commodity of production. Whether talking about oil or gas production, or any form of energy production, we must recognise that the economic costs differ. That is a crucial argument to consider not only in an energy debate on North sea oil but in an economic debate in general.

We often do not recognise that the accountancy value of one aspect of production differs greatly from the economic value in terms of fixed overhead costs, fixed costs for pension schemes and, above all, social costs and consequences. Whether discussing North sea oil—this morning the Minister of State spoke about North sea oil in the Scottish Grand Committee—or other sources of energy production, the tragedy is that we are not giving sufficient weight to the huge amount of social damage that occurs as a consequence of mass unemployment in many of our communities.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): The House will wish to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) and all the members of the Select Committee on Energy on a remarkably lucid report, produced with great speed and efficiency. I warmly join in those congratulations. I intervene in this debate with some hesitation because I am not a member of that Committee, but I should like to direct the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State to certain points.

I shall consider the genesis of the British National Oil Corporation, which is entirely a trading body, trading in crude oil. When the Government decided to keep the BNOC trading arm as a separate body, it was not originally intended that it should become an instrument for shaping North sea oil prices, let alone for establishing an official British North sea oil price. BNOC was kept on at the time it was decided to split the original corporation and to prepare for privatisation — the upstream exploration development production division which subsequently became Britoil—to ensure security of supply. It was thought that that would be the simplest way of establishing security of supply. It was argued — perhaps that argument seems a little remote now — that it was essential to have an instrument which would work and be acceptable and which, if there were a third oil shock and another huge interruption in oil supplies internationally, could assure supplies from British producers to British consumers and the refineries. Some argued that security of supply could be achieved in another way, and a great deal of debate has occurred on that subject. There are difficulties associated with the EEC and the treaty of Rome.

I have wished all along that there should be no such organisation to fix prices, and even today I do not believe that it would be wise to have a body that appears to be the source of an official price or even a single price which people the world over, including OPEC leaders, see as an official price. I believe that we should have adhered closely to that view. In considering participation agreements and the purchasing and selling of large volumes of crude oil, BNOC should be a price taker and not a price giver or maker. That fact should be clearly established in international oil markets and understood, especially by Governments of other oil-producing countries.

The reason we were so worried about the danger that could occur was obvious. If it became apparent that Britain had an official oil price, it would follow that that price could be manipulated. We feared that people would come to London saying, "Why do not the British Government do something about the official oil price, because that would help us with other manipulations on the world market?" Events have justified that fear, because that is exactly what has happened. It is ironic that one of the greatest free-world oil producers, the United States—admittedly, not a vast exporter, but nevertheless a huge producer and therefore decisive in the world oil market—has no national oil corporation. It therefore is not lambasted, squeezed and pushed by the world's oil diplomats in the alleged interests of maintaining price stability. We envisaged that danger.

BNOC's involvement with prices has not evolved in the way originally intended. That would be a sufficient danger, but we seem to face an even greater danger. It is believed that BNOC should not only be concerned with shaping North sea prices but take up a positive position in response to consultation with Government about stabilising the world crude oil price. That bold first step is fraught with danger, and I say that not with hindsight but because I have believed it for a long time.

The Select Committee has already sought to elucidate how the consultation—I put it no more strongly than that—was arranged, so that BNOC, whose officials are familiar with the world market and, given the circumstances in which they operate, have conducted themselves with extreme skill, felt compelled to move further into the vast world of oil pricing to take up an active position to stabilise world oil prices. That is what BNOC appeared to do in the summer. Obviously, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State will explain what really happened but that appeared to be the Government's requirement of BNOC. That function differed from the originally correct purpose and function of BNOC.

It would be unwise if BNOC has not only become generally involved in price shaping of North sea crude oil prices but tried to take a stance on price fixing in world oil markets. The reasons why that is unwise are obvious. It will not work. Obviously, British oil production is only a tiny proportion of world oil production. Vast forces and trends are at work in the world oil market which, frankly, ride right over and stand well away from anything that can be done with North sea prices or volumes. The oil markets worldwide have, for 100 years, barring only the gap of the past 14 years, faced the fact that there is too much oil.

For at least 18 months or two years, it has been certain that there would be a continuing softening of oil prices as attempts by the OPEC cartel to maintain the extremely high political and artificial levels of the early 1980s were progressively weakened. I do not believe that that will lead to a collapse in oil prices, but I believe that we shall see the operation of the type of forces that operated at the end of the 1970s. In those days, oil was priced at between $12 and $14 a barrel. Grossing that figure for inflation since then, the price per barrel would be about $25—probably $3 or $4 below the present price.

It has been widely expected by those who try to watch the oil markets that the price would move in that direction. It was optimistic at best and imprudent at worst for BNOC to try to prevent that happening. Any move which might, at first, lead to trying to hang on to a price and then have to give way gives one the worst of all worlds. It would be worse than doing nothing in the first place. It is a great pity if that is the sequence of events.

That is the first reason why it was not the best thing for BNOC, on the basis of consultation, to try to move into the sphere of world oil prices. It was not going to work.

The second reason is that BNOC was bound to lose money. That view was widely held and it is what has happened. I understand that the loss is at the rate of £15 million a month, and that is also a pity. I join the Select Committee in urging careful thought before any further developments are allowed which will lead to further losses of that size.

The third reason has to do with international diplomacy. For BNOC to get into a posture where it might give the impression, or in which my right hon. and hon. Friends might give the impression, that they could do something decisively to influence oil prices was dangerous, because they cannot. Except in the short term, that cannot be done. A friend refused may be a friend annoyed, but a friend misled is an angry friend. It does not surprise me that harsh words have come from OPEC about North sea price changes being ill-judged and ill-timed, the more so because OPEC leaders have claimed—I do not know whether this is only a claim or whether there is more substance to it—that they were under the impression that something could be done to hold the price and that it would be held, when of course it could not be and was not.

The Government's policy does not seem—it would not be wise—to be to control the volume of North sea oil production. The Varley assurances given by the former right hon. Member for Chesterfield have been extended, and the successful regime which we run in the North sea is one in which there has been an understanding that there will be no direct interference with production.

Any impression that may have been given—I hope that it was not—that we could and would influence the price, was a mistake. That would have led to worse relations with the Arab OPEC countries than if there had been a candid explanation at the outset that we had no control over the volume or price of North sea oil, and that we were price takers and not price givers. I always tried for candour with the Arab countries when I was involved with these matters in government.

The fourth reason why price influencing is a dangerous and unwise matter to become involved in, is that it is not entirely in our interests for oil prices to stay locked at the $29 range for Arab light or $30 for North sea crudes. I agree with those who say that, if the price collapsed to $10 or $15, it would create great international instability and considerable problems for this country, but modest falls to the price at which I believe it will settle—the $25 range — would do no harm to this nation or European economies. As he watches the American growth rate ease a little in 1984-85, Mr. Paul Volcker urges western Europe's economies, I believe rightly, to go for some kind of boost. There could be no better boost and no healthier development for European economies, including this country's exports and jobs, than a modest drop in crude oil prices to about $25. That assumes, of course, that the dollar does not collapse. I know that that is a bold assumption, but it is one with which we must work for the time being.

Even if we had the power to do so, which it turns out we do not, there is no broad economic argument in favour of trying to stabilise oil prices in the national interest at the artificially high levels which prevailed until the summer and early autumn of this year.

The argument on the other side is the one that comes through in some of the examinations that the Select Committee has conducted so assiduously and it is heard in a number of discussions about oil prices outside the House. It is that, if the BNOC trading body in London does not intervene in some way in oil pricing, there will be a world collapse of oil prices. That is what the OPEC Ministers say, but they would say that, wouldn't they? We must see through some of the observations, which are part of an understandable attempt to preserve certain interests, about what would cause a collapse in oil prices.

There is still a strong underlying demand for crude oil on the world market. It is not as strong as it was in the late 1970's because of the large increase in conservation and the way that energy has been designed out of a vast range of products. A sensible judgement would point to the oil price stabilising, as I said earlier, at about the mid-20s for the dollar price of oil. We should not be bluffed by the fear that there will be a collapse in oil prices. We should concentrate instead on North sea oil production and pricing, in our own interests.

There are those who say that it is easy to talk about that, but that we must consider Treasury revenues, and remember that they are essential to the Government's overall medium-term financial strategy, and to the Chancellor to enable him to find room for tax cuts or other job creation measures. That, of course, is a separate debate and not one for the House this afternoon.

I had the opportunity to tell the House two or three weeks ago that it was my view that the Chancellor's £1·5 billion available for next year could be within the range of £3 billion or more, not least because of the dollar oil revenues, and because I happen to believe that he has more room within the medium-term financial strategy than previously revealed.

That view has now been confirmed by a series of Treasury leaks over the weekend. We have now all been informed that £3 billion is more likely to be available for tax cuts, national insurance contribution cuts, and help for community enterprise and so on. I welcome that. I see a real prospect for a vigorous assault on unemployment in the new labour market conditions coming in the spring, partly financed by oil revenues.

Most of those revenues are already in the pipeline, by virtue of the 1984 production. I do not believe that fears about the oil price slipping from $30 to $27 or $26 for North sea oil or from $29 to $25 for Arab light would endanger that strategy in any way. If anything, it might enhance the strategy because it would lead to accelerated economic growth in Europe generally, including Great Britain, which would raise tax revenues and provide even more room for the Chancellor to operate in. None of those dangers stands up.

The worries that have led to the view that it would be in some way terrible if BNOC did not involve itself in trying to stabilise world prices are unfounded. There is one danger only which might lead to a major oil price collapse —if BNOC tried desperately to hang on to the existing oil price and then found, as it has already found to some extent, that it could not do so and that it did not work. That would infuriate—it may already have done so—other OPEC producers. In the end the attempt must be abandoned, BNOC must give way, and the position is more unstable and destabilised than it would have been if BNOC had not involved itself in the first place.

I understand the difficulties facing my right hon. and hon. Friends about having a British national oil corporation which must enter into price negotiations, and about having to explain to OPEC leaders and other world oil producers that we have no official price.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): The right hon. Gentleman has not mentioned in his list of consequences the effect of a $25 price on the pound. I mention that neutrally.

Mr. Howell: A good deal of the effect has been discounted. One must consider the relationship between the dollar, the pound, the deutschmark and the yen. The pound may come down in relation to the deutschmark and the yen, which would be a good thing and would make it more favourable for us to join the European monetary system. The dollar would not make much difference to us. I expect that the dollar will come down a little and that the pound will come down with it, but that the deutschmark and yen will strengthen. Because the oil world believes that the price will be $25, most of that has been discounted.

I understand the Government's difficulties and the desire of BNOC not to appear to be in the lead in terms of raising prices, which was the problem two or three years ago when I was involved in the matter, or setting the pace in a vicious spiral of collapse. That is threatened by OPEC, but I do not believe that it is a serious danger. That leads me to the conclusions to which the Select Committee was heading in its lucid report.

If BNOC is to continue as an organisation, it should stick to the simplest rule of pricing. That is, it should try to buy and establish contracts as near as possible to prevailing spot market prices that month and to sell them at the same price, instead of getting caught in elaborate contracts as a buyer and having to sell on spot markets when those to whom it was to sell, walk away. It would be wise for the Government, having learned their lesson, to stand well back from consultations that lead to BNOC doing things in an attempt to influence world oil market prices, which would not and could not work and which would be bound to lose it money and friends. We should return to a matter which I pressed when I was a member of the Government and which I have raised since: that is, we should see whether we can get our security of supply by completely different arrangements, and do away with BNOC.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I congratulate the Select Committee on Energy on its report, which has raised an important question. As the Chairman of that Committee, the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd), said, the question needs to be more widely discussed than the debate can allow. We are debating the most important, dynamic element in the British economy, yet we identify a significant flaw in the Government's attitude towards it. To put it more strongly, the Government do not have a clear idea what their policy is. I suspect that people working at the British National Oil Corporation have even less idea what the Government's policy is and are being left in confusion about what is being expected of them.

The point at issue is the consequence of what no hon. Member believes is anything less than Government intervention in an affair, in which the Government publicly stated they were not intervening. The Government's view was that BNOC acted at arm's length. However, it is obvious that the Government made it clear to BNOC that they wanted it to hold the price, presumably because maintaining a high price would produce a high revenue, which was crucial to their overall financial strategy.

If that is the Government's policy, they should have the honesty to admit it. They should make it clear that that is their objective. Even if it is their policy, it is not clear whether it is workable. This Government of all Governments claim to believe in the forces of the market, yet they have chosen to intervene. The consequence of that is our presence here to debate the £45 million subvention.

I wonder what Britain's real interests are. As the hon. Member for Havant said, before we discovered North sea oil we were sure that neither OPEC nor hi¸h oil prices were a good thing. Since we have become a significant oil producer, we have slipped into thinking—it is perhaps understandable — that high oil prices are to our advantage. However, we have not debated that openly and cleanly, or considered all the options, or whether there are intermediate options. We have effectively moved to the position in which the Government seek to maintain as high an oil price as possible to maximise their revenue.

The Government are not, for example, giving people in Britain who use oil any comparable advantage. On the contrary, people in the market for oil can often buy it more cheaply outside the United Kingdom than inside. Do the Government believe it fair and proper not only to fix the price of oil at the highest level to maximise revenues but, as a consequence of that, to secure a relatively high exchange rate? Industries that are affected by that get no corresponding benefits from the fact that we produce our own oil. We are no better off than if we bought North sea oil directly from OPEC. If the Government believe in the economics of the market, and as it is obvious that North sea oil does not cost anything like $30 a barrel to produce, why are we plugging ourselves into a cartel which we first opposed and them claimed not to have membership of or even direct interest in? In reality it is obvious that we are hanging in there closely.

Given the importance of the issue, the size of the sums involved and the vast quantities of oil that we produce, the matter should not simply be debated for three hours late on an afternoon before Christmas. The issue relates to the core of the managment of our biggest single national asset. The debate should not end today, but should start today and be extended hereafter.

Some members of BNOC staff may wish me to stress that two thirds of the oil that they trade is traded under participation agreements, for which there are long-term contractual arrangements that causes problems when the spot market expands and the spot market price falls. BNOC staff members have been able to deal independently as dealers on the spot market and although it would be an exaggeration to suggest that £500,000 from a £7 billion deal was an extreme profit, it is better than the £45 million loss on the remaining two thirds. That suggests that there is commercial ability in BNOC. I was going to say that BNOC lacks direction, but perhaps it does not know in which direction to move or from which direction the next instruction is likely to come. That leads to confusion.

The other factor that has arisen from the report, and which was touched on, is the anomaly that apparently exists within the British method of taxation—the so-called spinner. It enables oil companies to sell British oil and to obtain a tax benefit from so doing. It has reached such a stage that the tax rules relating to oil companies trading in North sea oil—what I might call British oil—are known as the plug hole or the sink. If an oil company is left with excessive quantities of several sorts of crude oil, it gets rid of North sea oil first because of the tax advantage. That puts further pressure on the price and causes more confusion in the market—confusion that must be to the disadvantage of Britain in general and especially to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, if he changed the rules, would not be accused so much of interfering in the market place and might get some revenue that he is currently foregoing.

I hope that the Minister of State will say whether the Government will consider doing something about the tax rules. They confuse everyone at present. They are confusing to those who take some interest in such matters, but to anyone who has no connection with the oil business, it looks like an unmitigated shambles that lacks proper direction. The Select Committee showed that there appears to be a Government policy, although it may be ill-advised and has not yet been declared. To the extent that a policy has been declared, it would appear to be opposite to what has happened.

The Government should come clean and explain to a much wider public than the few who might have a specialised interest in North sea oil what their objective is. What are we trying to do with our North sea oil assets? Is it simply a matter of getting them out as fast as possible, and trying to hold the price as high as possible to maximise short-term revenue so as to sustain the public sector borrowing requirement and our financial strategy, or do we have an industrial objective to ensure that we get some benefit from being a major oil producer and give ourselves some competitive advantage to ensure that we build an energy industry on the strength of our oil industry? Will there be some recognition that having a petro-currency has many unforeseen effects on our exchange rates?

Recently some paper industry manufacturers told me that the Bowater project that was scrapped about three years ago when the pound was worth $2·20 would have been viable had the pound been worth $1·75. Hon. Members will appreciate that the project would have made money hand over fist with the current rate of exchange at

[Mr. Malcolm Bruce]

$1·17 or $1·18. The Government appear to be interested in achieving stability in the oil price, but they have abdicated all responsibility for stability in the exchange rates, which affect many industries that have no conception of the link between the pound as a petro-currency, Britain's overall trading position and the general mysteries of free exchange rates.

The right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) estimated what would happen to exchange rates. He might be right; I might be right; anyone might be right. The experience of the past two or three years suggests that it will be difficult to predict or plan in those circumstances. If the Government's policy is to achieve stability in oil prices to the extent that the market will allow, the Minister must make it clear how will they relate that to their professed belief in allowing the market to operate freely and in accepting no responsibility for securing stability of the exchange rate. As yet, for reasons which I understand, although I am not sure that we have obtained the right benefits, Britain has not joined the European monetary system.

The Select Committee has provided a useful service in drawing this matter to our attention. I question whether we should approve the subvention, which has been introduced only because the Government appear to be pursuing a policy that is in direct contravention of their stated objective. The Government must not believe that they can continue in that vein, return to the House, after another period of falling prices, and expect the House cheerfully to cough up so much money. They will get a more hostile reception than they have today.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) because, although he is not a member of the Select Committee, which is a loss to us, I enjoyed his perceptive analysis of what has worried the Committee. May I express my gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) for his inspired work as Chairman of the Committee and for his dedication to the job.

The Select Committee concluded that the British National Oil Corporation has become engaged in a creeping transformation, undeclared by the Government. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) so brilliantly said a few moments ago, BNOC was created with the primary objective of maintaining security of oil supplies for Britain at a time when there were shortages, political disruption and steeply rising prices. But without any redirection of policy by the Government, BNOC has been quietly instructed not to secure supply —that is unnecessary at a time of glut and falling prices —but to secure prices. Yet there has been a reluctance to admit that fundamental change in Government policy.

I am reminded of the long Committee debates in which some of us participated during the passing of the Oil and Gas Enterprise Bill in February and subsequent months in 1982. My right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Energy, who is now our distinguished Chancellor of the Exchequer, said:

"The trading corporation will exist for the specific purpose of security of national oil supplies."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 25 February 1982; c. 631.]

We had lengthy discussions in Committee and we were considerably enlightened by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet), who expressed grave anxiety that the British National Oil Corporation was not being hived off or privatised. He believed that there was some doubt as to whether the corporation performed a useful function. He was not given the credit at the time for the amendments that he moved to try to enact the privatisation of the corporation, which were of course resisted by the Government. Nor was he given credit for his profound prognostications at the time.

I did not know that my hon. Friend would be in the Chamber today, and I hope that he is not embarrassed by this, but I shall quote what he said in Committee:

"I should not be surprised if the oil price fell further, to below $30 a barrel."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 11 February 1982; c. 167.]

At the time it was $34 a barrel, and on that basis my hon. Friend argued that there would be a serious impact on the role of BNOC if that trading company were faced with a declining market, difficult trading conditions and the losses that would result.

The Committee's inquiry clearly shows that that is exactly what has happened. There has been a clear change of policy by Government, but a refusal to admit it. Security in a time of glut is an irrelevance, and in any case we have the powers under the Energy Act 1976 to deal with crises. We have the right to buy 51 per cent. without BNOC if we ever needed to exercise that right. We should be curiously questioning why we have to exercise that right to purchase 51 per cent. through Government agencies when we do not need security of supply.

If the policy is to maintain the price of oil, the Government should say so. Why should it not be their policy? It is not a policy of which we need to be ashamed. After all, the Government have declared their policy in many other sectors of the economy where they believe that it is desirable to maintain prices well above market levels, and we accept that. For example, the Government support the airline cartel to maintain airline prices well above the market level, to protect international and national carriers. We may or may not agree that that is a good thing, but that is what happens and the Government admit it.

The Government maintain a coal cartel by subsidising by over £1 billion a year, an industry that produces coal that costs over 50 per cent. above world prices, and the aim is to protect the British coal industry. Some may dispute that policy, but it is accepted and admitted by the Government as official policy.

If my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Energy, who will be replying to the debate, wants a third example of where the Government are honest enough to admit maintaining prices above market levels, there is agriculture. The Government support a food cartel so that our food prices are well above world prices, and this is done to support our agriculture through the CAP. If we can accept Government policy that is believed to be in the national interests in other spheres of our economy, why do we not also accept that, if it is in the national interest to support the price of oil, we should do so? It would be a respectable argument, but the trouble is that we have not yet heard it, and that is what concerned the Committee.

I shall not be presumptuous enough to suggest whether it is in the national interest that we maintain the world price of oil or whether we would be better off if we allowed it to fall. We know that a decline in oil prices would help British industry and consumers, but it would not help the pound, the public sector borrowing requirement or the Treasury. It might even endanger the viability of North sea investment. On the other hand, world trade would grow and we would benefit from that.

However, the Government's argument is that they would not be too happy about a price fall because our competitors, who do not produce oil, would benefit more from the price fall than we would. In particular, Japan, Germany, France and the United States would all stand to gain a great deal more than we would from a substantial reduction in world oil prices. Whatever the arguments, and they have been ably put by my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford, let us at least hear them from the Government. Let it be spelt out — tonight I hope — whether it is in the national interest that we try to sustain the world price of oil and play what role we can in doing so. We should not hide behind BNOC, pretending that we believe in a free market, while authorising that company to try to support the market.

This leads to my principal doubt about the wisdom of the Government's policy towards BNOC, because if it is the Government's declared policy to try to stabilise the price of oil in the national interest, is not the present method of doing it through BNOC the worst possible way to try to achieve that? I should like an answer on this tonight. BNOC has maintained the stability of the oil price by buying oil at fixed prices off the oil companies and immediately selling it on the Spot Market in Rotterdam. Far from having stabilised the price, this may have contributed to a more rapid decline. As the chief executive of BNOC, Mr. Ian Goskirk, succinctly told the Select Committee when it questioned him:

"We cannot stand in the way of market forces."

However, it is clear that that is what the Government have asked BNOC to do.

Has BNOC helped by trying to stand in the way of market forces? Have not its market operations contributed to the fall in prices? Have not BNOC's forced sales on the spot market—it has no reserves in which to hold stocks and has to sell oil stocks as it gets them—become a major factor in the Rotterdam market becoming the price setter rather then the marginal market that it used to be? If the Government want to try to stabilise the price of oil, would they not be more honest to say so and to co-operate openly with OPEC, or even join it? At least we would then know where we are. Afer all, our interests are very much in line with those of OPEC. Government policy would be much more likely to succeed if we actually joined or co-operated more actively.

If the Government are not going to do that, but they wish to make an impact on stabilising the oil prices, they should at least agree to production quotas. That might at least make a useful contribution, as the way that BNOC is trying to influence the market has probably had the reverse effect. Instead of stuffing the Rotterdam spot market with oil as a distress seller, BNOC might have influenced the market more if it had operated in reverse and had bought from the Rotterdam stock market and then sold the oil to the oil companies that were short of crude. I doubt whether BNOC losses would have been greater if it had tried to do that, and it might have had a more beneficial effect on the market.

If the Government wish BNOC to play a role in influencing the market, they have to give BNOC enough muscle to be able to do so. In other words, they must allow it to have the resources with which to hold oil prices, as multinational oil companies do, so that it can operate with a little more flexibility and manoeuvrability than it does now. However, the present obscurity of the Government's stance is unsatisfactory, and I hope that it will not last beyond this evening.

BNOC could be scrapped because it no longer has a useful function, is not required to maintain security of supply and cannot control the market. That would allow the free market to find its own level and allow the oil companies to market their own oil, which they might be able to do without disturbing the market any more than BNOC does. If the Government do not want to take that line, they must outline an effective policy for practical intervention, which perhaps means curtailing production, using BNOC as a market buffer or collaborating more openly with OPEC. They have to take one course or the other, and at the moment we are stuck in the middle.

I hope that, by the end of this debate, the Government will be able to clarify what they believe is in the best national interest. Is it to try to maintain the price of oil, or to allow it to fall? Or do they believe that either course is in the best national interest? Whatever the reason, let the Government outline how they propose to pursue that policy more sensibly than they have so far by using BNOC as a front for policies which they have been incapable of implementing effectively.

7.10 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I thank the chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) for putting so well the Committee's findings on the winter Estimates. The House should consider the Committee's first recommendation. The winter Estimates do not have to be approved until February and yet the Committee had only three weeks to complete its inquiry before it had to come to the House. It is nonsense to have this debate at this time when the Committee could have considered the Estimates in more detail, and have taken more evidence.

I am a member of the Committee and I should have liked to have had the time to ask the Treasury about the implications of the Estimates. I should have liked to ask Treasury Ministers about the British National Oil Corporation.

As the Chairman of the Committee said, we found it easier to summon people than papers. We made several attempts to see a letter sent by the Minister to oil companies in August. Eventually, we got hold of 80 per cent. of the letter. Some remarks in it were missing. I told the Committee that I had already read 90 per cent. of the letter in the newspapers way back in August. It would have been helpful if the entire letter had been shown to us. It is nonsense that we should have had to struggle to obtain information about Estimates of this size.

In the brief time at our disposal we investigated the BNOC's role. Its first role seems to be to maintain supply. At a time of surplus and with a glut in the world energy market, it might seem to some hon. Members that that is not necessarily right. But I believe that it is essential that such an organisation is able to supply us with oil. In the 1960s and 1970s the position was different. Oil was tight on the world market and we could not maintain supply.

The middle east is unstable and OPEC countries are not able to guarantee supplying the world energy market for as long as six months, even at a time of surplus. War and other events could mean that we definitely need BNOC's right to 51 per cent. of production in British waters.

The Select Committee asked the Minister about prices and he replied in a forthright manner:

"Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Thank you. The first point I would make is that neither my Department nor myself set North Sea oil prices."

That is a definite statement which no one can misinterpret. The Minister went on:

"The BNOC has certain functions in relation to the participation agreements and setting its contract prices, and in doing so it forms its own judgment of the market situation, and also consults with my Department, and on occasion with myself, as to what the different factors are that should be taken into account before it sets any particular price."

In all innocence, no one could say that the Department does not have some influence on the setting of North sea oil prices. In the short time that the Committee had, it tried to get to the back of that influence and to find out what had been going on in the last six months.

The Minister has had a few days to reflect and he should tell us his Department's exact involvement. He has admitted that the Department is involved in the setting of prices. That should be debated in the House more fully. All hon. Members should know what is going on.

The Select Committee recommended that no more Supplementary Estimates should go to the BNOC until we are satisfied with the Department's involvement. That is not unreasonable. I do not favour voting against the Estimates if it is in the nation's interest to give public money for the North sea. However, we must know why we give the money and what has happened in the last six months. Against the wishes of many Government Members, because of their ideological stance on the free market economy, we are giving £45 million to private companies. Once that money leaves the BNOC it goes to private interests in the North sea. We should know exactly why £45 million of taxpayers's money should go to private offshore companies operating in British waters.

We must have some answers. How will the Minister ensure that we are informed? How do the Government view contract prices and BNOC's role in them? The Select Committee asked whether contract prices should be changed from three months to one month. I understand that that happens in Norway. Such a change could move contract prices closer to spot prices. The evidence to the Select Committee shows that the spot prices are as near as dammit to the average market price for oil. The three month contract price through BNOC has been higher for some time. Perhaps we should come nearer to the spot price because that seems sensible in terms of the cost of oil to Britain. The spot price share of the total oil market has risen in the past 10 years from 1 per cent. to 40 per cent. and it may not be long before the majority of oil sold on the open market is sold at the spot price.

What are the implications of paying £45 million into the BNOC? I assume that this is being done to maintain spot prices. I understand that tax revenues from North sea oil accrue from the spot price in any event. If £45 million is used to maintain spot price, the Treasury will benefit from the tax revenue. Is there a direct relationship between every £1 million that is used to keep up the spot price and the revenue so derived that is received by the Treasury? We were told in evidence that it would be in the national interest to grant the Supplementary Estimate to BNOC this winter and we should, therefore, know the exact nature of the national interest and whether the Treasury has been receiving revenue. If the Treasury has not accrued the revenue that was expected, there has been a net loss to the national interest. It is important that we ascertain whether that has happened.

It is predicted that there will be a fall in the price of oil. That will have a dramatic effect on Britain if the fall is significant. We have heard about the billions of pounds that the Treasury is receiving in the form of oil revenue. These moneys are used in various areas of the economy. If the moneys were lost, the effect on the United Kingdom economy would be catastrophic.

What would happen if we lowered the price of North sea oil to the spot price? What effect would that have on the revenue that is received by the Treasury and used thereafter to finance the welfare state, for example? Massive sums are received annually from North sea oil revenue and I want to know what will happen if there is a further fall in the price of that oil.

Mr. T. H. H. Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) for his kind of observations. I think that I should be fair to the British National Oil Corporation and acknowledge that it was profitable for at least part of 1984. If blame is to be levelled, it should be levelled at my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, and I say that with much regret.

The price of oil collapsed in July 1984. I tabled a question for written answer on 16 July 1984. I asked my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy

"whether he proposes to give the British National Oil Corporation a specific direction on price for North sea crudes in view of the decline in spot prices."

His answer was:

"No. The prices of United Kingdom North sea crudes are governed by market forces and established by negotiation between BNOC and its customers and suppliers."—[Official Report, 16 July 1984; Vol. 64, c. 67.]

My right hon. Friend stated in evidence to the Select Committee—this is to be found at page 44—

"The spot market is normally the more acccurate reflection of the market price at that moment of time."

That must be set against the colossal loss of £45 million by BNOC which eventually will have to be paid.

It can be argued that one of the first objectives of BNOC was to trade profitably. In 1983, the company made a profit of about half a million pounds on a turnover of about £7 billion, which is a profit of only 0·007 per cent. on turnover. Unfortunately, that was followed by a loss of £45 million in 1984. The corporation is not permitted by statute to act commercially.

At page 35 of the evidence, Lord Croham said:

"The framework which was agreed by Parliament makes it almost impossible for us to earn a profit on the great bulk of our transactions."

What is the use of blaming a corporation for bad results when it is working in an economic straitjacket? By mid-September 1984 the corporation was contractually committed to losses in excess of the value of its assets. If it had been a private concern, it would have been bankrupt. But for the state subsidy that was paid into it, nothing more could occur. We are resigned to the fact that £45 billion must be paid under section 6 of the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act 1982. As grants under that section may be made subject to such conditions as the Secretary of State for Energy, with the approval of the Treasury, may determine, what conditions are to be laid down?

The next objective of the state corporation is that it should receive the maximum benefit from the oil that is available, and that is normally expressed in terms of price. The Government are naturally interested in high prices. As my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) said, North sea oil is a high-cost commodity. Prices range from anything between $6 a barrel to $20. I echo his anxiety about the threats of OPEC. Saudi Arabia's range of production costs is between 35 cents and 50 cents a barrel. That is almost basic and Saudi Arabia can reduce its prices significantly without injuring its own production. Oil is overpriced in the market and the revenue from North sea oil is such that the Treasury dominates the issue. The price of North sea oil is kept high to provide revenue. This is understood fully when it is recognised that the tax take on North sea oil for the five years between May 1979 and October 1984 was no less than £35 billion.

I direct myself to what is probably the most interesting part of the issue, and this is where I affix liability on the Government. They talk about consultations with BNOC, but the corporation is simply a negotiating front. The Government control the corporation while standing in the shallows. At page 15 of the evidence, Lord Croham said:

"we do not get details of the information available to the Government. We do get a Government's judgment as far as the national interest is concerned. We agree with Government judgments. It is their judgment, not ours."

There are an enormous number of factors which have nothing to do with BNOC. Let us consider them. There is United Kingdom standing in Saudi Arabia, which is a matter of great importance. There is the effect of pricing on world financial institutions. The indebtedness of Group 77 is of prime importance. The momentum of development in the North sea, the amount of investment and the fear of plunging prices are similarly critical issues. There are many other factors but I shall not refer to them now. These are matters for the Government and not for BNOC.

It is rather extraordinary that there are other factors that may induce the Secretary of State to reach his own decision and simply instruct BNOC what to do. Her Majesty's Government have the right to give a specific directive to BNOC, whenever they like, on a particular matter, including pricing, under section 4(1) of the Petroleum and Submarine Pipe-lines Act 1975. When Dr. Otaiba and Sheikh Yamani come to the United Kingdom, they are not concerned to see the chairman of BNOC; they go straight to the Secretary of State or the Minister of State if necessary, if the Secretary of State is not around. The man who can influence decisions is the man to whom they want to talk. It is not the distinguished chairman of BNOC; he might not be available. Anyhow, he is not the major front.

It was rather significant that if the Government were lacking in influence, the Minister of State should send that letter to the oil companies on 31 July 1984, which he refused to give to the Select Committee because it held confidential information. It urged the companies to support the figure that had been set by BNOC.

Furthermore, we know that OPEC is considering the matter tomorrow. Today's edition of the Financial Times contains an article with the heading:

"Government blocks BNOC move to stem losses".

That is just a heading; I shall not go into detail on that point, because the article is there for everyone to read. The newspaper is naturally assuming that the Government have the right to lay down what they consider to be the reality of the matter.

The third major objective of BNOC is security of supply. My right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) and my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash dealt with that matter adequately. However, there is no problem in the present era of substantial surpluses. There are complete statutory controls covering 20 Acts of Parliament and a myriad of regulations over the North sea, and those operations go into considerable depth. The legislation includes the Energy Act 1976, which could be modified to provide for economic conditions short of crisis.

There is also a substantial indigenous oil industry and reserves in the United Kingdom. The Government hold a 31·731 per cent. investment in British Petroleum. That is not without significance. A strategic national reserve of proved areas could be established in the North sea, analogous to the naval reserves of the United States of America. They have not been so established. A strategic national storage facility could be evolved. That approach is well understood in the United States and Japan.

I should like to refer to the power to influence the market. It will be argued by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State that there is a distinction between fundamental change and short-term fluctuations. That point was also made by one of the directors of the BNOC on page 16 of the notes of evidence. However, that is of little value if one cannot identify the difference between the two. It is well known that BNOC's power to influence crises such as those in 1973-74 and 1979-80 was absolutely nil. The power to use the marginal barrel to influence a saturated market when OPEC's production allocations are under threat is also extremely limited. It is notorious that no attempt was made to smooth the market in the way recommended when the price was going up. When the price went up from $1·5 a barrel to $12 a barrel, not a squeak. When it was going up from $12 to $25, not a squeak. When it went up to $40 in Libya, not a squeak. The power has been used only when the price has been in decline. There is a vested interest on the part of Government to keep it up for revenue purposes.

I should like to make some recommendations. There is no harm in hon. Members making recommendations, even though the Government may disregard them. The basic approach is simple. To reduce the quarterly period to one month for fixing price to prevent term and spot prices moving too far apart is one recommendation. It is open to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to make it if he wants, but it is only cosmetic. One could fix the price by the spot market, analogous to what is going on in Norway. That approach is understood and could be commended. If we must keep BNOC, we should abstract the United Kingdom from the centre of the debate about managed oil prices and intergovernmental relations with OPEC, by shifting to the United States system of allowing individual buyers to post prices according to the market. I give the analogy of refiners in the United States of America. Ministers should give full encouragement to the forward market that emerged in the United Kingdom in 1982 in response to the need for a hedging mechanism in the United Kingdom.

[Mr. T. H. H. Skeet]

There could be other recommendations as well. We could for the time being cease taking royalties in kind. We could reduce the amount of participation crude and, if the concept must be retained, we could reduce it to 20 per cent. of the total. Also, as BNOC has no long-term strategic storage facilities, if the corporation is to be retained, that prospect should be considered. The strategy involves the manipulation of stocks in relation to the market.

An alternative that I fully recommend, which I do not suppose the Minister will accept, is to abolish BNOC and let the industry operate subject to modifications of the Energy Act 1976. If BNOC is not abolished, a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission for a comprehensive review might be useful.

I hope that my recommendations will be useful to the Minister if only because the structure of the market has been altered. In coming to his conclusions, he will note the ascendancy of the spot market in this era. It may change, but it is here for the moment and there has been a substantial decline in the term market. Spot prices for Arabian light are $27·45 while the term prices are $29. Spot prices for Brent blend are anything between $26·80 and $26·90, as opposed to the term price of $28·65. Therefore, spot is vital and one has to get a price near to it to avoid loss.

OPEC members ignore official prices. OPEC does not sell at term prices, and many members over-produce—the Nigerians, the Iranians and the Emirates——

Mr. Rowlands: And the United Kingdom.

Mr. Skeet: Those countries exceed agreed production quotas. The United Kingdom does not have agreed production figures.

Those countries exceed production quotas, formerly 17·5 million barrels a day and now 16 million barrels a day. Half of them sell at discounts and under barter arrangements and by other means. It is hypocritical on their part to say that the United Kingdom's action is wrong. The United Kingdom could afford to be much more courageous. The size of stocks is often the invisible factor. The stock position is becoming a key factor. It could have played a distinctive and much more effective role in the 1979-80 crisis.

All that I shall say about taxation is that current taxation distorts the market. The current differentials do not make sense. The problem has arisen because differentials between light and heavy crude oils have not been changed, and it does not look as if there is any possibility of OPEC getting together to change them.

There have been one or two other changes—a change in the use of oil and the yield of products, and a decline in the energy-intensive industries. The impact of conservation has been greatly underestimated.

BNOC and the Government have failed to assess correctly the measure of demand in a saturated market and to recognise the inability of OPEC members to maintain their production quotas and change differentials. For the time being, the market is on the way down. I suggest that the grant should be made only subject to the strict conditions under section 6(2) of the 1982 Act; otherwise it would be unreasonable for the House to pass it.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): I am grateful for this opportunity of saying a few words in this debate which, as has already been said, comes on the eve of an important OPEC meeting tomorrow. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd), the Chairman of the Select Committee, on the excellent way in which he introduced the debate. We have heard a fascinating series of speeches, and the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) was superb in its analysis of the situation facing us.

It is equally important that we should be debating oil at a time when our minds have been totally concentrated on the crisis in the coal industry. In a way, like many energy matters, the two subjects are related, although not in the context of this debate. The heavy use of oil in our power stations has replaced coal burning, and has thereby eased the surplus of heavy oil stocks which now exists.

The extra amount of oil now consumed by our electricity generating stations must, however, have a limited effect on the overall world situation. But if instead of recent reports of attacks by Iraqi jets on oil tankers in the Gulf there were reports of the closure of the Straits of Hormuz by action there, the present situation would be totally reversed, and we would be discussing the crisis of oil shortages developing, not in weeks or months, but literally in hours.

We have experienced that in the past, and it will be remembered that within hours queues were forming at garages, rationing was considered and all sorts of emergency measures were taken. A recurrence is not a remote possibility. It is a very real one. The Iran-Iraq war has not ended and more and more is becoming a war of attrition aimed at oil production and the movement of oil rather than a swift land-based assault.

We are now in the middle of a coal industry dispute, and are dependent on a large oil burn in our power stations, yet in the middle east there is potential for disaster in relation to oil supplies. BNOC as it exists today—a trading company in North sea oil—is a security weapon for the Government. In my view it should be retained and clearly explained as such.

Although private oil companies have given assurances of supply to the United Kingdom market in the event of a crisis, access to 51 per cent. of participation oil, which BNOC has by law, would be a valuable underpinning of our crude oil supplies in the event of such an emergency. I therefore believe that we are right to continue the present BNOC role in relation to security of supply.

Perhaps the most important aspect of this report is the role of Government in the pricing of our oil. I actually believe that there is a limited role to play and that it should be clearly stated. I accept the Select Committee's criticism that perhaps this has not been clearly stated, and the debate gives my right hon. Friend the Minister of State an opportunity more clearly to define that role.

If one accepts my description of the crisis that could develop quickly, no one can doubt that at very short notice oil prices could begin to escalate sharply, thereby affecting world currencies and creating economic instability. The same situation could develop in reverse and there could be a downward spiral of oil prices. The oil market is unstable at present, with excess world production capacity, and the marginal cost of production is much lower than the current world price, as my hon. Friend the Member for Havant clearly explained.

In the short term, oil demand and production are insensitive to price, but with Nigeria threatening to match any price reduction by BNOC, and with Saudi Arabia and other Gulf states speaking in terms of a price war would force other oil producers out of the market, there might be no clear bottom to such a free fall in oil prices.

I do not believe that we would benefit from a collapse in oil prices. I doubt whether any hon. Member believes that. But great damage could be caused to the world banking system and to the basis for industrial investment in energy industries, not just in production but in energy-using and conservation industries.

The likelihood is, as in the 1970s, that we would experience a sharp increase as equilibrium was restored. We would again be in the seesaw position that we were in throughout the late part of the 1970s and the early 1980s, and our own expensive North sea oil-producing sector would be hard hit.

Only this morning I asked a number of oil company executives whether they felt that BNOC should continue to play a role, however limited, in pricing at the margin. They all felt that such a role had to be played. If we accept that BNOC can exert any stabilising influence, even in the shortest of terms, it should continue to do so. The spot market is declining, companies are releasing stocks on to the market, and traders are selling short in the expectation of a price fall. OPEC meets tomorrow and it must decide its response.

In these circumstances, a price cut by BNOC before this meeting would further undermine market confidence and prompt a further "stock draw" and short selling. That would set off price cuts by other producers, and again we would get caught in the downward spiral of the collapse of oil prices. Nor would such an action enable BNOC to reduce its losses, as in that kind of uncertain market spot prices are likely to fall by as much as, or more than, term contract prices would be cut. It would therefore be wise to wait until underlying market trends have been clarified by the OPEC meeting and we have a truer indication of the winter demand for oil. Experience has shown how a change in climatic conditions in the winter can materially affect oil demand within a short period.

The Select Committee was right to draw attention to the role of BNOC and, therefore, the Government's role in oil pricing. I accept that there is an inter-relationship between the two. The £45 million losses during the recent period of falling spot oil prices requires detailed explanation, although in oil trading terms that is not a large amount and might easily be recouped in a stable or rising market. When one looks at the figures of the major oil companies, one can see that a comparatively small amount of money is lost or gained. In any case, I imagine that the Exchequer recoups most of this loss in increased tax revenue. I hope that my right hon. Friend will confirm that.

I do not believe that BNOC or the Government have any illusions about their power to determine or influence oil prices in other than the most limited or marginal way. It would be wrong for BNOC to try to lead in fixing oil prices, but any attempt to retain stability is to be welcomed. The BNOC price card can be played only occasionally. It cannot be used every few months. There must be quite a long interval between occasion of its use. I hope that my right hon. Friend will assure the House that he accepts this description of BNOC's role and that the present losses on trading will be eliminated once the threatened free for all drop in prices has been averted. Our thanks are due to my hon. Friend and his Committee for the excellent work they carried out in a very short period of time. I hope that we shall receive a number of detailed answers to the questions that the committee raised.

In conclusion, may I say to the House that I have another parliamentary engagement to fulfil, which was fixed a long time ago. Therefore, I hope that my right hon. Friend and hon. Members will excuse me if I am not here for the winding-up speeches.

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): At the risk of placing yet another laurel on the stoical head of my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) I shall nevertheless do so; it is a risk worth taking. My hon. Friend performed an excellent job in chairing the Select Committee throughout this important inquiry. I run a risk in experiencing chairmanship of that kind. As a relatively new Member of the House I am beginning to think that these inquiries can take place within 15 days, with an immediate debate on the report being held on the Floor of the House. Perhaps that illusion will be shattered in due course. In congratulating my hon. Friend, may I extend my remarks not only to my hon. Friend and to my colleagues on the Committee but to the officers who serviced the Committee and produced a draft report and then a final report within very strict guidelines.

A number of interesting points have been highlighted relating to BNOC. Much has been said about its important statutory responsibility to secure supply. During the inquiry I felt that the responsibility for ensuring security of supply was outweighed by what my right hon. Friend the Minister believed to be another responsibility of equal, if not overriding importance, namely the national interest. Throughout our short inquiry, it seemed to me that the definition of "national interest" was at the centre of the investigation. My view is that, when the legislation was framed, drafted and passed by the House, "national interest" had a different meaning from its present definition. My view is that "national interest" had some connection with security of supply. It had to be placed in the context of the failure of the oil companies that were participating in North sea development to give satisfactory undertakings to the Government of the day that in a crisis they would continue to supply resources to the Government. What has taken place since then is an indication of a change in the definition of "national interest". This definition was returned to again and again during the evidence given by both BNOC and my right hon. Friend. I ask my right hon. Friend to elaborate in his winding-up speech upon what he now believes to be the national interest.

It is possible that a case could be made for maintaining BNOC involvement in the national interest, whatever that may be. The problem is that it has not yet been properly defined. There has been a departure from the original concept. Is it in the national interest to maintain a continuous process of investment in the North sea? I understand that oil companies and others who are involved in North sea developments and its potential believe this to be a great priority. That may be a national interest which is worth developing.

[Mr. Gerald Malone]

Is it in the national interest to maintain the price of oil at a certain level so that the Exchequer benefits from it? The evidence we heard leads me to say that that is not the case — for two reasons. There is the view that the Exchequer benefits from a high price and a high tax take. Alternatively, if we support the price of oil, as we are doing in this supplementary Estimate, the view is that we have to vote sufficient funds to supplement the losses of BNOC. It goes further than that and points to another motive of the Government.

There is not a strict balance between the benefit to the Exchequer and the benefit to the country and BNOC as a whole in maintaining prices if they operate a tax break system. I do not suggest that there was a covert arrangement. However, an arrangement was certainly arrived at by the Treasury which gave those who participated in purchasing oil and selling it on the market at BNOC prices a marker price. This was fixed for revenue and tax purposes at a totally different level than that which was fixed by BNOC. That indicates that another extremely relevant factor was involved in what the Government were doing. This goes to the crux of the matter.

We were constantly told in the evidence by parties who were mutually engaged in discussions, conversations and various exchanges of influence that one had no effective influence over the other. I found this to be quite incredible. Perhaps I may suggest to the House a similar example. If a man and his mistress are found in flagrante delicto—not in a seedy hotel but in a comfortable hotel—and they suggest that they are engaged in no more than an exchange of views, one could take an objective view of it. However, my objective view of the suggestion made by my right hon. Friend and BNOC in their evidence was that I did not believe it. I believe that there was collusion and a certainty of purpose in their negotiations and discussions and that they went along with each other in very close agreement. The question before the House is whether that was in the national interest and whether it is right that we should vote the supplementary Estimate.

I credit my right hon. Friend with a little more horse sense than to suggest to the House that this came out of the blue. I believe that it was unique. There has been an attempt to influence oil prices. My right hon. Friend probably understands that in a wider context and in the more difficult market than has been faced during the last 10 or 12 months this might be impossible. However, there was an opportunity, and the Government took it. In this instance, the price is relatively low. However, I doubt very much whether this kind of opportunity can be taken again.

It is worth considering where we go from here. It is essential that we should move towards a more market-oriented pricing system for BNOC. The lead has been given by Norway. I believe that it will inevitably be followed, unless we are to come back to the House continually with supplementary Estimates of this kind. If this were to be a permanent feature of Government policy, the supplementary Estimate would not be for £45 million. It would be for a figure well in excess of £45 million. I accept that this is an extremely delicate time. Meetings of OPEC are taking place. Therefore, it is impossible for my right hon. Friend to form a firm view. However, it would be helpful if he could tell us that movement is taking place towards a more market-oriented pricing system. Unless such an indication is given, we must assume that the policy of this country is that oil prices should be kept high—for the good of what? I do not take the view that our manufacturing industries should be thrown away or put at a disadvantage compared with our industrial competitors. My view is that if within the broad context of Government policy it is possible to achieve a low energy pricing policy, we should be decisively striving towards it rather than trying to prevent it. I shall be most interested to hear my right hon. Friend's views on the direction in which he sees Government policy going.

It would be unfortunate if, in the future, we were always debating whether BNOC should be continually subvented. Can we tonight have a clear view of where Government policy is leading? If my right hon. Friend can convince the House that to subsidise oil prices with taxpayers' money, albeit in a somewhat circuitous way, is worthwhile for Britain, let us hear that and argue it out on the Floor of the House. My right hon. Friend may well convince us on that point.

Unless my right hon. Friend is prepared to admit that the purposes for which the BNOC was set up in the first place have been long outlived by the practical realities of the market—the fact of a continuously rising oil price until relatively recently and the fact that Britain is now a major producer and is well able in an oil glut to secure its supply—the debate would be sterile. That would be a loss, in view of all the work that my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) did in Committee.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Having been brought up against a Welsh nonconformist background, I shall not follow the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Malone) in the habits he so vividly described in Latin terms. But I shall follow him in one other sense; that is to convey my congratulations and thanks to the Chairman and members of the Select Committee for producing this short and sharp report.

It is sharp in more ways than one. I am too gentle a soul to draw too much attention to some of the things that the Committee says about the Government's policy and their attitude and approach. The Minister will have read it and the strictures are there. However, it was invaluable in helping us to concentrate our minds.

I felt a nostalgia for our debates on the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Bill. There are few survivors of those Committees. The hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) and I spent many an hour debating the problems that would arise in BNOC once it was shorn from the mainstream exploration and development side which was hived off in the form of Britoil.

Between us we made a number of forecasts about the potential vulnerability of a national oil corporation left to trade in the way that it was. No hon. Members, despite our perception, forecasting and crystal ball gazing, quite foresaw the way in which the financial crisis would hit BNOC. Why we did not has been brought out by several hon. Members who have spoken. We spent our time thinking that BNOC (Trading) had only one objective, and that was to secure supplies.

I cannot recall debating the other objectives at any length in Committee. The then Secretary of State for Energy, who is now Chancellor, and his Ministers, did not produce any argument in favour of a BNOC trading organisation other than to ensure the security of supply.

Clearly, in doing that, the corporation would become involved in pricing, but it would, in a sense, always be reacting to pricing and not in any way trying to shape up.

It is clear that in recent months, for reasons which await a more elaborate account from the Minister, BNOC and the Government have been trying to do something rather different from what was traditionally seen to be the role of BNOC (Trading). It would be easy to heap blame on a state organisation that has lost £45 million. But, as the report and the evidence clearly show, the decision was taken by the Government and BNOC after consultation. We should not try to blame BNOC. It was arrived at by a joint process.

Let me underline that point. In paragraph 93 of the evidence the Minister gave the striking testimony:

"I believe the BNOC has scope to act in the short term to influence what may happen in the oil market."

That was a straightforward admission that the Government supported and were involved in the process of trying to do something, albeit in the short term, about oil prices.

Mr. Goskirk, in his evidence at paragraph 9, underlined that point even more strongly. He said:

"we felt that it was worthwhile as far as both our commercial interest and—following discussion with the Secretary of State for Energy—the national interest were concerned to seek a pause. That pause took place and the pause was achieved".

Again, that is a clear statement of a deliberate endeavour. We do not say that the Government have acted surreptitiously. At least in the evidence there is a confession that there was a joint operation of a kind and character which, when we debated the notion and nature of the BNOC, I cannot recall ever envisaging.

Therefore, we have every right to say that there is not just a change in degree but a qualitative change in the way in which the BNOC and the Government tried to do something about oil prices in the summer of this year. We must ask why they did it, what has been the consequence and where we go from here. Those are the three questions posed in one way or another by the Select Committee's report.

I should like to have a shot at trying to answer some of those questions. Let me try to offer a slightly different interpretation of events from that produced by the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) and one or two other hon. Members who have spoken critically of the attitude of Government and BNOC to oil prices.

I do not think for one moment that either BNOC or the Government chose to become involved. It was not some sort of great voluntary act. The missing ingredient in the otherwise excellent Select Committee's report is some sort of analysis of how events unfolded over the 18 months leading up to the events of this summer. If we look back at those 18 months and at the role oil plays in our economy, we can anticipate some of the answers that the Minister might wish to give as to why we became involved in the way that we did this summer.

I have discussed the matter with various people and I believe that part of the answer lies in the events of February and March 1983. Until then, BNOC (Trading) and the Government had managed to stay out of the price argument in international terms. BNOC did what we all thought it was doing—reacted to prices. When the market shifted its price moved.

There was a vigorous reaction by OPEC and, particularly, the Nigerians, in February and March 1983 when they trumped the BNOC alteration in price and therefore deliberately involved BNOC and the Government in the whole argument about pricing policy. Until then we had stayed out of the turmoil of OPEC arguments and the problems of the various conflicting interests within OPEC. From that time on BNOC, the Government and North sea oil prices were caught up in the commercial and political swirl of OPEC and the problems of some of its members. Therefore, we did not have much choice. We did not volunteer—I hope that the Minister did not volunteer—to get involved in those arguments. There was a reaction from OPEC to the situation.

If one agrees with that assessment and interpretation, it helps us to try to understand what followed. Once such a situation occurs, North sea oil prices become a politically sensitive issue. They become part and parcel of an argument with OPEC. I cannot recall Sheikh Yamani or the chairman of OPEC making statements of the kind that we have seen today on the tapes or in the last few days and weeks about North sea oil prices. It is not our position but OPEC's that is the reason for our sudden involvement. OPEC's whole ramshackle effort to sustain a price and to balance and juggle its position is in trouble.

The ultimate absurdity was when the Norwegians managed to create the last oil crisis. Who, in the name of heaven, would have thought that the Norwegians could create an oil crisis? The only reason why the Norwegians have managed to create an oil crisis and North sea oil prices have become politically sensitive is that OPEC cannot square the situation. OPEC cannot balance the books. It cannot balance the relationship between production price and demand. It is trying to do so, and I understand the reasons for that, but the problem is with OPEC. We have been caught up in the swirl. That is one of the reasons why British and Norwegian North sea oil prices, BNOC and Statoil are now causing not so much a ripple as a shudder throughout the system. It is because the system itself is now unstable.

In one sense, Sheikh Yamani has a point. Throughout his evidence to the Select Committee the Minister defended the short-term intervention on the ground that it was an attempt to stabilise the situation. He does not seem to mind which way prices go, so long as they go quietly. Whether they go up or down he seems not to have a view, although we shall try to tease one out of him today. Because he wanted them to go quietly, he was interested in stability. I suspect, however, that the only people who can provide some kind of stability are the members of OPEC.

Mr. Skeet: But they cannot.

Mr. Rowlands: Perhaps not, but only OPEC has the size and weight even to attempt it. Sheikh Yamani thus has some right to feel that there is still something of perfidious Albion about us. We talk about price stability and indulge in mini-interventions in the market, while draining our North sea oil at a fantastic pace. Despite the abortive attempt to cut the price in July so as to sell the oil, I suspect that most people are on their prayer mats praying that OPEC will succeed in holding something like the current price level. For a variety of reasons, a sudden downward lurch in oil prices may not be in the interests of the British economy. I leave that open to question as I intend to return to the points raised by Conservative Members about the national interest in this respect. At any rate, if we are talking about price stability only OPEC is capable of achieving that. Experience in July certainly showed that the British Government and BNOC cannot do much about it. Moreover, the attempt cost £45 million. We must therefore be careful where we stand on this.

Mr. Skeet: The hon. Gentleman must face reality. If demand is slack and OPEC cannot control its member states, which constantly seek to increase production, there will be a greater surplus and prices will fall in the long term.

Mr. Rowlands: If the hon. Gentleman had listened more carefully, he would realise that I had described that situation as vividly as he has. As I have said, OPEC has and will continue to have great difficulty in maintaining that ramshackle operation.

Mr. Skeet: Why should we support it?

Mr. Rowlands: I did not say that we should. I am about to give my view on the matter. I was saying that Sheikh Yamani might have a point because we keep talking about price stability when he and OPEC are the only people capable of trying to achieve a measure of stability. It may not be in our interests for that to happen, but in the summer the Government and BNOC tried in a small way to stabilise prices and to create a pause through a minor form of intervention.

Mr. Skeet indicated dissent.

Mr. Rowlands: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head. I know that the attempt failed. It tried to buck the system, but the power of the market was far greater than the effort put into the attempt to influence it. Nevertheless, if Sheikh Yamani were in the House today I believe that he would try to make the case that I have described, although personally I do not agree with it and I do not believe that it is necessarily in our best interest for OPEC to succeed in its attempt.

This is what we want to know from the Minister. It was he, not the Select Committee or the Opposition, who talked about the greater national interest. We are entitled to ask him to define what he means by that. The Select Committee believes that the Government have an oil price policy. I do not know whether they have such a policy, but assuming that they do, it is a somewhat schizophrenic one to say the least. I hope that the Minister will define what he regards as the broader national interest in relation to the action that he has chosen to take.

Like other hon. Members, I wish to emphasise the dilemmas and conundrums that face us when we discuss the national interest in relation to oil prices. A fairly dramatic fall in oil prices, albeit organised to take place reasonably steadily, might help to recreate our non-oil economy. The area that I represent would certainly welcome support and assistance to recreate our manufacturing industry. On the other hand, a high and stable price is perhaps the only way to ensure development of our most marginal oilfields. What is the Minister's view on that? Would a fall in price of the kind described by the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), a former Secretary of State, have a detrimental effect on the marginal oil fields so important to future North sea oil supplies? Would a high, stable oil price prevent further decimation of our currency against the dollar? In one year we have already devalued our currency by 25 per cent. against the dollar.

The right hon. Member for Guildford seemed to take a rather sanguine attitude to the possible impact on our currency of a fall in oil price of $4 or so per barrel. I should have expected such a major issue to arouse considerable worry. Certainly the Treasury could not ignore it unless the Government's "sound money" policy has now been abandoned. As virtually every hon. Member has pointed out, the Chancellor is like an addict. He is hooked on the oil revenue and cannot afford to come off it. To add to our conundrums and dilemmas, the Chancellor's position is perhaps the most curious of all. Every time the pound goes down his oil revenues increase because they are calculated in dollars, giving him a rather perverse, topsy-turvy interest in further devaluation of the pound against the dollar.

Those are the dilemmas and conundrums that we face and to which the Select Committee rightly challenged the Government to respond. I feel that the poor Minister of State, Department of Energy should not really be facing these questions, as answering them should be the job of the Chancellor. Nevertheless, we can ask the Minister of State what he intends to do in response to the situation in which BNOC and the Government now find themselves.

However, we must be careful. Here I part company with some Conservative Members. In the longer term I believe that there remains an important role—a vital role—for BNOC in maintaining the security of our oil supplies. That was the original reason for maintaining a state trading oil company, and we should not be blown off course because in the short term we have a glut of oil and BNOC has to change the shrewd and skilful pricing operation which it maintained until last summer. There is a strong case for retaining BNOC (Trading), which has been and can still be a sensible and useful instrument.

It is a pity that the Chancellor of the Exchequer—the former Secretary of State for Energy — is not here, although he has apologised to us for his absence and explained his reasons. He, more than anyone else, knows the value of BNOC and how it can marginally alter the situation and bring oil back into the market. In the summer of 1979, he was harried at the Dispatch Box by Government and Opposition Members about the shortage of oil at filling stations throughout the country. He knows about the skilful role played by BNOC in bringing back into our market not a huge but a significant and useful amount of oil and in trying to stabilise oil supplies within the United Kingdom. He will also know — here I disagree with the hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost), who said that if BNOC carries on, it could cut the volume of oil purchased—that volume is essential for flexibility and for the potential of affecting the market in a time of crisis or shortage. It was so in 1979 and would be so in a future crisis.

The hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) tried to argue that we have other means of ensuring that we do not run short of oil. He had the audacity to quote British Petroleum as an example. In 1973-74, when the Government owned a much greater percentage of BP and the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) called in the chairman of BP on the question whether BP should make some great national contribution to the management of the crisis, he was given short shrift — or so I understand from some of the books and articles that I have read. We cannot rely on a 30 per cent. share in BP to offer security of supply. I do not think that the cumbersome and draconian powers in the 1976 Energy Act would suffice either. We argued that out in discussion on the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act 1982. There is no sensible solution in that direction. We have a sensible, helpful, professionally organised and professionally run trading corporation which has been given that function. In my view, despite the problems identified in the report, and the Committee's strictures and the valuable questions that it has posed, the corporation should be allowed to survive.

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): I should like first to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd)—as other right hon. and hon. Members have done—on chairing the Select Committee and presenting the report today. I would certainly wish to echo the congratulations that have been showered on my hon. Friend and his Committee from every side. They are to be congratulated especially on the speed with which they carried through their investigation. I also congratulate my hon. Friend on the manner in which he presented his report to us. In many respects, his speech was a model of the way in which such reports should be presented. My hon. Friend will not, however, be surprised to hear that, although I admire his style, I do not wholly agree with the content of his speech.

This is an important subject, and I think that the Select Committee did a good job in a short time, although I may not agree with everything said in the report. The subject is important not only to the members of the Select Committee, to my Department and to BNOC, but on a much wider scale. It is therefore disappointing that the House is not crowded—to say the least—for this debate. I understand the reasons why some hon. Members who have participated in the debate have not been able to see the matter to its conclusion, but I am sorry that they are not here.

Firstly, I wish to deal with one or two points not referred to so far at any length, although my hon. Friend the Member for Havant referred to some of them. I refer to some of the procedural points to which the Committee drew attention in the third paragraph of its report. As the members of the Select Committee will understand, some of those matters are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. I have drawn those matters to his attention.

However, one of the procedural points lies closer to my own responsibilities. I refer to the recommendation that, in future, minutes notifying Parliament of a contingent liability to the Consolidated Fund should be copied to the Public Accounts Committee and the relevant departmental Select Committee. I discussed that point with my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, and the Goverment accept the Committee's view. My right hon. Friend is asking all Government Departments to observe that practice in future. I apologise to the Committee for not having done so in this case, and I am glad that this occasion has given us an opportunity to change in a minor but important way the procedures that we follow in relation to Select Committees and supplementary estimates.

On the main subject of the debate, I have the same views as I expressed when I appeared before the Select Committee a week ago. There are two central themes. First, is it necessary to retain BNOC? The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) dwelt on that point in the latter part of his speech. He spoke about participation and security of supply. The second theme is the exact nature of the Government's relationship to BNOC and the Government's policy in relation to actions that may be followed by BNOC in carrying out its responsibilities.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney and my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) were right to draw attention to one of the fundamental subjects of discussion in such a debate—the role of BNOC in relation to its participation agreements and to the security of supply. I remind my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) that under the participation agreements, which have been fully discussed in earlier debates, BNOC has to give notice up to two years in advance. If one takes the view that BNOC should work in a more flexible way, one should be prepared to argue that there should be no participation agreements. However, if one has participation agreements, and contracts have to be entered into in advance and notice has to be given, it is inevitable that the situation cannot be as flexible as my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash and some other hon. Members would wish.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter said, we could face disruption in the Gulf at any time. Exocets are still used against tankers, and Iran is still threatening retaliation on the oil trade of other Arab states. Most of the present world surplus capacity is also in the Gulf. If production there were lost, so also would be the spare capacity. During the past 12 months one of the main anxieties in the European Community which is principally an oil-consuming interest, and in the International Energy Agency has been the threat of an interruption in the supply of oil from the Gulf. Although there is a surplus, the IEA reviewed its contingency plans which culminated in co-ordination, especially over the use of stocks. The agreement was reached as recently as 11 July. The adequate stocks of oil have been discussed three times this year at meetings of the Energy Council of the European Community which I have attended. Simply because we transparently have a surplus, we should not dismiss the argument about security of supply. We should also bear it in mind that security of supplying is of interest to other consuming countries.

However, participation is not a simply a matter of security. We must ensure that the United Kingdom continental shelf and the price that Britain secures for oil in international markets is not entirely under the control of international integrated companies. We must also ensure that there are some arms length sales at transparent prices. That is an important function which BNOC performs in setting the reference price. I know that there are other systems. Some have been mentioned in Committee and my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North, (Mr. Skeet) in his knowledgeable speech—I expect no less of him—referred to the American posted price system. Other systems are not necessarily comparable with those which we work. The American system is based on a strong independent refinery sector. That makes it much easier to establish the arm's-length price. If we think that we need another system, it is not enough simply to draw attention to systems in other countries.

In regard to security of supply and a reference price for taxation purposes, BNOC performs an important and useful function. The second main area of debate today and in the Committee concerns policy on oil prices. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) said that we appear to have no policy. I only wish that he had read the Committee's evidence. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney obviously has. If the hon. Member for Gordon had read my evidence to the Committee and that of the BNOC, I do not believe that he would have said what he did. I accept what my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), who has had experience of these responsibilities, and others have said. I told the Select Committee that the United Kingdom cannot control world oil prices. I accept that. We are only a minor player as compared to others. A country is given power in the world oil market by its production capacity and reserves. The United Kingdom is in a relatively minor league in that regard as compared to other countries such as Russia and the United States. Saudi Arabia is in a completely different league as it has four times our production capacity and 13 times our reserves. Moreover, it is able to vary production from less than 4 million barrels a day to 10 million barrels a day. That puts the matter into perspective. As I think I have made clear, the United Kingdom cannot influence any long-term trend in oil prices.

Mr. Skeet: On 16 July—at the time of the collapse of prices—my right hon. Friend told me that there were market forces which guide BNOC. I assume that he did not intervene to save this great liability because some other factors were involved. What were they? What were the factors that he was keen to operate on which would stay the hand of BNOC? My right hon. Friend did not intervene on oil prices when he could have done to save the situation.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Perhaps my hon. Friend will give me a little more time to develop my speech. I should like to deal with the relationship between the Government and BNOC. I should like also to answer the question which more than one hon. Member has asked—what price level the United Kingdom and the Government believe correct. As I endeavoured to make clear in the Select Committee last week, the Government do not believe that any given price is desirable in the national interest. I accept in general terms that a lower price would stimulate the world economy and lead to various advantages. However, it would also lead to certain disadvantages. That issue is, to some extent, academic. The Select Committee considered it. As I said in the Committee, the question is academic because we do not believe that anything we do will influence the long-term movement of world prices. However, we recognise that precipitate changes in price pose a danger in the world oil market. There is no short-term economic limit to the price to which oil could rise, nor is there any economic floor. There is always a risk that once the price has started to change there can be a huge and fast change.

Mr. Skeet: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My hon. Friend has made his speech. Perhaps he will allow me to develop mine.

In an effective speech, my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford said that there could be a role for BNOC or the Government in the short term taking an interest in what happens to oil prices. If BNOC allowed a fast, sharp and precipitate change in the short term, great damage could result. That is the type of national interest to which I ask my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North to address himself.

Mr. Skeet: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I shall give way soon. My hon. Friend has asked me to say what the national interest is. He wants to interrupt me before I have completed my answer. Short-term precipitate changes would damage the economy. They would destroy some of the basis for industrial investment, especially in energy industries and, I believe, in energy-using industries and energy conservation. On a much wider scale, those changes could have a severe influence on the world banking system. That view is taken by not only the Government but the International Energy Agency, which is an arm of the OECD on which the consuming economies greatly outnumber the producing economies. My view is not one taken by the producing countries, as some hon. Members sought to make out, but is shared by consuming countries, not least in the OECD.

Mr. Skeet: My right hon. Friend said that the intervention would smooth over difficulties whether the price was going down or up. When the price went up, it increased by leaps and bounds. There were pauses and opportunities for his Government to intervene. The Government let the prices go increasingly higher because they knew they could have an interest. The only time there was intervention was when the prices were coming down.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I do not believe that my hon. Friend is wholly correct. This debate has occurred in the context of a decreasing world price, but in the 1978-80 period BNOC price rises lagged behind those of OPEC countries. To some extent, that had a smoothing effect and acted as a restraint on certain proposals, although the price did go to a higher level. I believe that BNOC could not have influenced the eventual level reached. No more, no less—I used that phrase last week—does BNOC seek to influence price during a downward movement of prices. I believe that BNOC can have relatively little influence on the eventual price, but it can smooth the movement from one market to another, and that is why its role is important.

Mr. Rowlands: As he did in his evidence to the Select Committee, the Minister has emphasised that the Government want stability of movement of price. What does the right hon. Gentleman believe is desirable to come from the OPEC talks tomorrow?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The hon. Gentleman would think me naive if I were prepared to speculate on the OPEC talks. I shall correct the hon. Gentleman on one point. He said that I was interested in stability of prices. The Government and BNOC are interested in the stability of prices—in the short term. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford that we do not have an influence on long-term movement of prices. We have an opportunity to assist stability in the short term in a movement from one market to another.

The Government's policy on oil prices has been stated more than once. It is to avoid destabilising moves in the short term. To the limited extent BNOC can influence events, its aim has been to promote stability. BNOC has therefore resisted making precipitate responses to short-term, speculative, spot price movements. I emphasise yet again that BNOC cannot and should not stand in the way of underlying market trends. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) will accept that point. With respect, I do not believe that the Select Committee gave sufficient attention to that aspect.

Mr. Bruce: Given that the right hon. Gentleman says that the policy to intervene aims to provide short-term, but not long-term, influence on the trend, is it likely that the right hon. Gentleman will have to return to the House on other occasions with a request for a similar amount of money? That is the implication in the right hon. Gentleman's speech.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I cannot answer for what may happen in the future, but I remind hon. Members who have raised this point that this possibility was mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he was Secretary of State for Energy. He made those points to the Committee in 1982 when the legislation provided specifically for moneys of this nature. My right hon. Friend admitted that it was conceivable that the corporation could, in some years, incur losses, and that is precisely what has happened. There is nothing unusual or unpredictable in what has happened.

We are not trying to control or interfere with the market in the longer term. We agreed with BNOC that a price cut in July or August could be damaging. It would have been incredible for the Government to sit back and do nothing. After discussing the matter with the oil companies, I asked them to think carefully before pressing BNOC to make any premature price cut. When the companies saw that a precipitate price cut could be avoided, they not only co-operated but contributed towards it. That action was taken sensibly and rationally. I emphasise that this cut was not a novelty. In 1980, we pressed companies to avoid abnormal market transactions that might push prices up. There was, therefore, nothing new in the relationship between the Government and BNOC.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North asked whether the Government rather than BNOC was responsible. While consultations occur between the Government and BNOC, the ultimate decision is taken by BNOC. BNOC has an independent board, and the corporation is responsible for proposing prices for the different grades of oil with which it deals. I hope that the House and the Select Committee will not forget that, in evidence to the Select Committee, BNOC's chairman made it clear that there was no difference in the relationship between the Government and BNOC between the spring of 1983 and the summer of 1984. There was, therefore, no introduction of policy and no change of policy or practice in that period.

Mr. Barron: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I have only a few minutes left, and I want to deal with some of the other points raised in the debate.

The action taken in 1983 and in the summer of 1984 was effective. As soon as it was clear that BNOC would not cut its price in July and August, the price quickly became a spot price and returned to a proper relationship. BNOC cut the price only when the longer-term trend to a lower price started to emerge in October. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford said, neither BNOC nor the Government can be a price leader in such matters. We have to follow the market, but we believe that in the short term we can have some influence.

My hon. Friends the Members for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) and for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Malone) referred to the £45 million cost. In my evidence last week to the Select Committee, I made it clear how that amount was calculated. It is worth remembering, as my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter said, and I fill in the point, that for every pound lost by BNOC over three quarters has been recouped directly by the Inland Revenue through incrased petroleum revenue tax and corporation tax paid by BNOC's suppliers. The cost to the Exchequer is about one quarter of the total. It is a small sum to pay in relation to the more general benefits and in relation to the higher cost to the economy which would be caused by the short-term destabilisation of prices.

What overshadows events to some extent at the moment, as the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney said, is the OPEC meeting this week. One of the most important things to remind ourselves is that not all oil is suffering from a weak market. The spot price for the world swing crude, the Saudi Arabia mix, is not far from its firm price.

One of the most important problems to which I hope OPEC will address itself this week is that of differentials. Until that is resolved, it is difficult to form a proper view of the way in which prices may move in the future. There are other uncertainties. There are uncertainties about stocks. Current commercial stocks are down to about 71 days' supply. That is below the 1978 level when the Western world was generally ill-prepared to resist the reduction in Iran's oil supply.

Although we sometimes make fun of it, there is the weather. The third week of December last year saw one of the strongest firmings of prices. As I said to the Committee last week, decisions should not be taken in advance of knowing the conditions——

Original question deferred, pursuant to Paragraph (2)(c) of Standing Order No. 19 (Consideration of Estimates).

Industrial Training

8.52 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Peter Morrison): I beg to move,

That the draft Industrial Training Levy (Construction Board) Order 1984, which was laid before this House on 3rd December, be approved.

The House will recall that at about the same time last year a similar order concerning the construction industry training board was laid before the House. It was debated and approved unanimously by both Houses. The present order similarly requires parliamentary approval in accordance with the Industrial Training Act 1982 because one part of it involves a levy of 2 per cent. on payments made for labour-only subcontracting.

I hope that the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) will agree that it is important to ensure that all except the smallest firms contribute to the costs of training. We must do everything we can to ensure that we are not bedevilled by skill shortages, as we have been in the past. That is why I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that it is essential that the order is approved so that the money will be available for the board for grants and the necessary training within the industry.

The levy is expected to raise a total of about £42·5 million. An occupational levy is proposed on the main part of the construction industry. That is a set amount for each occupation but subject to an overall limit of 1 per cent. of employers' wage bills.

As the hon. Gentleman will appreciate, occupational rates vary according to the type of craftsmen trained. The board believes that that system reflects the extent to which it meets the training needs of various categories of workers. Levy rates, therefore, reflect the specific training costs and needs of each occupation in the industry. I am pleased to say that the occupational rates remain largely unchanged from last year.

It may be appropriate if I were to say a word or two about the board. As hon. Members will be aware, the board was retained following the general review of training arrangements for which I, as the Under-Secretary of State at the Department of Employment, had responsibility in 1981. It was retained because it enjoyed widespread support from industry and employer organisations. I have worked closely with the board since then, and I believe that its performance has justified this support. The chairman of the board, Mr. Leslie Kemp, his staff and all his board members, employers, trade union representatives and educationists have done sterling work. I should like to pay tribute to them for what they have done in making the youth training scheme in their industry such a success. I have today laid before the House the board's annual report for 1983-84.

As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, the Federation of Master Builders was represented on the board in June last year for the first time. I welcome that representation. I am sure that it has an important role to play on the board. It is a sensible move because I have talked to its representatives, at length, about training within the industry.

There has always been a consensus in the industry on the board's training proposals. That was demonstrated clearly last year. This order follows proposals adopted without opposition by the board, which were approved by the Manpower Services Commission, which decided that they are necessary to ensure proper training in the industry.

However, from letters that I have received from many hon. Members, it is clear that there is still some anxiety about the proposals. The Federation of Master Builders wants to change to a payroll system of levy. Other employer organisations would reject that and say that it was tried in the 1960s and did not prove to be the best way to do things. They maintained that it proved inequitable.

All other employer representatives on the board support the proposal. I have received many letters supporting the proposals from organisations such as the Building Employers Confederation, the Federation of Civil Engineering Contractors, the Construction Plant Hire Association, the Electrical Contractors Association and the Heating and Ventilating Contractors Association.

As I said, there have been many representations from both sides of the industry. What I have said consistently to the board and to the interested parties is that it would be much better for the future if such matters were settled within the board and not by the Government. I hope that the interested parties will be able to sit around a table to discuss the best way ahead for the years to come, because they know their industry better than I do or, dare I venture to say it, anyone of us in the House.

I hope that as in the past, the board will be able to reach an agreement that will be in the interests of training for the construction industry. I know what an important role that industry has to play in the nation's economy.

I hope that hon. Members will agree that the order is necessary to bring in revenue vital for the board to meet the industry's training needs. I trust that the order will enable the board to play a significant role in the Government's training plans, especially the youth training scheme and the other objectives of the Government's new training initiative. I commend the order to the House.

8.58 pm

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): The construction industry training board levy order has almost become part of our Christmas season. Immediately before the House rises for the Christmas Recess one of its last tasks is to approve the proposals of the industry's training board, which have already had the seal of approval of the Manpower Services Commission. The one difference this year is that tonight we are debating the order at a more reasonable hour because of a happy chance of circumstances—normally we debate it after midnight.

The Labour party does not oppose this or similar orders because, unlike the Tory Government, we are strongly in favour of industrial training boards, and still bitterly regret the narrow dogmatism that brought about the abolition of many training boards about three years ago. The Minister will recall that because he was in charge of the legislation.

I wish to renew the commitment of the Labour party to the principle of re-establishing industrial training boards for most sections of British industry when we are returned to power. The Labour party believes in the massive expansion of training and educational opportunities for young people, unlike the present miserable Administration, who think only of harrying our young people into compulsory youth schemes, no matter how dead-end, unskilled or repetitious and boring they may be.

The imaginative training schemes prepared and implemented by the CITB are the sort of schemes that we wish to establish for all our young workers. We wish to provide schemes that give them a solid start in learning about their industry, a first year of good, off-the-job training and a further two or three years of training at work in their chosen skills. I join the Minister in paying tribute to Sir Leslie Kemp, his board and all who work hard in the CITB to make a success of training in industry.

Normally the order comes to Parliament from the board without controversy. It has usually been thrashed out in the industry through joint talks between employer and employer, trade union and trade union, and employers and trade unions. That is absolutely right. Most agreements in industry should be reached after full discussions between employers and free trade unions with the minimum of interference by central Government. That is what good industrial relations are about. It is time that the Government realised that and shaped the whole of their industrial relations policy accordingly.

However, it cannot be said that this order has come to us free of controversy. A major section of the industry, the Federation of Master Builders, has spent a great deal of time and money seeking to change the entire basis of the method of collecting the levy payments. It is important to note that the FMB, which, generally speaking, represents smaller builders, is not challenging the levy itself, but merely the levy's basis.

It is also important to note that if the case of the FMB was accepted and the levy was switched from a per capita basis, as it is at present, to a payroll levy, as the FMB proposes, it would represent financial savings for the majority of members of the FMB. It would also mean an additional financial cost to the majority of large firms which make up the Building Employers Confederation.

The Labour party is not taking sides at this stage because we feel that the matter should be sorted out, if possible, by those who work in the industry. Yesterday I was given information that the CITB had established a working party, one of the purposes of which is to examine the method of obtaining the levy. Another purpose is to examine the feasibility of construction industry apprentices being indentured to the CITB, rather than to individual employers. I shall return to that later.

I was informed that the chairman of the working party was to be a long-serving CITB member, Mr. Coatsworth, who is an academic, and that the FMB would be free to refer any other matters relating to the board's income and activities to the working party. However, today I heard from another source within the industry that that may not be quite the whole story. It has been suggested to me that some of the board members thought that the working party was to be established for the sole purpose of considering the problem of indenturing apprentices. My source told me that a working party was held a relatively short time ago, which returned with a hybrid proposal combining some elements of a percapita levy and some elements of a payroll levy that went some way to meeting the objections of the Federation of Master Builders and was broadly acceptable to it.

However, it is alleged that that proposition has disappeared. Nothing further has been heard of it, and the fear has been expressed to me that any working party set up now would be used as a delaying mechanism further to circumvent the demands of the master builders. I ask the Minister for a guarantee that the working party will be established quickly and that it will report quickly. Most of the data are readily available. If the working party recommends changes in the levy that are acceptable to the board, I hope that they will be implemented in next year's order. I say that because, on its face—I accept that a detailed investigation may reveal much more than is being said now — there is some validity in the FMB's submission that there is an imbalance in what its members pay in levy and receive in grant and what the large civil engineering contractors pay in levy and receive in grant.

While I am on the subject of small and large firms, will the Minister confirm that when the construction industry training board is reconstituted in 1985 the trade unions will retain parity with the employers on the board, and that the FMB's membership will be increased so that it is more fairly represented?

I shall now deal with another aspect of the board's income and relate it to the training of apprentices. I have been given to understand that, in 1984, the total income of the CITB was about £84 million. Of that, about £45 million was raised by the levy on employers, and no less than £35 million was income from the Manpower Services Commission for youth training schemes run by the CITB. About 18,000 or 19,000 youngsters are part of CITB youth training schemes, thus making it one of the biggest participants in the YTS. Indeed, I am led to believe that the entire first-year trainee intake in the construction industry was Government-funded youth trainees. Will the Minister tell me, if not tonight by writing to me later, how many of those trainees went on to enjoy full apprenticeships in the construction industry? That important information should be available to the board and to the Minister because of the claims made by some Ministers about the number of YTS trainees who have gone on to full employment.

The majority of CITB youth training schemes are praiseworthy; if all youth training schemes were of such a calibre, we would not have the ridiculous spectacle of Tory Cabinet Minister seriously suggesting that young adults should be deprived of their pitiful £17·30 supplementary benefit if they refuse, for example, to pack supermarket shelves for £25 for a 40-hour week. The Government should provide the choice and opportunity of training, not the Hobson's choice of youth coercion or empty pockets.

Another serious point is that some people in the construction industry have raised the question of the industry's apprentices being employed by the CITB instead of by the individual employers. In a television interview yesterday, the Prime Minister said that she was in favour of a two-year training scheme for all those aged between 16 and 18. The introduction of such a scheme, funded by the MSC, would go a long way to bringing about the highly desirable policy of all apprentices being indentured to the industry's training board. That would end the appalling and frequent spectacle of young apprentices being thrown onto the dole halfway through their apprenticeships when their employers go into liquidation — a not uncommon happening in the construction industry. I assure the Minister and the House that if the Prime Minister institutes a comprehensive and well-financed two-year training scheme she will have my and my party's fullest support.

The background to the debate on this order is the announcements today from the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Secretary of State for Wales of the substantial cut in capital expenditure by local authorities which, whatever else they do, amount to another massive setback for the construction industry, which is already laid bare by the successive blows that it has received from the Government. I did not hear the Secretary of State for the Environment deny that his announcement would mean redundancy for some 100,000 workers in the construction and related industries.

The question, "Training for what?" is entirely relevant in this industry today, and it is undeniable that a substantial amount of local authority expenditure finds its way straight into the private building sector. Because of these announcements, there will be a further crop of closures and bankruptcies of building companies that will not be able to pay the levy to the board, which will further reduce the board's income. The construction industry training board faces a difficult, if not bleak future. It needs all the goodwill in the world, and it has the goodwill and best wishes of the Labour party in its work. That is why we shall not be opposing the order.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): I welcome the opportunity to speak in this short debate. I make no secret of the fact that I have received the strongest representations from firms and individuals in my constituency on one aspect. What I shall now say reflects the approaches which I have received from these interested parties, but nevertheless they are views that I accept and endorse personally, without qualification.

My first point is one of regret. I regret that debate and contention have entered into the construction industry levy board's affairs. In this respect, I welcome the comments made by my hon. Friend the Minister a few minutes ago. As I understand it, the proposals now before us were agreed to at a training board meeting in April. I further understand that in course of time the Manpower Services Commission approved the proposals, which were duly recommended to the Secretary of State. I am told that no objections were made by the Federation of Master Builders until a few weeks ago. This "holding of fire" is hard to understand, let alone applaud.

Representatives of the building industry in my constituency, not least two respected local firms, H. N. Edwards and Maurice Smith, have told me that other organisations represented on the levy board have publicly urged the Federation of Master Builders to try to resolve this dispute by means of discussion within the industry. It is sad and unfortunate that the federation has declined this invitation.

My second point is that the case being made by the FMB—I do not derive any satisfaction or pleasure from entering into dispute with the federation — contains weaknesses and flaws, as I understand the case which has been put to me. As we know, the federation bases its argument—the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) referred to this—on the belief that the present dual system of levy arrangements — the per capita system and the raising of levies on labour-only payments — is unfair to smaller builders. That view is not generally shared in the ranks of the small builders.

The Federation of Master Builders does not have a monopoly of the interests of the smaller builders. As I understand it, all other employers' organisations represented on the levy board support the per capita system. Furthermore, the Building Employers Confederation, among others, has convincingly pointed out the fallacies in the Federation of Masters Builders' argument that small builders are being penalised by the present system. It should be remembered that companies on the training board register whose annual payroll is less than £15,000 a year are specifically exempted from paying all the levy. The significance of this increases when we bear in mind the fact that the smaller companies receive over £3 million a year from the board in training grants.

Much the same applies to companies with an annual payroll of between £15,000 and £30,000 a year. About £1,500,000 is raised in levy from such firms. That is a considerable amount, but all but 5 per cent. is returned in grants. Surely that creates no burden. Indeed, on 27 October, a written answer revealed that about 83 per cent. of the levy is handed back to companies of all sizes in training grants.

If we bear those facts in mind, and not least the fact that the majority of small firms are not members of the Federation of Master Builders, the federation case begins to look flimsy. The Building Employers Confederation believes that many small firms would actually pay a higher levy if the percentage-of-payroll system were introduced. If that is so, the federation argument is self-defeating.

The employers confederation claims that the federation has overlooked the fact that substantial amounts of training board levy come from self-employed operatives. About two thirds of the total levy from the building sector is being raised this way this year. The counter-charge against the Federation of Master Builders is simply that it has got it wrong. The present system does not penalise or victimise the smaller builder.

The levy order should be made without delay. I accept some of the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans). It is hard to over-estimate the importance of the construction industry to our economy. Likewise, it is hard to overstate the importance of the training board's work. I think that I have a sympathy for training boards with which the hon. Member would approve.

The training board is, among other things, the largest single managing agent of the youth training scheme. If the levy order were not made, or if it were even delayed, confidence in the training board would be affected profoundly. Firms have already undertaken training in the expectation of receiving training board grants. Their financial difficulties would be acute.

A delay in making the levy order might compel the training board to draw on its reserves. That could have disastrous repercussions. It could damage the board's successful YTS programme. If the board were compelled to draw on its resources, it would encounter severe problems in continuing to run its four training centres which are attended by 20,000 trainees a year.

For those reasons, set out briefly, I believe that the order should be approved.

9.18 pm

Mr. Bernard Conlan (Gateshead, East): The comments by the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) are astonishing in some respects. He explained that his interest was aroused by representations from constituents who were members of the Federation of Master Builders.

Mr. Hunter: I did not say that. The people to whom I referred were not members of the Federation of Master Builders. I am sorry if I gave that impression.

Mr. Conlan: I apologise. However, the hon. Gentleman denounced the proposals by the Federation of Master Builders.

I take part in the debate simply because of representations made to me by members of that federation. I was impressed by their case. The hon. Member for Basingstoke said that their case had been put only in the last few weeks. That is not so because they have made that case for many years.

The Minister conceded that the federation, in spite of representing 20,000 small and medium-sized firms in the building industry, had no representation on the board. It was only because of the generosity, understanding and sympathy of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Minister of State—I pay tribute to the part that the hon. Gentleman played as well—and the feeling of a need to give representation to the federation that it was given, belatedly, one seat on the industrial training board. That one seat was balanced by one additional seat for the trade unions.

The case for the payroll levy has been advanced by the federation over a long period. I pay tribute to the work that the board undertakes. It is doing an extremely fine job of work in providing training in a difficult and complex industry and I pay tribute to both sides of it, but that does not mean that we must accept everything that it does. If some of my remarks appear to be critical, that is not because I condemn the general view that the training boards for the construction industry and many others are indispensable. I make these remarks because I think that changes are required urgently.

It is admitted readily that there are fundamental differences of opinion within the industry on the method of raising the levy. The federation goes for a straight payroll levy, which would be simple to administer. However, there are others who differ fundamentally with that approach. When the Conservative Government came into office there were 24 training boards and there are now a mere seven. It is astonishing that every other training board, with the exception of the offshore petroleum ITB, raises its levy by the payroll method. The offshore petroleum ITB has an entirely different system which is possibly even simpler. It relies upon contributions that are made by its member firms. Only the construction ITB has a convoluted, difficult to administer and confusing method of raising a levy. Not only that, it is controversial.

It is not only the Federation of Master Builders that is crying out for changes. The Minister said last year that every member of the training board was in support of a per capita levy but he did not go that far this evening. He said that the proposition was approved by the board earlier this year without objection.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I think I said that the order came forward following proposals that were adopted without opposition from the board.

Mr. Conlan: I suppose that we are playing with words. Does "without opposition from the board" mean that members of the board supported the recommendations on a split vote? Did they divide? Were there any dissenting voices within the board when it discussed the matter? That is all I am saying. I am surprised that the Minister can come here tonight and say that there was no opposition from the board. Is that so? The Minister nods, so it must be. I am surprised to learn that.

Mr. Hunter: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should not be surprised if he bears in mind the fact that the Building Employers Confederation has demonstrated that a levy based on the percentage of payroll would mean a greater levy being imposed on smaller companies.

Mr. Conlan: I understand the difficulties. The larger firms object to paying more, but the basis of the argument is that the larger companies, under this arrangement, are not paying enough and the small firms are paying too much and doing most of the training.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Much of the argument is related to the levy. Surely the real thing is the balance between the levy and the grant. It is the difference between the two that is important. When I was responsible in the furniture industry, we made a profit on our levy. Therefore, the argument about the levy in isolation to the grant is a non-argument.

Mr. Conlan: I readily admit that the two are related. I shall come to that point later.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): If my hon. Friend gets the chance.

Mr. Conlan: That is a matter for Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The proposal for a payroll type of levy is not new. It existed in the industry until 1970, and still exists in every other training board. The Manpower Services Commission, in a letter to the industrial training board's planning services committee as recently as 1979—only five years ago—asked that committee how soon it could adopt a percentage-based approach in line with the other industrial training boards. Therefore, even the MSC was concerned about those arrangements and was asking specifically whether the training board could move towards a system based upon a payroll rather than a per capita system.

There must be changes. I think that the Minister will recognise that changes must be made. The Federation of Master Builders has been given assurances—I do not know how strong they were — both formally and informally that it would move gradually towards a different system, which would be simpler, more efficient and more equitable. That is all that the members of the federation are asking for. They are not pleading poverty. They will not go round with a begging bowl. They are saying that they are prepared to play their part, to pay their full costs and to do the training that is required of them. That is a fair and reasonable approach.

I understand why there was a move from the payroll to the per capita sytem in 1970—it was because the big civil engineering contractors that do not employ many skilled craftsmen felt that they were paying too high a proportion of the total cost of the board's operations. Presumably, those arguments still apply today. In the industry, building service firms are required to engage and employ a high proportion of skilled labour to carry out their function. They are different from the civil engineering contractors, who manage largely on labour-type operatives. Clearly there is an imbalance. If that is the case, why cannot a method be devised by the industry training board to segregate those elements with a high preponderance of skilled labour from other elements, which largely exist through the use of labour-type operatives? If that could be done, the anomaly of one section of the industry claiming that it subsidised the work of another would disappear.

I am impressed by the words that frequently appear in the papers I receive from the industry training board. Everyone is seeking a solution to this problem, and there are regular calls for efficiency, simplicity and equity. That is also sought by the Federation of Master Builders, and it is a principle that every hon. Member can endorse.

9.30 pm

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): I begin by making absolutely clear how much I support the general concept of the order. I believe that the 1984 legislation, from which all this flows, was in concept and effect among the most successful legislation enacted during those years.

To an extent I must declare an interest, because at one time I benefited substantially from training through an industrial training board. It was not the board that we are now discussing, but the principle is the same. This was a good idea in 1964, and it is a good idea now. I am delighted that this board is very much alive and well, and so far as I am aware, no hon. Member from any quarter of the House is arguing that it should be abolished.

There is merit in training. I cannot recall any economy on this great planet in which the difficulties with which a government have had to deal have been caused by too many skills and too much training among their work force. Even in the situation we now face, when manifestly one fears there is not enough work to employ the skills available, I would argue vigorously that we should prepare for a recovery. The nation would do itself a service if it concentrated more of its mind and its resources on training and an improvement in general skills. I am a bit of a training fanatic. It is good, and those who encourage it deserve praise.

The hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Mr. Conlan) referred to the argument, of which we are all aware, about whether this should be based on payroll or per capita. As a layman looking in from outside, my conclusion is that there is much to be said for a payroll levy. That is a fair and sensible way of reflecting the size and significance of various companies, not to mention the value they place on the skills they employ. What better sign of a company's value of a skill can there be than what it pays the personnel involved? Having read the arguments, I see strength in the case put forward by the Federation of Master Builders. In principle, therefore, I believe that the arguments it has put forward should be investigated with vigour.

The Federation of Master Builders believes that small firms receive less than their fair share of the repayment and that small firms do more than their fare share of training. The belief is that the smaller firms are making a bigger training contribution than their size warrants but that they are not receiving reasonable recompense for their efforts. My attention has been drawn to a letter dated 6th March 1984 from the head of CITB's planning services. It says:

> "I have looked at the trainee ratios based on levy returns. These would appear to indicate that the smaller firm employs proportionately more trainees than the larger firm".

The letter also states that smaller firms appear to train more than their fair share.

Given the sums of money involved and the number of years that the CITB has been in existence, the inadequacy of the statistics is amazing. The argument revolved around assumptions rather than the statistics which the board could have accumulated over 20 years.

Mr. Conlan: The Minister chided me when I asked a parliamentary question about this problem. He replied that the cost of a reply to the question was £700. So what?

Mr. Penhaligon: I saw that. It might be of interest if all questions asked in this House were costed. There might be times when information is obtained at quite considerable cost—at far greater cost than the value of information obtained. There is observable truth in the argument that smaller firms generally employ people with more skills than do larger firms. I suspect that this is due to the way in which companies plan their work.

There was a time when a working party of the CITB reached a compromise. We are told that that compromise was unanimous. It argued for a mixed per capita and payroll scheme. I have not received a satisfactory answer about what happened to that scheme. The Minister could be very helpful if he could refer specifically to why the compromise agreement of 1972 has never seen the light of day. It has been mentioned twice in the debate and seems to be relevant. It is one of the reasons why some are cynical about yet another inquiry. A unanimous compromise was reached but that compromise has bit the dust.

The Minister will have seen the figures relating to the differences. Small payroll firms—15,000 to 30,000—pay in something like £1·1 million. Under the payroll system that would go down to £0·6 million and under the compromise to £0·73 million. That is nearly £400,000 in terms of the transfer of levy away from smaller companies. That sounds a substantial sum. One would obviously like to hear any counter-argument.

The next band up is the £30,000 to £60,000 a year payroll company. They currently pay £1·8 million. Under the compromise they would pay £1·3 million. Under a payroll system they would pay £1·1 million. One has to get near the top, the £200,000 to £300,000 a year payroll company, before one sees a percentage difference which is less. They now pay £1·6 million. Under the compromise they would pay £1·5 million. Under the payroll system they would pay £1·4 million. One has to get to a turnover of £1 million or more a year in terms of wages, of which there are apparently 750 companies, before there is a significant transfer the other way. They currently contribute £10·9 million. Under the compromise they would pay £12·4 million. Under the payroll system they would pay £13·5 million.

The Federation of Master Builders has at least asked enough questions and made enough points to demand something rather more significant and substantial from the Minister or the training board to explain why the present system is worthy of support.

I am sure that the Minister is aware that from the outside one fears a little bit of conspiracy in the CITB on the employers' side. One suspects that the larger enterprises have a large portion of the say. One fears, or is suspicious, or thinks that it is a remote possibility, that the larger companies may well be in favour of a system which obviously shifts the load down to those who are not strongly represented. I am sure that the Minister has been in politics long enough, as I have, to be familiar with the situation where sections of an industry decide that the fair arrangement is for somebody else to pay. One fears that there is a tendency in that direction.

It would be interesting to hear the Minister explain why the different levies have been selected. I notice that somebody trained in mechanical engineering is paid £85, and in electrical engineering £75 and that a craftsman is paid £71. I must admit that, as a mechanical engineer, I have always thought that they were far better trained and more value than electrical engineers, but I am not sure that an analysis of the training of the two would back that argument. Why is there a £10 difference?

One of my objections to the scheme is that it discourages the sort of flexibility of skills that are demanded in many building sites. Not all that many people, especially in smaller companies, are employed purely for their mechanical or electrical engineering skills, or purely for their craftsman skills. There is at least a flexibility at the edge. As somebody who believes that we should be encouraging a flexibility at the edge, I think that the levy scheme could well encourage a regimenting of people's skills that I would not appreciate. It seems reasonable to ask why there should be a difference and I would appreciate an answer.

The hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) argued the big companies' case. He referred to the answer which said that 83 per cent. was repaid. I am sure he is aware that it is now admitted that that answer is wrong. The figure is nowhere near 83 per cent. If he looks at the chart from which he got the 96 per cent. figure, he will see that that is the only group that got over 83 per cent. Manifestly, the average cannot be 83 per cent. It must be in the order of 73 per cent. The fact that that answer is wrong — I suspect it is the simplest question of all to answer — makes one a shade suspicious of other statistics.

Another point that is often made is that those companies with a payroll of less than £15,000 a year make no contribution. A company with a payroll of less than £15,000, even with wage rates in my part of the world, probably does not employ three people. We are talking about something small. I stand to be corrected but I am told that that sort of company would often offer to subcontract particular skills on a bigger job. The reality of what happens is that the big contractor collects a payroll out of a part of its labour-only expenses. It is passed on by the bigger company. I do not make any complaints about that. It sounds a good way of getting the money. However, it would be unfair to pretend that a two-man building company does not make any contribution when it is having a percentage of its labour-only contract taken out of its labour contract and paid in by the bigger companies. I suspect that at least some of the apparent generosity is not quite so simple, if one pays nothing and gets £3·9 million back.

I am sure that no one will vote against the order. I shall certainly vote for it because I believe in training. Nevertheless, by dint of persistence, the Federation of Master Builders has put up a number of questions which deserve to be answered in far more depth than hitherto. The quality of argument put up by those who defend the present system is simply not adequate backing for a system entering its 14th or 15th year. I therefore welcome the inquiry, but I hope that it will achieve something better than the conclusions reached when these matters were last investigated in any depth.

9.45 pm

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): I had not intended to intervene, but much of the debate, to which I have listened carefully, has concerned finance and very little has concerned training. The two options discussed have been a per capita and a payroll basis. The Government might care to consider whether payment by results would be more in keeping with today's needs.

I speak as a former chairman of the furniture trade industry training board dealing with apprentices in the London area. In my experience the need to pass examinations or to obtain skills was the least important consideration for either employers or trade unions. The most important thing was to ensure that the levy form was filled in and the maximum grant obtained, irrespective of the standard of training achieved by the young person concerned. I suspect that matters are not very different in the construction industry. I doubt whether there is any rule that youngsters entering the industry must go to a training college and achieve a good standard in their examinations before any levy or grant is paid.

All too often, we look at training from entirely the wrong angle. We should be considering whether we are training enough people properly in the skills required for the future. In this context, I commend the attitude of the Electrical, Electronic, Plumbing and Telecommunications Union, which has approached this nationally by encouraging a far larger number of young people to come into the industry and to be trained adequately, the criterion being not whether they have lived long enough or whether the levy has been paid or the grant received, but whether the employers and trade unions are satisfied that the young person is competent to go out into the world and say, "I am an electrician."

I was horrified, though, to hear from the Labour Front Bench the suggestion that there might be an apprenticeship to the construction industry training board. That is a horrific prospect. Any employer would immediately wash his hands of his apprentices because it would all be the responsibility of the CITB — elected, appointed, or however it might be constituted at the time.

Mr. Evans: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there are strong arguments within the industry that employers should be indentured to the CITB? Far from employers washing their hands of apprentices, the position would be far better than it is now, when every year thousands of apprentices find themselves on the dole queue because their employers have gone bust and there is no other work for them. That would not happen if they were indentured to the CITB.

Mr. Holt: It would still happen if very large numbers were involved, but it would not improve the training of the youngsters, which is the kernel of my argument. We must not argue about money all the time without looking at the skill side.

Mr. Evans: With the greatest respect, that is exactly what the order is about.

Mr. Holt: I understand what the order is about, but related to the order is the work content that goes with it. If you do not understand that, that is a bad thing for the Labour party.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I have a very good understanding of these matters.

Mr. Holt: I realise that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise profusely to you. I meant that if the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) does not understand that there is a correlation between the content of training and the money involved, that is hard luck for the Labour party—although we know that the party is in its death throes in any case.

I had not intended to make a political speech. I am concerned about young people. I am interested in their training. That is why I attended the debate. It is a pity that there are not more Labour Members here, demonstrating their interest in young people and in training.

Mr. Evans: It is a good job that there are not more Conservative Members present. They might all have made speeches as appalling as yours.

Mr. Holt: Was that another reference to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It was a general reproach, not specifically directed towards the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Holt: I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will accept that we all want the order to be passed. However, the discussion must not be limited to an argument between two sectors of employers in the industry, and the way in which the levy and the grant are carved up. We must think about the young people and the needs of the future, and make an assessment of what is required. If there is to be an annual exercise of filling in forms and seeking to maximise the amount of money that can be received back by way of grant to set against the levy, irrespective of whether the youngsters involved ever do any of the jobs required of them or attain any skills, the country will be in a bad way.

It is time for a thorough investigation, taking in more than the CITB. However, I want to use this debate as a coat-hanger for discussing all elements of training. When I was responsible for signing indentures, together with the responsible trade union official, our only criterion was whether the person involved had lived long enough. The young people did not have to pass any examinations or present any work. I suspect that that is true in the CITB to this day. Before we say that someone is an electrician, a bricklayer, a joiner or a plasterer, we should ensure that indentured apprenticeships are meaningful and that the financing of the apprenticeship is a secondary and not the primary consideration.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) that the debate should be about training and about the quality of training in the construction industry. I also agree with his comments about standards as opposed to time-serving. A greater emphasis on standards is one of the objectives which the Government—and, I believe, the CITB—wish to attain as quickly as possible.

Inevitably, the debate has been about the altercation —if that is the right word—between the two employers' associations in the building industry. In my opening remarks, I was at pains to express my hope that the industry would be able to sort out its own training problems. Like the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) I hope that in the weeks and months ahead the working party to which he referred will sit down and work out the best way in which to proceed. I do not believe that the House is best qualified to find a solution. I believe that it would be much better for the industry to do so itself. In the meantime, I will do what I can to bring the parties together, as I have tried to do during the past three months.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) expressed his regret that there should be a debate between the two employers' associations. Such differences of opinion are an inevitable fact of life. We must look to the future — as does the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Mr. Conlan)—rather than to what may have happened in the past. I hope that the parties concerned will look to the future and try to resolve their differences of opinion.

The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) said that he is glad that the board is alive and well and that he is a training fanatic. Having been responsible for these matters, first as an Under-Secretary of State and now as Minister of State, for nearly four years, I cast myself in the same category. I believe that training is incredibly important. It is an investment which should be hoisted high on the list of priorities. The hon. Gentleman and I are at one on that. He asked about the occupational levy. Different occupations get different levies and the industry, through the boards, decides what the levy should be for each occupation. I hope that he agrees that the best people to make that decision are employers, trade unionists and educationalists rather than he or I, who are not working so closely with the industry.

The hon. Member for St. Helens, North started by being somewhat controversial about the youth training scheme. I suppose that we have grown accustomed to that but his remarks were somewhat misplaced. The scheme costs the taxpayer about £800 million, the trainees believe that the scheme is impressive and constructive and yet the hon. Gentleman said, in the context of the CITB, that it has had an amazing outturn figure. Of the 18,000 or so trainees who were last year under the CITB managing agency, some 90 per cent. who have completed their training have gone on into further skills training. I wonder whether he is able to point to such a good record at any time between 1974 and 1979 when his party was in power.

Mr. Evans: Did the Minister not understand that I was not criticising the youth training scheme as it affects the CITB? I was criticising the many other schemes such as the packing of shelves in supermarkets, which are an abuse of training schemes. I suggested that every scheme should be as good as the CITB one.

Mr. Morrison: That is interesting. The hon. Gentleman would have us not approve the youth training scheme when the managing agency is Sainsburys where, if my memory serves me correctly, there was a 500-place scheme, after which virtually 100 per cent. went into a job. The hon. Gentleman does not like that either. The hon. Gentleman must substantiate what he said. If he does not like such schemes on which the placement rate is so outstandingly good, I must report that that is what the Labour party feels.

I am sure that industry has listened carefully to what the hon. Member for St. Helens, North said about the re-introduction of statutory training boards. I hope that, on consideration, he might think again. Surely he agrees that training is better done if it is done voluntarily, whether in a statutory or a non-statutory system. It is better done because it is done with conviction and commitment. I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman commends the order to the House — it is for the good of training in the construction industry.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Industrial Training Levy (Construction Board) Order 1984, which was laid before this House on 3rd December, be approved.

It being Ten o'clock, MR. SPEAKER proceeded to put forthwith the Questions which he was directed by paragraph (2)(c) of Standing Order No. 19(2)(c) (Consideration of Estimates) to put at that hour.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1984-85

Class IV, Vote 5

Question,

That a supplementary sum not exceeding £45,000,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in the course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1985 for expenditure by the Department of Energy in connection with the energy industries including related research and development, selective assistance to industry, energy conservation, oil storage, and certain other services including grants in aid and an international subscription.

put and agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1984-85

Question,

That a further supplementary sum, not exceeding £2,988,733,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray charges for Defence and Civil Services which will come in the course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1985, as set out in House of Commons Papers No. 7, 29 and 101.

put and agreed to.

ESTIMATES, 1985-86 (Vote on account)

Question,

That a sum, not exceeding £40,938,087,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund, on account, for or towards defraying the charges for Defence and Civil Services for the year ending on 31st March 1986, as set out in the House of Commons Papers Nos. 8, 9 and 28.

put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in upon the foregoing Resolutions by the Chairman of Ways and Means, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Peter Rees, Mr. John Moore, Mr. Barney Hayhoe and Mr. Ian Stewart.

CONSOLIDATED FUND

Mr. John Moore accordingly presented a Bill to apply certain sums out of the Consolidated Fund to the service of the years ending on 31 March 1985 and 1986; And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 41.]

Heavy Lorries

10 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 4088/79, 9292/81 and 9508/84 and the unnumbered Draft Directive submitted by the Department of Transport on 13th December 1984; and notes with satisfaction the position adopted in relation to the Draft Council Directive on the weights, dimensions and certain other technical characteristics of certain road vehicles.

I apologise to the House for the short notice given in arranging this debate. The Scrutiny Committee recommended debates on weights and dimensions in 1979 and 1981 when the first two documents mentioned in the motion were deposited. During the intervening period, the Government have stuck firmly in the negotiations in Brussels to the undertaking on lorry weights given in the House when the regulations were presented just over two years ago by my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell). He stated:

"We do not accept the higher limits proposed by either the European Commission or any other European body. We also reject the higher limits on axle weights, because they would not be acceptable on our roads."—[Official Report, 25 November 1982; Vol. 32, c. 1022.]

The draft directive has been on the agenda of every Council of Ministers meeting since then, but, despite provisional agreements earlier this year on some parts of the directive, it was only last week on 11 December that an agreement was reached on a modified package. The urgent need to settle the matter now arises not because of anything in the weights and dimensions package but because of the linkage between the package and agreements to increase the Community quota for road haulage and to allocate moneys under the infrastructure fund for 1983-84. This goes to support some of our most important road schemes. This money will cease to be available if it is not paid by the end of this year, and hence there is the need for the debate tonight.

We are not seeking to overturn the commitment given in 1982 by my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford. We are not asking the House to agree to increase the maximum lorry weights for any type of lorry. I would not recommend the directive if it contained proposals to allow heavier lorries on our roads. The directive does not do so, because we have successfully obtained a derogation in respect of weights for ourselves and the Irish which is of indefinite duration. Moreover, there is now no prospect of increased maximum weights being imposed on us by majority decision of the Council without approval by Parliament. The directive makes it clear that any future decision on this subject can only be taken by unanimous vote; thus our position in Europe on lorry weights is actually strengthened.

The terms embodied in the draft directive were obtained as a result of hard bargaining in Brussels last week. They represent a deal which I recommend the House should endorse. The position is as follows. The United Kingdom is not yet committed to this directive. Last week, nine member countries indicated that they were ready to accept the directive, together with the derogation to which I have referred. Knowing the great interest that the House has taken in the subject in the past, I said that I would have to submit the terms to Parliament, and our European colleagues accepted this. So the position of this House has been fully preserved.

The directive sets only lower limits on the maximum weights or dimensions that a member state may permit. It does not, therefore, require a member state to reduce any limits to conform to the Community values. The directive applies only to vehicles when used in international traffic; thus member states can continue with their national rules governing the registration and type approval of vehicles. All they are required legally to do is to admit vehicles in international traffic if they conform with the weights and dimensions set out in the annex.

I come now to the weights proposals themselves. First, the detailed weights limits, apart from those on which we have secure derogation—of which more in a moment—either agree entirely with the limits in current United Kingdom regulations or are in fact lower than our own limits. This is an excellent result for us. It means for example that many of the trailer axle weights and spacings with which our operators are accustomed and to which our manufacturers build are to become the common European standard.

There is only one significant change that we will have to make to our regulations before July 1986 when the directive comes into force. This concerns not weight but the maximum length of rigid, non-articulated, motor vehicles, now specified as 12m, compared with 11m in our regulations. In fact, the vast majority of rigid vehicles — generally the lighter two-axle lorries — are built substantially shorter than 11m anyway, so the maximum length limit for this type of vehicle has little effect. It is possible that some specialised vehicles, such as furniture vans, will become up to a metre longer if the industry finds it worthwhile to exploit the opportunity provided by the change in our regulations. The change will bring the length limit on these vans into line with the existing 12m length limit on coaches. Such rigid vehicles will remain much shorter than the heavier articulated vehicles already in use on our roads. There is thus no increase in the maximum size of lorries, and none of the proposals for increased weights, other than those which are the subject of our derogation, would differ from weight maxima currently allowed.

The crucial article for us is article 8. This provides the United Kingdom — Irish derogation. This is the new feature in the directive that did not exist in the Commission's earlier proposals. It results from our insistence over the past two years, following Parliament's decision in favour of a weight limit of 38 tonnes for the United Kingdom that we were bound by our pledges to Parliament. The ninth "Whereas" clause and article 8 set out the terms of the derogation. I can assure the House that these leave the United Kingdom Government and Parliament fully entitled to maintain our current limit for the heaviest lorries, for as long as we see the need to do so.

Our Community partners have now accepted, after a good deal of persuasion, that we indeed have a genuine problem with our older bridges. The fact is that the 40 tonne lorry in its commonest form—the two-axle tractor and three-axle semi-trailer—inevitably has axle weights which are significantly higher than those for which our bridges have been assessed. We cannot permit such lorries to use our roads in their present state. A lengthy programme of work would be needed before we could even consider accepting these heavier axle loads on our roads and bridges.

The first paragraph of article 8 sets out the scope of the derogation. The first subparagraph means that 40 tonne limits for articulated vehicles and road trains and the 24 tonne limit on the most widely spaced tri-axle, do not apply in the United Kingdom and Ireland. The second subparagraph means that we must none the less accept articulated vehicles of 38 tonnes with a tri-axle of up to 22·5 tonnes. Those are in fact our present limits, so this causes no problem for us.

The second paragraph makes it clear that the derogation applies without limitation to "Road Trains", that is, drawbar trailer combinations also. This means that the United Kingdom can maintain its existing limit of 32·5 tonnes on drawbar trailer combinations. Thus we continue to honour the commitment in its entirety.

Maintenance of a lower limit on these large drawbar trailer lorries was a provision upon which Parliament insisted in 1982, and despite the fact that this was the hardest of all for our Community partners to swallow, the Government have insisted, successfully, that it be covered by the derogation.

In terms of bridge loading and road damage there is no sound justification for maintaining a lower limit on road trains than on articulated vehicles—indeed, the reverse. The effect of this provision in practice is to discriminate against foreign operators who make greater use of these vehicles than British hauliers. Maintenance of a lower limit on road trains was nevertheless a provision upon which Parliament insisted in 1982, and therefore the Government have insisted that it be covered by the derogation.

The second paragraph of article 8 requires the Council to lay down a procedure for the periodic review of the derogation. A proposal must be made by the Commission within the next 18 months, and the Council has to make a decision by 28 February 1987,

"According to the provisions of the Treaty."

But the preamble—that is the 9th "Whereas" clause—makes it clear that our Community partners have accepted that the part of the treaty of Rome relevant to this decision is article 75, paragraph 3, which provides for unanimous decision. So the United Kingdom retains complete control over these arrangements. We cannot have higher limits forced upon us by majority decisions. If the Council fails to agree upon the terms of the review procedure by 1987, the derogation remains in force.

Therefore, there is nothing in the directive which is harmful to our interests. It has to be said that the benefits are not dramatic either, but they are worth having. The degree of standardisation helps our exporters, although only a minority of goods vehicles is covered. It is also valuable to agree common standards on certain weights and dimensions, such as the weight upon unpowered axles, the trailer weights and the dimensions of the biggest vehicles, which will discourage any upward drift in national legislation elsewhere in the Community.

Those are limited benefits. The main benefit we seek is to have a common market in road haulage. We believe that it is profoundly unsatisfactory that the largely free market in goods that exists in the EC does not extend to the services sector—especially to transport. It is quite intolerable that, 27 years from the start of the Community and 12 years after our own accession, lorries such as ours, which meet all the national standards of other Community countries, should nevertheless be subject to strict quota restrictions and be unable to make journeys in the EC without a permit. We have not succeeded in getting a firm timetable for the abolition of quotas as yet. But we shall keep trying.

Meanwhile, at last week's Council, we got agreement to more than double the Community lorry quota over a five-year period from 1985 to 1989. That is a major step forward, which will offer considerable opportunities to our road haulage operators. The increase is linked by other EC Governments to our adopting the weights and dimensions directive. It stands ready for adoption tomorrow, but only if the weights and dimensions directive is also ready for adoption then.

There are other worthwhile measures that are also dependent on the directive as part of the same package. The regulation on the 1983-84 Community infrastructure programme includes support for the construction of the M25, the Sidcup bypass, and rail electrification in Essex. It means a total financial net benefit for the United Kingdom of about £1 million. There is also a resolution on road safety which provides for 1986 to be European Road Safety Year, and there is a minor recommendation on co-operation between the Community's railway undertakings. All these measures will go through as a package with weights and dimensions, or not at all.

There is much more to play for in the longer term. The European Council has already agreed, at summit level, that the Common Market in services must become a reality and that road haulage must be liberalised. It will take a great deal of pressure and hard negotiation to secure progress against the instincts of most member states. The United Kingdom economy stands to reap substantial benefits if this is brought about. There will be absolutely no prospect of achieving this aim if we were not to agree to the weights and dimensions directive tonight.

I commend the directive, therefore, to the House as representing a modest but significant success in our negotiations towards a Community transport policy. We remain totally committed to the undertaking given in 1982 that there should be no increase in the maximum weight of heavy lorries until our roads are suitable and Parliament agrees. We are achieving the beginnings of a movement towards liberalisation of road haulage throughout the Community, and those elements of harmonisation which we can agree to will be of value to our exporting manufacturers. I hope that the House will approve the directive.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): It is reprehensible for the Secretary of State to present such a major change to the House so late in the Session and so late at night. My reasons for saying that are simple. There are various ways in which the Government can make changes following European legislation. One way is to consider not the political implications, but technical specifications that can be harmonised, knowing that they will have a knock-on effect on road safety and road haulage measures in Britain. I am extremely unhappy that we are talking tonight about something which the Secretary of State has represented as a modified package, and as something that we must accept or we will not get the linkage which he says exists between the infrastructure fund and the other Community measures. The implication is that if we oppose the measure we shall be holding up the money that the Secretary of State has obtained from the budget for other transport measures.

If that is the case, we should consider carefully what the directive says. We should understand the background to it. In 1971, before Britain joined the Community, the EC sought an agreed lorry dimension scheme. In 1972, the Six agreed on some aspects, such as a 40-tonne limit, but the entry of the three new nations delayed complete agreement. In 1975, the idea re-emerged and proposals were put forward in 1976.

The Secretary of State said that the Government have given undertakings and that no one need worry because the Government will do nothing to damage British interests. That is extremely difficult to believe. The Commission is being taken to the European Court of Justice by those who believe that it is not implementing quickly enough a harmonised transport policy. The case will be heard before long. Therefore, when we talk about Britain having obtained a derogation from some basic aspects of transport policy, we must understand precisely what is meant by a derogation.

In January 1979, the main new proposals appeared for agreed lorry dimensions. The report wanted a 44-tonne limit, but that was cut to 40 tonnes in September 1981. The Government agreed to that, but the House forced them to back down to a limit of 38 tonnes. As I said, one method of moving towards agreement has been to obtain agreement on technical details. That is a useful ploy, because it reduces the number of options on lorry weights so that we impose uniformity in a different way.

On 17 and 18 September 1984, the European Parliament took the Council of Ministers to court because the latter was not implementing the treaty obligations. The Advocate General will give his opinion on 8 or 10 January 1985. That is one reason why the House is being asked to move too quickly.

Britain has some of the smallest lorries in the EC, and until 1982 the weight limit, which was set in 1964, was 32·5 tonnes. The Netherlands had 50-tonne trucks at that time. Britain also had shorter lorries than did most EC countries. Today, only the United Kingdom does not have the 18m long lorry. It is clear that United Kingdom drive axle weights are at the low end of the scale; they are 10·5 tonnes in Britain compared with 13 tonnes in France, Belgium, Germany and Luxembourg. The Commission's proposal is for an 11-tonne axle, and that was the suggestion put forward in 1972 by the Six. Traction ratios are higher by 20 per cent. in the Netherlands and 27·6 per cent. in the United Kingdom, but when there are icy conditions even the 34·2 per cent. of France is not considered adequate by the Commission.

The Government have tried, in a number of ways, to increase lorry sizes. Their White Paper in December 1981 made a lot of claims about protecting the environment but they are unfulfilled. We were told that bypasses and motorways would be the Government's high priority and local authorities' powers to control lorry movements were meant to be a major safeguard. If that is so, I ask the Secretary of State why he has been so exceedingly vocal about the GLC's attempt to impose a lorry ban, a ban that many people in London not only desire but need if they are to be able to lead a civilised life. This Secretary of State has been a party, with his colleagues, to the abolition of many of the local authority aspects of transport, but he is nevertheless demanding a full inquiry into the GLC's proposed lorry ban. If that is not illogical, what is?

Sir John Wells (Maidstone): Is the hon. Lady aware that, if the GLC lorry ban were to be imposed, wholesale markets in London would grind to a halt? Heavy lorries come from the fish ports and the meat and horticultural areas night after night and go directly by main road to the market areas, where virtually nobody lives. No Londoners are disturbed by those markets and the freshness and the cheapness of food in London depends on those lorries. The plan is crazy.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I have the greatest respect for the hon. Gentleman, but he cannot be talking about the same capital city about which I am talking and he is not talking about the reality of the movement of lorries in London.

Sir John Wells: Yes, I am.

Mrs. Dunwoody: My point is vital. The Secretary of State says, on the one hand, that what concerns him is protecting the environment but, on the other as soon as any suggestion is made that a properly elected council should seek to do that, he demands a public inquiry.

This is rather more complicated than simply saying that the EEC understands that we have problems with lorry weights because of our roads. The Secretary of State says that it would not be right to go as far as the Armitage report suggests and that the Government have rejected the 44-tonne maximum, but the regulations will create an environment that will allow that change. The EEC accepts only that where there are bad roads there should be a small increase in pavement thicknesses, and that bypasses and a great deal of money spent on new roads are not required. These are not my views, but those of the EEC.

Therefore, the Government should tell us how they will avoid problems in 1987. We have already gone above the weight at which lorries cause a great deal of damage to our roads, which is 35 tonnes. These proposals will make it hard to avoid increasing the problem.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): I take it that the hon. Lady believes that the axle loading and the weight on pavements and roads are the really important things for the protection of the environment. What does she believe will be the axle loading under these proposals?

Mrs. Dunwoody: If the hon. Gentleman does me the minor courtesy of waiting until I develop my argument, he will find out what concerns me. The Secretary of State seems to find this amusing. Let me spell out to him what the proposals will mean for our people, because he appears to be concerned only with the views of the operators and not with the views of those who will have to live with the changes which are brought about, or those who will not find themselves new bypasses or new roads to protect their villages or towns.

The regulations do nothing to deal with overloading. Many drivers coping with container loads have difficulties, not only with weight but with the way in which vehicles are packed. The Council of Ministers does not consider the variety of roads and conditions here. Accidents happen, not only because of the speed of vehicles, but because they are badly loaded. The slow roll, arising from a change in direction, can result in a lorry shedding its load. There is a safety problem in the change.

Momentum can have an effect in a bad road traffic accident. Extra weight has a direct effect. If I remember any science at all, it is that the momentum of a body is affected by the force with which it moves. An increase from 38 tonnes to 40 tonnes will mean that if there is a road traffic crash——

Mr. Ridley: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Dunwoody: I look forward to the Secretary of State's interventions with what I can only call wild delight.

The Government are wrong to claim that extra weight does not affect accidents. Believe me, I know what I am talking about. An increase in weight directly increases momentum. The increase from 38 tonnes to 40 tonnes means that a crash happens with 5 per cent. more force. In the M25 crash last week, nine of the 22 vehicles involved were heavy lorries.

Mr. Ridley: Did not the hon. Lady hear me say that the directive does not involve an increase from 38 tonnes to 40 tonnes? After the directive is adopted there cannot be such an increase against our will. There is no point in arguing about 40-tonne lorries, because they are not dealt with in the directive.

Mrs. Dunwoody: The Secretary of State knows that there will be an increase in length. He knows that we are talking about 18m being the maximum. That is like taking three mini cars piled on top of each other, and sticking them on the back of the biggest lorry in Britain.

Mr. Ridley: We have had 18m lorries in Britain since 1941. No changes are proposed in the maximum length of lorries. Again, the hon. Lady is falsely interpreting the directive.

Mrs. Dunwoody: The Secretary of State insists that no basic changes are to take place, but his argument depends upon the Commission continuing to accept that Britain's roads are so bad that they cannot accommodate increased lorry weights. My point is simple. If we want to harmonise legislation throughout the Community, the easiest way is to introduce technical specifications which will have an effect upon the lorries and the movement of transport. That is what will happen under the directive. We cannot get away from that.

Drivers are worried that road safety has not been sufficiently considered. They are convinced that loading problems will be considerable. They are certain that the basic problem is that the Community intends to push ahead with the harmonisation of road transport. That has been its attitude ever since Britain entered the Community, and everything that it does has that aim in mind.

We are in danger of being told that these are small, technical changes and that we have obtained—the Secretary of State boasted of this—a derogation that is indefinite in length. He did not say that the Commission has managed to write in various limitations, which I believe that it will impose at the end of 18 months. It is talking about a move towards complete harmonisation of road transport. That is not in the interests of our environment or of our road traffic industry. There are many in our towns who will have considerable worries about the proposals before us.

Heavy Lorries

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): I welcome what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said in his opening speech on this contentious issue. Anyone in his right mind and with an appreciation of the industrial and commercial necessity of heavy lorries would not say that they should all be banned. However, there is a great public resentment of heavy lorries, which pass through villages and despoil urban areas. Although heavy lorries are an integral part of our communications and industrial system, they have few friends. In Britain generally, villages are shaken and violated by heavy lorries, which over the years seem to have grown in size if they have not in reality. They have certainly increased in numbers. Pleasant urban areas are disturbed by the continual passage within them of heavy lorries and town centres are jammed almost constantly by them.

Apart from the resultant road damage, we can cope with the overall problem in the longer term—it is one which continues to increase—only by the strict adherence to routes by heavy lorries. These routes should not be confined to motorways or dual carriageways. There must be a proper appreciation of exactly where lorries can go and of loading and unloading times. As the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) said, there is overloading, and it amounts to an abuse which must be checked.

The European Economic Commission, as opposed to the Community, is much less popular than it used to be, and it was never a particularly popular animal. The same applies to the Community. There is too much bureaucratic rule. I do not like the idea of a great deal of harmonisation of roads and transport and lorries and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is taking the right attitude. This Government, and any Government, will rue the day when they accept a course that leads to complete harmonisation with the rest of Europe. If that happens, large areas of Britain will be despoiled.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): I congratulate the Secretary of State on sticking to his guns and returning from Brussels without giving ground on his predecessor's undertaking that the 38-tonne limit will be maintained.

I listened carefully to what the right hon. Gentleman said about the duration of the derogation. Article 8 says that there will be some investigation between now and 30 June 1986 and that a report will be submitted to the Commissioners. Will we be able to hold the line after 28 February 1987, which is when a decision on the report must be made? Having heard today's announcements, we are not likely to spend £100 billion on bridges in the meantime and, therefore, we might be able to get away with it. If, by chance, the Minister of State gets her way and we spend rather more on our roads, it will be rather more difficult to do so.

The Secretary of State has achieved quite a lot under the article. It is worth while that we should be moving towards a further liberalisation of the various controls covering road transport apart from the weight limits. I hope that the Secretary of State will be able to say a little about what we are doing about safety enforcement. It is still a bit of a bad joke in this country. Weighbridge facilities are still inadequate. Not all our major ports have weighbridge facilities, even now, and daily weighing cannot be carried out even where there is a weighbridge because the number of staff is inadequate. I am told that in many cases they are manned only between 9 am and 5.30 pm.

Therefore, there are things that we can do to improve the situation. However, having said that and asked the Secretary of State about safety enforcement, I at least am relieved to know that he has honoured the pledge that his predecessor gave to the House.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I welcome my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's courageous stand on lorry weights. There was hardly any newspaper in Britain, before he went to Europe, that believed that he would argue the case for the lorry weights that he succeeded in achieving. Almost everybody said that he would give in to the 40-tonner, and I believe that the fact that he did not shows not only the Government's views but my right hon. Friend's strength of purpose.

However, I must add that the last line of the Government's package refers to encouragement for lorry routing and action areas. When the M25 is complete, there will be the facility for a wide change of policy within the context of the City of London and the Greater London area. The Greater London council has proposed a lorry ban, and it would be unwise for my right hon. Friend to ignore its popularity in some of the areas that have been particularly plagued by heavy lorries over the past few years. When the M25 is complete, many lorries will be able to avoid the centre of London—I mean not just lorries of around 38 tonnes, but much lighter lorries than that. I agree that the axle weight of 7·6 tonnes per axle that my right hon. Friend succeeded in achieving as opposed to the old 8·125 tonnes per axle is an advantage, but I also agree with the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) about momentum. In a domestic area with side roads, heavily built up, with slow traffic, small domestic cars, people crossing zebra crossings and with right angles such as are found on the south circular, the momentum of lorries gives rise to fears among the local inhabitants. When the M25 is complete, there should be a proper series of lorry zones dictated throughout the whole of the Greater London area to encourage lorries to go round rather than through London.

With regard to competing with our European neighbours, heavier lorries will bring more freedom of trade in the national context, but there must be the infrastructure to carry those lorries and encourage the trade that many of my right hon. and hon. Friends would like to see. The purpose of my speech is simply this. Many roads upon which our lorries now travel are totally inadequate for the purpose. It is because of political cowardice and incompetence in the past that we do not have the infrastructure that we need to carry the lorries that will help us to compete with our European neighbours. Lorry zones, lorry routes and lorry bans are the product of the fact that we do not have the lorry system that many of our neighbours have developed over the years.

We have heavy loads, heavy lorries and dense traffic. I encourage my right hon. Friend to make a statement in which the Government's intention to take lorries outside London once the M25 is complete is given clearly and unequivocally to the constituents whom I represent. To make too wide the hours that are dictated by the GLC lorry ban and too rapid their introduction can bring only a failure of the GLC lorry ban. As I have said before, I believe the GLC lorry ban to be politically sensitive but popular. However, its introduction has been brought about more by politics than by the needs of my constituents. Further, the hours during which the ban operates are so wide as to cause deliberate friction with central Government.

There is no doubt that a lorry ban of sorts would be popular, but the hours of midnight to 6 am would be more sensible. My right hon. Friend should consider a restriction on lorries, not just within the 65 per cent. of historic towns but within historic London, which at present is subject to blight. Many London bridges should also be free of heavy lorries. I suggest that on Kew bridge alone, a lorry limit of 16, 14 or 12 tonnes is an acceptable maximum in such a conservation area.

My right hon. Friend should give close attention to a lorry ban. A public inquiry may be needed, and I believe that it would show that many of the routes traditionally used by heavy lorries in London are totally inappropriate. Lorry disgorging points should be built on the M25 to allow smaller lorries into our metropolis, although heavier lorries should be banned.

My constituents do not care a jot that heavy lorries are safer. These vehicles are totally inappropriate for domestic side roads. While I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the limit he has managed to achieve from Europe, I ask him to go even further.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Even as a London Member, I shall not follow the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) in his support for the GLC, welcome though that might be.

This matter has been before the House for some time. The Select Committee on European legislation saw the first proposals in the 1978-79 Session, and the explanatory memorandum it then considered was signed by one William Rodgers. There have been a number of Secretaries of State for Transport since then, and these proposals have evolved, not least because of some of the efforts of the House of Commons.

I understand that the negotiations on the whole package were completed as recently as 12 December. The document which emerged from that meeting is the one to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, although there was some debate between him and my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) about its exact merit.

We are grateful for the efforts of the Secretary of State and his Department in getting this document to the House, but it is a pity that there is no explanatory memorandum. I should have thought that from 12 December until now —it could even have been drafted on the aeroplane—it would have been possible to produce an explanatory memorandum. It may be that the document was not in its final form, and perhaps I am doing the Secretary of State an injustice. My point is that the timescale for the House to debate this final package has been pretty tight. I do not necessarily blame the right hon. Gentleman, as that may be the nature of Community legislative machinery. If so, we should mark and note it. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will refer to the explanatory memorandum when he replies as that may cast light on the disagreement between himself and my hon. Friend.

The Government may have been somewhat coy in their signposting of this debate. Last Thursday, the Leader of the House said:

"Tuesday . . . Debate on European Community documents on transport measures. The relevant numbers will appear in the Official Report."

The draft regulations have been before us for some time. In italics at the bottom of the column—but only seen on Friday by Members of Parliament, let alone by anybody else—we read:

"(d) Unnumbered draft directive submitted by Department of Transport on 13 December 1984". — [Official Report, 13 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 1207.]

It is to that proposal that I now turn.

The Minister and my hon. Friend have argued about the worth of this derogation. I shall therefore read paragraph 9 into the record:

"Whereas the state of certain portions of the road network in Ireland and in the United Kingdom does not make it possible at the present stage to apply all the provisions of this directive; whereas the application of some of these provisions in those member states should therefore be temporarily deferred under arrangements to be set by the Council in a decision to be taken by the end of February 1987 at the latest; whereas it is not possible to fix these arrangements in the present directive; whereas in view of the requirement for substantial improvements to the relevant portions of the road networks which will take a certain number of years to complete, the conditions referred to in Article 75, paragraph 3 are at present fulfilled in those member states and are expected to remain so that when the Council takes its decision; and whereas in consequence this decision will then be adopted by unanimous vote".

I do not intend to embark on any exegesis of that text, but all the qualifications ought to be noted—the reference to "expected to" and to the road network not making it possible at the present stage to apply all the provisions of the directive. The Minister or his successor may be able to provide a watertight defence, but the problem does not relate only to paragraph 9. Linked with the Minister's statement is the statement that the legislative document, which ought to stand on its own merits, is clearly linked to other matters, for example to the electrification of the railways. I do not understand why a legislative instrument should be linked with cash handouts, whatever their merits. What financial inducement or pressure might there be in 1987? It might be linked to putting up £1·4 million to £1·6 million. Package bargaining in the EEC is now fashionable.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): And always has been.

Mr. Spearing: Yes. It has even crept into the document we are discussing. The Greeks want something for Mediterranean products and are holding up expansion. When the House is faced with a request for an increase from 38 tonnes to 40 tonnes, it may be wrapped up in a vast financial package and we shall be unable to do very much about it.

I do not wish to be too fanciful. Members of the Conservative party know of the predictions made by certain of my hon. Friends. It is also true to say that some of my speeches have proved to be an underestimate rather than an overestimate. Therefore, the argument between my hon. Friend and the Minister is thoroughly justified. History is on the side of my hon. Friend.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): I do not intend to follow Labour Members through the lurid realms of conjecture. I shall just stick to the directive.

As one who has driven a heavy goods vehicle — a 40-ft articulated truck — from London to Doha, and helped pioneer the overseas routes to the middle east, I welcome the measure. I do so for four reasons.

The first aspect that I welcome is the flexibility in hours that the measure provides. That is important and it is about time that it came in. The second aspect — a minor measure — relates to the funds available for infrastructure. Thirdly, I particularly welcome the measure for the deal that has been arrived at on weights. That deal, for which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State fought and which he won, allows for the reduction of axle weights and additionally will continue to keep noise levels of vehicles down. It should reassure both urban and rural dwellers.

Above all, I welcome the measure for the increase in permits. It is ridiculous that British haulage has been put at a severe disadvantage, vis-a-vis French, German or Dutch hauliers, because of the few permits that are issued to British hauliers. I am delighted that permits are to be increased by 30 per cent. in the first year and 15 per cent. thereafter, to an increase over four years of 100 per cent. I should like to see the complete scrapping of the restrictions on permit numbers.

Finally, I urge my right hon. Friend to continue to ensure that companies and lorry drivers who offend, particularly those who persistently offend, against the weight regulations, are given stringent fines. The vehicles and drivers should be arrested until those fines are paid. In order to assist him, I should like to see the more widespread introduction of small portable electronic weighbridges which the police can carry around in trucks to check lorries which they think are overloaded.

This is a modest but excellent measure and I hope that the House adopts it.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): With respect to the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), for whom I have a good deal of affection, I have never heard her, or any other Front Bench spokesman on transport, make a speech that went so wide of the subject matter of the debate. I had a feeling as I was listening to her that she had either picked up a crib that had been prepared for the debate four years ago when we stopped the 40-tonne limit, or that she had an anticipatory brief that had been prepared for the debate that may take place 18 months from now. Whatever the provenance of her brief, it was not related to the derogations that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has brought back from Brussels.

My right hon. Friend has done rather well. I did not expect that he would succeed in persuading the Community partners that there should be an indefinite ceiling on weights, an indefinite limit to lengths, that he would also, while achieving those two surprising results, bring back a little extra in quotas, and permits, and that he would get a little bit on the side for the M25, and a little bit more for the electrification of the railways in Essex. Taking the package as a whole, the House should congratulate my right hon. Friend, and not, with respect to the hon. Lady, try to fabricate some sort of attack out of thin air.

I want to make three quick points. The first is that occasionally somebody in the House should say a good word for the heavy lorry. I have a rural constituency. I am just as much concerned about the impact of heavy lorries on villages and towns as anybody else. But it is a beast of burden. It is not the lorry that is the problem, but the fact that it gets mixed up with people, because we have not as yet been able to build enough bypasses and new motorways and we have not succeeded in making lorries sufficiently clean, safe and quiet in their operation.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will find some opportunity to tell the House—not in any detail—of the progress that is being made on the quiet heavy lorry, on the new safety arrangements, particularly against jack-knifing in the case of articulated vehicles, and also the progress that is now capable of being made in providing for more efficient and smaller weighing apparatus. Perhaps we could hear more about the technical progress being made in improving the lorries themselves.

Secondly, my right hon. Friend spoke of the additional permits that he had wrung out of our European partners, but is he confident that the French Government, in particular, will honour them? Sometimes permits are available in theory on a Community-wide basis but in practice are not forthcoming from France.

Thirdly, and more generally, I believe that no Community country has more to gain than we have from a common market in services. If we can move fairly swiftly towards a common market in transport, we shall gain almost five times the potential market on the continent that any European country will gain here. That is the relative size of the market available, so it must be right for us to venture down that road.

Personally, I feel almost a sense of shame that British Transport Ministers constantly have to go to Brussels, as I did a long time ago, to make these appeals because we have a road and bridge system that is not up to the traffic that we seek to place on it. In the long run, the answer is not to stay away from the Common Market in transport or to object to harmonisation of lengths, widths and axle weights but to improve our infrastructure so that we can enjoy the benefits of a true common market in heavy vehicles.

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): The speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) contained exactly the same contradiction as that of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. At the end of his speech my hon. Friend proclaimed his belief in a true free common market in services and transport, and I agree with that. Earlier in his speech, however, he sought to defend a differential between the United Kingdom and the Community in terms of lorry weights. One cannot have both.

The overwhelming argument for free movement of lorries and a true common market in services emphasises the fact that the derogation secured by my right hon. Friend is temporary in nature and, when it comes to the crunch, will not protect us aginst 40-tonne lorries. That fundamental contradiction in the case put by my right hon.

[Mr. Roger Moate]

Friend the Secretary of State is the reason why the House should view with great suspicion and indeed reject the proposition before us today.

Only two years ago, after immense debate, the House concluded in favour of a 38-tonne limit—not a two-year stay of execution. I appreciate that it is a matter of conjecture, but I believe that there is a danger that we are now being asked in effect to agree to a stay of execution for two years. We did not vote for such a derogation two years ago. We voted for a 38-tonne limit. At that time there was no Community agreement on 40-tonne or 44-tonne vehicles. The proposition was that we should fight for a Community compromise in our direction, but that is not what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has now secured.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has conceded the case for a European 40-tonne lorry and secured a two-year derogation for this country. He claims also to have gained the victory of a power of veto after that, but it was always our view that we had such a power on matters of fundamental national importance. We were assured time and again that that was the position, so what extra gain has been achieved?

As the hon. Member for Newham South, (Mr. Spearing), who chairs the Select Committee on European Legislation, pointed out, we should consider the matter in its context. We are told that what the Government have achieved is part of a good package, and that that is why it has taken them so long to bring it before the House. We are told that we should, therefore, accept it. I suspect that in two years we shall be told the same thing.

We are agreeing, together with Eire, to be the odd man out in Europe. That position is not one that can be sustained for any time. My right hon. Friend knows that. I suspect that he does not even want to keep out the 40-tonne lorries. He emphasised that he accepted the fact that there had been a decision by Parliament two years ago. However, the weight of his argument seemed to be in favour of the economic case for the 40-tonne lorry—and, of course, there is an argument for the 40-tonne lorry.

The terms of the derogation are essentially temporary. Effectively, it will last until we have improved our road network. Intellectually and in logic, we are conceding the case. We have secured only a two-year derogation. That is not what we argued for two years ago, and we should not accept it tonight.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) said that it was reprehensible that the arrangement should have been brought before the House in such a hurry. I agree with her. She also argued that the decision would result in further damage to the environment. I agree with her on that, too. I will call the hon. Lady's bluff. If she will vote against the motion, I will join her in the Lobby.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I should be very happy to join the hon. Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) in the Lobby. As always, we may be a distinguished few, but what we lack in numbers we shall make up for in quality.

Mr. Moate: I am delighted that the hon. Lady takes that view. I feel strongly that we are being asked to make an unfair decision, given the time factor that is involved. In the next couple of years the pressures on us from the Road Haulage Association, the Freight Transport Association and many other bodies will increase. The pressure not to exercise the veto will be immense. In two years Parliament will be presented with a package that we are told is too good to refuse.

It was unfair of the Government to present us with this package tonight. I understand that the Select Committee considered the question on 12 December, about a week ago. Presumably—I judge from the documents—the Committee did not know of the deal that my right hon. Friend did in Europe on that day or the day before. Hardly a week later, we are presented with this package, without much background information, an explanatory memorandum or much newspaper coverage. If we assent to the motion, the agreement will come into effect tomorrow.

After only a few days, we are being asked to accept the proposition of a Community regulation for 40-tonne lorries and 11-tonne axle weights, with the simple defence that in a couple of years we will have the right to a veto.

I am not opposed to heavy lorries. I recognise the importance of an efficient transport industry. I believed, however, that we had settled on the weight of 38 tonnes. We have now conceded that before long we will take a further step to 40-tonnes. Before long, there will be a return to the Armitage report and the European proposition of a 44-tonne limit.

There will be inexorable pressures from the lorry lobby and the Department of Transport, and, as sure as we are here tonight, we shall soon have a 40-tonne proposition.

If there is an opportunity to vote tonight, I shall be delighted to vote against the motion. There are not many hon. Members in the Chamber—this is an unlikely night for rebellion—but in a few years I am sure that people will look back to see who was wise enough to vote against what is not the thin end but the thick end of the wedge.

11.4 pm

Mr. Ridley: With the leave of the House. The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) was a little grudging in her understanding of this rather minor package. She was suspicious to a degree about the motives behind what I admit is a rather rushed procedure. In no sense does the matter arise because the European Parliament is taking the Council to the European Court. That has nothing to do with it. So finally it became possible to get this package last week. I hardly think that it will affect anything that the European Court might wish to say. I should like to make it clear that we asked the House to consider the directive tonight because we put a parliamentary reserve on the agreement. The agreement was not altogether expected but we got it and, having held up our colleagues in Europe through the parliamentary reserve, it seemed right that I should ask the House if it was content with the directive. There is, in the language of the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), a package. It is a good package because it includes the increase in quotas, which several of my hon. Friends have recognised as valuable to us and the money for the infrastructure, which is a net gain. It is unusual for us to have that from the Community. As I intend to show, fears about weights and dimensions are quite groundless.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is the Secretary of State prepared to tell us whether, if the European Court ordered that the directive become law because it believed that none of the existing derogations was acceptable under the treaty, Britain would have to comply with that law? Is it not possible that that decision could have been taken on 5 January?

Mr. Ridley: The answer is no. The European Court cannot order the Council of Ministers to do anything.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Ridley: I have answered the hon. Lady's question.

Mrs. Dunwoody: No, the right hon. Gentleman has not. With the greatest respect, does the Secretary of State accept that the European Court has the right, when it believes that the treaty is not being complied with, to make a decision that overrides British law? Will the Secretary of State be honest about it and accept that we might be ordered to comply?

Mr. Ridley: I have said it once and I say again, that the answer is, no. The hon. Lady is in a dull and gloomy mood tonight. I do not know what is eating her. Perhaps I can cheer her up by saying that there was a possibility, before this directive, that the Council of Ministers might have got so fed up with our refusal to move on lorry weights that it could have made a majority decision to impose a 40-tonne limit on Britain. I assure the hon. Lady and my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate), who is also suspicious——

Mr. Moate: Quite rightly.

Mr. Ridley: I do not know what is eating him. We have an extraordinary alliance between my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and the hon. Lady. They are to have a secret rendezvous alone in the No Lobby. There is no need for that. They can go to much more congenial and convenient places than the rather gloomy and dank No Lobby. I do not advise that. I am happy to tell them that the agreement makes it virtually impossible at any stage for the Council to impose a majority decision on us in regard to lorry weights.

I know that the hon. Member for Newham, South and my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham wanted assurances. For two and a bit years, until February 1987, there is no pressure on us. The Commission will review the state of our roads and report by February 1987. It will then be up to the Council to decide whether to set a target date for deciding whether our roads are adequate. We shall have the right, by unanimous decision, to decide to accept it, or not. There is no question of waiting two years and then it will all start. The power of veto will remain with us for all time, if we wish it to do so. The hon. Member for Newham, South asked about the meaning of article 75(3) and the words "expected to". I admit that it is a clumsy procedure, but no other article can be legally applied in the circumstances of this directive. To ensure unanimous voting, article 100 was not appropriate, and we therefore had to use article 75(3). If the hon. Gentleman sees exactly what that article says, he will see that we have obtained exactly what we want—the right to unanimous votes at that time. If the hon. Gentleman had been with me in Brussels, he would have realised how long and hard it was necessary to fight to include that sentence in the directive and he would not now question it.

I shall not discuss the GLC lorry ban, because it has no connection with this directive. I have heard my hon. Friends' comments about that matter.

I should like to consider our progress with civilising the lorry. My hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) asked about bypasses. We have given high priority to opening bypasses, opening 48 in the past five years with more under construction. Extending the motorway network and building bypasses are some of the main objectives for the remainder of this Parliament. By the middle of the 1990s we hope to build more than 140 bypasses. We have encouraged local authorities to build bypasses and to make sensible use of their powers to ban lorries. During the past four years, about 90 local bypasses have been started with financial assistance from the Government. A 1982 survey showed that 2,200 local lorry bans have been introduced in England and Wales. As more towns and villages are bypassed, there will be more scope for those lorry bans.

The hon. Members for Crewe and Nantwich and for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) and my hon. Friends the Members for Warwick and Leamington and for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) asked what the Department is doing about overloading. The number of lorries that were weight checked by the Department's traffic examiners last year was 60 per cent. higher than two years earlier. That is a large increase. It has been made possible by installing 50 dynamic weighbridges, and we plan to install another 30 as soon as we can. That is a massive increase in equipment.

The other day, I visited one of the massive weighbridges and saw the major operation on the M1, taking selected lorries and checking them, not only for weight but defects of all sorts. After talking to many of those lorry drivers, I am certain that they know perfectly well that it is risky to drive overweight vehicles and that they are likely to be caught if they do. I hope that I can assure hon. Members that we are doing a great deal.

My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) asked about the M25. I am certain that, when completed, it will take a great many lorries away from his area and London. We shall certainly do all we can to think of ways of attracting, persuading and encouraging lorry drivers to take to the M25 and leave the other roads. There is great scope for local authorities to introduce local lorry bans. I hope that, when the M25 is completed, every local authority will use that route to find opportunities for more local bans or restrictions to persuade lorries to use the M25.

Lorry bans and how best to get lorries out of places where they should not be is better done locally by the boroughs and district councils. That will be helped when the GLC has been abolished because those powers will then devolve to the boroughs. That is another good reason for abolishing the GLC.

The hon. Member for Newham, South asked why the draft directive was not numbered and why there was no explanatory memorandum. The draft directive is not numbered because it is different to the one that was before us at the beginning of the meeting. I make no apology for changing it drastically. I am sure that the House would sooner have the one that I changed which, by the time it reached here, was still not numbered, rather than the numbered one which was not finally adopted by the Council.

Shortage of time made the explanatory memorandum so late that it would have been of little value to hon. Members. I shall make a note to try to ensure that we have one on future occasions.

Mr. Spearing: I was in no way criticising the lack of a number. If the Secretary of State reads my speech in Hansard, he will find that I went out of my way to thank him and any other authorities for supplying the document at short notice. He will have noticed that the report of the Select Committee is dated 12 September. An explanatory memorandum might have enabled some of the disagreements in the debate to have been ironed out. I believe that an explanatory memorandum could have been laid Friday or yesterday without too much difficulty.

Mr. Ridley: I accept that point. I know that the hon. Gentleman does a good job for the House scrutinising all these documents and we shall try not to transgress in future.

I was grateful to my hon. Friends the Members for Bristol, East and for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) for what they said. I have dealt with some of the points that they made. I do not expect that my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds will press me to answer his question as to whether France will comply with the lorry quota weights. We shall try to make it do so. He was wise to point to the advantages of a common market in transport, if only because we joined a common market which we thought would be a common market in services as well as goods. It is in our national interest that we should have access to trade in Europe as it has access to our markets with its goods. We shall continue to press for that.

For the benefit of my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham, I say that I do not accept that we cannot have a liberalised system of road haulage in Europe without complete harmonisation first. We have a completely liberal quota-free arrangement between the United Kingdom, Ireland and the Benelux countries with no permits for the circulation of lorries, without having harmonised anything. That works well. It is to our mutual advantage.

I have never accepted that it is necessary to have full harmonisation to have a liberal system of road haulage in Europe. I believe that this agreement, modest though it is, has taken us some way towards a more liberal system in Europe without us having to concede on the harmonisation aspects one iota, which is something that I know that the House would not like. That is why our position has been protected.

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 4088/79, 9292/81 and 9508/84 and the unnumbered Draft Directive submitted by the Department of Transport on 13th December 1984; and notes with satisfaction the position adopted in relation to the Draft Council Directive on the weights, dimensions and certain other technical characteristics of certain road vehicles.

PETITION

Human Embryos

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): I beg to ask leave to present a petition from the Leamington life group. It contains 2,000 signatures of residents of Warwick and Leamington district. The petition calls for legislation that will forbid all practices that offend against the dignity and right to life of human embryos produced in vitro, such as buying and selling them, discarding them and using them as sources of tissue for transplant or subjects for research or experiment, unless this is done solely for the benefit of the human beings concerned. The petition has been occasioned by the Government's request for public response to the recommendations of the Warnock committee, whose report was published in July. It has my full support. I shall not weary the House with a full reading of what the petition says, but, like a number of similar petitions presented by hon. Members, it says:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation and ends:

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

County Hospital, Lea Valley

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

11.32 pm

Mrs. Marion Roe (Broxbourne): I am grateful for the opportunity to put the case for a new county hospital in the Lea Valley area of Hertfordshire. I shall preface my argument by saying that in my constituency there are no hospital beds for a population of 86,954 in 1981, projected to rise to about 91,000 in 1991. Health care provision for the area is distorted by this simple fact, and it makes proper care for the region that much more difficult by artificially creating stress on the facilities that provide health care for my constituents.

In October 1961, the Cheshunt urban district council produced a report concluding that hospital facilities for the area were inadequate. Although at the time this was thought to be a low priority, by January 1971, the north-east metropolitan regional hospital board had incorporated a hospital for the Lea Valley in its proposals for the future, but reorganisation never saw this proposal become reality.

The reasons that persuaded Cheshunt council over 20 years ago have become even more compelling now. Changes to the local population, both in terms of vastly increased numbers and of age, place greater pressure on existing facilities, and changes to policy have left east Hertfordshire at a severe disadvantage. At a time when, quite rightly, the Government are pursuing a policy to encourage the maximum health care to be provided at district level, circumstances prevent east Hertfordshire district health authority from being able to achieve that.

Part of the problem is of a purely organisational character. East Hertfordshire area health authority provides acute facilities at Queen Elizabeth II hospital in Welwyn Garden City and Hertford county hospital. The eastern part of the health authority area has no real connection with Welwyn Garden City, whether in terms of education, entertainment, employment, or social services. It relies upon Hertford county hospital as a focus for health provision.

Hertford county hospital opened 150 years ago and with a facade listed as being of architectural or historic interest, is on a small site, which has far-reaching consequences. It means that the hospital cannot provide the full range of services and that it cannot be expanded to do so.

Hertford county hospital has no maternity, children's, geriatric or mental illness beds and no ear, nose and throat or ophthalmology in-patient beds. It cannot become a natural focus for acute services locally. GPs and the public choose to use other hospitals outside the district. As time goes on, the hospital's viability must come into doubt.

The future of Hertford county hospital is central to the provision of health care in the area. The East Herts health authority is firm in its belief that the redevelopment of the hospital would be expensive, restricted and a waste of precious resources.

Although such a development might benefit the residents of Hertford, and to some extent of Ware, it would achieve little for my constituents, who already look elsewhere for provision outside the district.

To allow the county hospital to run down without making provision for a new facility would cause the local population to look to Welwyn Garden, Harlow, Enfield and other hospitals outside the district, which would be forced to develop their services to meet the increased workload. Such a move would undermine the possibility of services being managed and provided on a local basis which was, after all, the purpose of recent changes in the structure of the Health Service.

Statistics underline the problem and the need for action. The district provides acute services for only 45 per cent. of its population. That is an insufficient level around which to locate long-stay and day place provisions for priority services. As a result only two thirds of geriatric patients and one third of psycho-geriatric and mentally ill patients can be treated in the district.

About 25 per cent. of ambulance journeys beginning in the district are to hospitals outside Hertfordshire. That has implications, not only for immediate costs but for the way in which resources are stretched and it limits the capacity of the service.

The treatment of patients outside the district also creates problems for families, GPs and outpatients, who are often faced with long journeys without public transport. Examples of public transport difficulties are numerous. From Hoddesdon it takes 40 minutes to get to Queen Elizabeth II hospital at Welwyn Garden city and there are only four direct buses each day. It takes 26 minutes to get to Hertford with only five buses a day. No direct bus service links Cheshunt to Chase Farm hospital, Enfield. The minimum journey time is 40 minutes. Constituents sometimes spend an hour, or an hour and a half, at a return cost of £2·50.

Public transport is needed most by old people and young mothers—the two groups most likely to need health care facilities. Time and expense cause concern. I do not criticise the quality of health care, but such a situation creates an atmosphere which is the reverse of that which the Government seek to achieve—health care close to local needs.

Other complications arise from the confusion about catchment areas in Hertfordshire. There are defined catchment areas for some services such as mental illness, but they do not exist for other services. Where they do exist, they do not necessarily coincide. I shall give an example. An elderly patient in my constituency would receive hospital treatment in Welwyn Garden city for a geriatric complaint, but in Harlow for a psycho-geriatric complaint. However, if he lived in Cheshunt, which is in the constituency, he would not take either course for he would go to St. Michael's, Enfield, or Highlands, Winchmore hill, respectively. Put next to this, the laws on Sunday trading appear simple. The people of areas served by both the East Hertfordshire district council and the Broxbourne borough council depend quite heavily upon health authorities other than their own.

In Broxbourne, 63 per cent. of the population receive hospital services supplied by the Enfield health authority. In east Hertfordshire, 35 per cent. are served by the West Essex health authority. Any changes in health care policy by these authorities will affect those within the East Hertfordshire district health authority. For example, a move away from in-hospital treatment towards community-based care would have a considerable effect upon the follow-up services which are provided by the immediate district health authority, which in this instance is East Hertfordshire. Such a change in policy would have substantial financial implications for it, yet it has no representation on the neighbouring health authority. That is because the East Hertfordshire district health authority is in the north-west Thames regional health authority whereas Enfield and the West Essex district health authorities are in the north-east Thames regional health authority area.

According to current regional norms, there is a major shortfall of beds in the East Hertfordshire district health authority. The most serious part of this is in the provision for local acute services and psycho-geriatric and geriatric services. This shortfall will become more severe in the next 20 years. In 1981, 12·2 per cent. of the population of Broxbourne borough were over 65 years of age. It is estimated that by the year 2000 this will have risen to 15·6 per cent., while the population as a whole will increase as people leave inner London. It is estimated that it will rise by about 10,000. The future expansion of both Hertford and Harlow and the effects of the new M25 will also have to be taken into account.

The overall picture is clear. Health services in east Hertfordshire, and consequently in the neighbouring health authorities, will be placed under greater strain. If there is a shortfall of hospital services now, there will be an even greater one in the near future. Recent closures have not improved the position.

Over past years, the closure of four hospitals in the area and various reductions in the numbers of beds have been offset only partially by expansion of the Queen Elizabeth II hospital in Welwyn Garden City. The net loss has been slightly fewer than 150 beds, which has put extra strain on facilities such as the Hertfordshire county hospital, which are not sufficiently equipped to cope alone.

Decisions need to be made soon. The north-east Thames regional health authority must make provision for Hertfordshire patients and for the increased pressure that these will cause to resources. Obviously it will have to make decisions on capital developments, which will have implications of a permanent nature and could result in there never being proper local services in east Hertfordshire.

The position is one of considerable concern locally. A week ago I presented to the north-west Thames regional health authority a petition containing nearly 11,000 signatures collected in the borough of Broxbourne calling for a new county hospital. A similar petition organised in Hertford town, containing about 4,000 signatures, has also been presented. Other petitions from the area will be presented shortly. Support for the proposal has been given by many local bodies, including the east Hertfordshire district council, Broxbourne borough council, Hertford town council, Ware town council, East Herts district health authority and the community health council, and various parish councils. Those representing professional groups have also responded favourably. These include the Hoddesdon voluntary services council, which represents voluntary caring organisations in the district, and the Hertfordshire local medical committee, which represents local National Health Service general practitioners. Both organisations have written to me in support of the idea.

For over 20 years this proposal has been under discussion. Locally it is agreed that the best plan for the future is a new county hospital to provide for the people of the Lea Valley. It is, of course, suggested in the north-west Thames regional health authority plan for the acute services. But for so long that is all that it has been—a suggestion. Present arrangements for the Health Service in the area and the funding that derives from them mitigate against local decisions being made locally. As people move from inner London to areas in the home counties such as my constituency, such problems will be magnified especially if there is not a corresponding reallocation of funds.

One careful look at the future funding of Enfield health authority is enough to confirm that that is not happening, for the planning assumptions for Enfield assume a fall in population. That, combined with the need for efficiency savings, points towards a steady fall in revenue allocation for Enfield, and that is bad news for Broxbourne, which looks to Enfield for services and where the population is increasing. The Resource Allocation Working Party formula bias is weighted towards the number of people attending as inpatients in hospitals. The present lack of hospital facilities in east Hertfordshire means that its funding is distorted. Lack of resources prevents local people from having a proper say in local health care.

The case for a new county hospital for the Lea Valley is overwhelming. The current arrangement not only detracts from local health care but serves to act as an inefficient, wasteful use of resources. The National Health Service is there to serve the community, and that means that it must be capable of responding to the community's wishes. Perhaps the best way to express how a new hospital would help is in the words of the east Hertfordshire health authority's draft operational plan for the next three years, which states:

"The problems of the District can be simply stated. The Authority provides in-patient services for only two-thirds of the geriatric population of the district; half of the acute and maternity population of the district; one third of the mentally ill and psychogeriatric patients . . . Many East Hertfordshire patients have to travel unnecessarily long distances for routine treatment, and ambulance costs are inevitably higher. There are particular problems arising from a situation where the Authority has no direct control over services provided from outside the district, for example, the earlier discharge of patients from a hospital in an adjacent district simply places East Herts community nurses under even greater pressure.

A study is being carried out into the need for a new hospital to serve the Hertford/Ware/Broxbourne area. If it is built, the situation on the eastern side of the district will be transformed. Patients living in Hertford and Broxbourne will no longer be the poor relations, having to look everywhere but their own District for treatment.

However, the timing of the new hospital development is of enormous importance. If this district is to take over responsibility for services for the mentally ill and elderly mentally ill in the east sector by the early 1990s, care for increasing numbers of elderly, provide for more of its acute patients as beds in Inner London, West Essex and Enfield reduce, then the phase of the new development must be operational by or before 1990."

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister understands that the lack of local hospital facilities means that my constituency cannot solve its own problems locally. I trust that he will agree that the provision of a new hospital to serve the residents of the Lea Valley is an urgent requirement that should be implemented as part of the north-west Thames regional strategy, which is about to be issued.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I listened with great care to what my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) said about the provision of health services in her area. I was moved not just by her characteristic clarity in putting her case but by the evident demonstration of community concern that she showed, especially through the petition of some 11,000 names in support of the hospital that she and many of her constituents wish to be constructed. The figure of 11,000 is formidable — not quite as formidable as my hon. Friend's majority of 17,000 at the general election over her wretched Liberal-SDP opponent, but none the less a formidable number of signatures — and I am sure that that represents accurately the strength of feeling in Lea Valley about the pressing need, in the view of many people in that part of Hertfordshire, for a district hospital to be constructed.

My hon. Friend raised a number of detailed points about provision for various sorts of patients with various sorts of needs, but she will probably agree that central to them all is the strongly held view—locally at least—that the East Hertfordshire health authority is severely under-provided in terms of health care resources. That was the core of my hon. Friend's argument. The only solution seems to be the provision of a new district general hospital to serve the population. Although such hospitals are desirable, my hon. Friend knows that they do not come cheaply, and £20 million, £30 million or £40 million is the sort of expenditure about which we are talking.

We must first consider the needs of the residents of the area and of potential patients whom it is the purpose of the NHS to serve. Secondly, we must consider the proper planning of health care resources in the north-west Thames region. I take this opportunity of paying tribute to the recently retired chairman of the north-west Thames regional health authority, Dame Betty Patterson, who served for so long and so well, and who laid down the burden at the end of last month. I wish her successor, Mr. Bill Doughty, the very best of fortune in handling a number of problems which will land on his plate in the coming months, one of which will be the item which my hon. Friend has drawn to my attention.

My hon. Friend was right to say that the north-west Thames regional health authority is currently developing its strategic plan for the 10 years ahead. I shall shortly be meeting the chairman of the health authority, and I shall draw to his attention my hon. Friend's views about the pressing need for the hospital to be built. But this will be a co-ordinated blueprint for the co-ordinated development of health care in the region for the next 10 years, taking full account of the resources which are likely to be available.

We will then have a picture of the demand from residents, patients and potential patients, the planning input which the north-west Thames regional health authority must make, and the finance. It is essential that any development in the east Hertfordshire area must be an integral part of the overall plan, because my hon. Friend will know that there will be many competing demands for the limited resources available to the authority.

In the first instance it is for the north-west Thames regional health authority to decide priorities. I do not think that it is possible for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health and myself to take planning decisions about the placing of every hospital in England. That is not within the capabilities of the DHSS, based as it is in London. It is for precisely that reason that the regional health authorities are charged with the planning of provision related to the local environment and local community needs. The regional and district health authorities are best placed to make these important planning decisions. I know that that view is shared by my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security, who characteristically has come into the Chamber to listen to the closing stages of this debate.

We shall be discussing the strategy for the north-west Thames region with the chairman at the regional review early next year. This is part of the improved accountability machinery that we have introduced, and it has proved an effective way of discussing such issues with regional chairmen.

We firmly believe that within the parameters laid down at national and regional level the detailed planning of the Health Service is best done locally. However, I should like to reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne that this is not to say that my right hon. Friends and myself take no interest in such matters. On the contrary, we have taken great pains to increase accountability at all levels in the National Health Service, from the individual unit or hospital right up through district and region to the NHS management board. We welcome the recent appointment of Mr. Victor Paige as the chairman of that board.

This means that plans are best drawn up by those nearest to the planning problems. I am sure that my hon. Friend would not suggest that it would be desirable for Ministers to take decisions in any part of Hertfordshire without taking into account the needs of the local residents and the demands of the local health service. It is that difficult "trick" which the north-west Thames regional health authority under its new chairman, Mr. Doughty, will have to turn in future months and years. If my experience of the last two or three months is anything to go by, Mr. Doughty will soon learn that on every occasion when my hon. Friend meets him she will stress with persistence the need for this hospital to be built in east Hertfordshire. I give that warning to him tonight, for whenever I see my hon. Friend and she stops me I know that it will be, quite rightly, to press upon me the need for this hospital to be built.

The first stage in carrying forward the idea of a hospital in the Lea Valley which my hon. Friend has pressed upon my right hon. and learned Friend and me must therefore be for the district health authority to put forward a detailed proposal to the regional health authority to meet the need which it believes to exist. A great deal of work is taking place in this context, but I hope that my hon. Friend will recognise that the Lea Valley hospital is at this stage a concept rather than a proposal.

Secondly, nobody has yet worked out how much a hospital such as this would cost, were it to be built in that area. There are estimates of how big it should be and how big it would be and how long it would take to build—although my hon. Friend has suggested the 1990s as the lastest possible date by which she would wish this hospital to be constructed—and precisely where it should be sited. I should be asking the north-west Thames regional health authority to earmark an unspecified sum over an unspecified period to build a hospital for which no plans at present exist if I pressed upon Mr. Doughty and his colleagues the need to build a hospital in the way in which my hon. Friend has pressed her case tonight. A great deal more planning needs to be done before any decisions can be taken.

The regional and local health authorities have set up a joint working party to look at the issues and, in liaison with the neighbouring north-east Thames regional health authority, to draw up definite proposals. I expect that we shall receive their report in April 1985. Whatever its recommendations, there will be time for them to be inserted into the regional strategy which is due to be published next summer, which will allow my hon. Friend to continue to make the points as powerfully as she has made them already about the need to build this hospital. But the cost will be substantial.

Because of the likely costs of a project the size of a brand new district general hospital, in due course the proposals would have to be laid before my right hon. and learned Friend and me to consider. This is a careful, painstaking and very important process. I hope that my hon. Friend will appreciate that I could not guarantee tonight sums of money for a Lea Valley hospital, should one be built, until there was a firm indication of cost and of siting and of other proposals which are being made at the same time for other parts of the county by others with an interest. I am seeking not to discourage my hon. Friend from the line that she is pursuing but rather to put before her the stages which have to be passed through before decisions are reached. In all that we shall be helped and guided by what she and other interested parties, such as the Broxbourne district council, have to say. I have seen that council's report and I welcome it.

Ministers in my Department are always pleased to see local authorities taking a keen interest in health matters and joining in debate on local issues. It is essential that health and local authorities work together where and when they can to plan services for the populations that they serve. I am sure that the East Hertfordshire health authority will look carefully at the proposals of the Broxbourne district council and consider them when it draws up its plans.

In conclusion, may I summarise the main points that I have sought to make in what I hope my hon. Friend will not think is a deliberately broad-brush reply to her considerable number of detailed points. I cannot yet give detailed replies to her detailed points because we do not have plans in front of us. There is a concept for a new hospital but there is no plan. The local health authority must first work out a genuine proposal for the regional health authority to consider in the light of its strategy. The proposal will then come before Ministers in my Department. I give an undertaking that I shall meet my hon. Friend, if and when that happens, with any delegation of any size within reason that she chooses to bring to discuss the issues.

I am grateful for the points that my hon. Friend has made. I am glad that she has pressed them on myself and my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health tonight. I ask her to continue to press them on the district and regional health authorities within whose area of responsibility the decision on this hospital lies.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

COCOM

1. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, following the recent review of the operation of COCOM, he is now satisfied that the COCOM rules apply equitably to British firms.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): Yes, Sir.

Mr. Stott: I understand that the recommendations come into force when the right hon. Gentleman signs the documents. He will know that the matter has great ramifications and is causing anxiety to a number of hon. Members. Accordingly, will he have a word with the Leader of the House to try to find time to debate the agreements before the documents are signed?

Mr. Channon: The question of a debate is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, but I have noticed the desire for a debate in a number of quarters of the House. I would certainly have no objection to that. I shall convey the hon. Gentleman's remarks to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Viggers: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the computer software industry has been one of our most conspicuously successful growth industries? Is he aware that leaders of that industry have expressed serious concern that their export potential might be inhibited if the rules that are suspected to have been agreed are implemented? Can my right hon. Friend give the industry any reassurance?

Mr. Channon: I hope that that is not the case. Industry representatives have been consulted at all stages, and representatives of the software industry were offered the same facilities for consultation as other industries. This is a package. In general I believe it to be in the overall British interest, but if hon. Members wish to raise particular points with me I shall be delighted to look at them.

Mr. Ashdown: The right hon. Gentleman will recall that he told me in a recent letter that he was considering mechanisms for restricting or licensing the export of intangible high-technology assets, which is the coy phrase used to describe the information in people's heads. Will he explain how that could be done except by limiting or restricting the freedom of United Kingdom nationals to move abroad?

Mr. Channon: I do not have that point in mind, but if there is an aspect of that issue that I have not answered satisfactorily perhaps the hon. Gentleman will get in touch with me and I will gladly go into it in detail.

British Leyland (Future Models)

2. Mr. Beaumont-Dark asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has had any recent representations from British Leyland about the funding of future car models.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Lamont): BL's 1985 corporate plan, which I have just received, deals with a number of matters, including the company's model strategy and proposals as to the funding of that strategy from non-Government sources.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Will my hon. Friend accept that British Leyland has done very well over the past few years, after a difficult spell in labour relations? Now that British Leyland is well founded, will the majority shareholder — the taxpayers, represented by the Government — assure us that we intend to keep a genuine British manufacturer of cars and that we shall not have merely an assembler of Japanese models? That way lies the strength and future of the British motor industry.

Mr. Lamont: That is certainly the intention of the Government's policy, and that is why we have supported British Leyland. As my hon. Friend knows, in the end it must be up to the management and all who work at British Leyland to continue the great progress and to make themselves into a truly competitive British manufacturer.

Mr. Skinner: Is it not another example of voodoo economics for the Government to give the Nissan car company £200 million of taxpayers' money to set up a factory in the north-east and to try to run down British Leyland at the same time? Nissan will provide possibly 500 jobs at a subsidy of £400,000 for every man and woman employed. If we got that in the mining industry, we would be sailing freely.

Mr. Lamont: I am not sure about voodoo economics, but the hon. Gentleman cannot add up if he thinks that that is the assistance that we have given to Nissan. He has a slightly exaggerated view. The Nissan project will not reach full production until 1991, and by then Austin Rover either will, or will not, be fully competitive.

Mr. Roger King: Does my hon. Friend appreciate that for the company to arrange funding for new model development it is essential to have good strong home and export markets? Does he realise that the problems that the company faces with regard to Spain, in particular, have precluded sales in quantity to that country?

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend will know that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade is today answering a written question detailing the arrangements that will come into force with Spain, and which we hope will lead to an improvement in the situation.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Does my hon. Friend have any plans for further reducing the Government's equity ownership in the British Leyland group?

Mr. Lamont: It has been stated on many occasions that it is the Government's policy to want all the constituent parts of British Leyland to be returned to private ownership.

Grain Exports

3. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department exercises any control over exports of grain which form part of the barter deals.

Mr. Channon: No, Sir.

Mr. Leigh: Is my right hon. Friend aware that in my constituency I have 500 of the most efficient and productive cereal farmers in the world? What——

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Heavily subsidised.

Mr. Leigh: My hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) has an advantage in that he is a farmer representing an urban constituency. What is the point of forcing more and more grain into intervention? Will my right hon. Friend ensure that more export credits and restitutions are granted so that we may export grain to the Third world and even to Soviet Russia?

Mr. Channon: I have a suspicion that most of my hon. Friend's question is for my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to answer. However, my hon. Friend asked about export credits, and on 3 December we announced that two-year cover is available for grain sales to markets for which extended medium-term coverage is available. Thus, I think that I have gone some way towards meeting my hon. Friend's point.

Small Firms

4. Mr. Dicks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what contacts he has with Ministers responsible for small firms' matters in other countries.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. David Trippier): As the Minister with responsibility for small firms I have met several of my opposite numbers in other countries and in October I attended the eleventh international small business congress in Amsterdam, which is attended by Government Ministers and others concerned with small firms from all over the world.

Mr. Dicks: What account do the Government take of other countries' policies when they are considering policies for small business in this country? Will my hon. Friend give an example of a country which has a particularly good approach to the problem?

Mr. Trippier: We can certainly learn from the experience of other countries, although it is often difficult to replicate that experience exactly, because of the different circumstances that may prevail. However, we can still learn a great deal from the United States, particularly with regard to its attitude towards risk taking.

Mr. Grylls: Has my hon. Friend had an opportunity to study loan guarantee schemes for small firms in other countries? If so, does he know of any other country in the free world which effectively charges up to 18 per cent. on the guaranteed part of loans, which is the result of the changes that he has made to the loan guarantee scheme?

Mr. Trippier: I particularly studied the loan guarantee scheme when I visited Amsterdam in October. Our loan guarantee scheme is close to that scheme, and is closer to that scheme than to the equivalent scheme in the United States. I also noticed that the Dutch Government were extremely worried about the losses involved in the Government loan scheme—as the Dutch call it—and were possibly going to intervene with the banks to try to reduce the heavy loss rate.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Does my hon. Friend agree that other countries may have much to learn from us on the subject of policies for small businesses? Does he know that the enterprise allowance scheme is widely welcomed? Is he convinced that there are sufficient funds to meet the demand resulting from that good scheme? Can my hon. Friend give us some figures for the enterprise allowance scheme's success rate in creating jobs?

Mr. Trippier: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments, but I think that he is suffering from the delusion that the Department of Trade and Industry is responsible for the enterprise allowance scheme, when it is not. However, we have an input through the small firms service, for which I am responsible, in monitoring the success of the enterprise allowance scheme. Indeed, that scheme is widely acknowledged to be a success. I understand that at present the enterprise allowance scheme's failure rate is about one in five, compared with a one in three failure rate for small firms generally.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister aware that in the short period that this Question Time has lasted his hon. Friends have asked for support and subsidies for farmers, support for small firms, and support for Japanese car factories? How does that compare with the fact that the Prime Minister and each of the Ministers on the Front Bench is constantly——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about small firms,.

Mr. Trippier: In the area of small firms the hon. Gentleman suffers from the delusion of adequacy. The truth is that his knowledge of that subject is incredibly sparse. Had he listened more carefully to the Back Benchers who asked me questions on the subject, he would have realised that they were not asking for support. The success of small firms does not necessarily depend on the supply of money. Assistance with marketing and financial control is equally important.

Libya

6. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the contribution made by trade with Libya to the United Kingdom's balance of payments during 1983 and in 1984 to date; and if he will list the British companies involved.

Mr. Channon: United Kingdom trade with Libya contributed £50·5 million in 1983 and £54·2 million in January to October 1984 to the United Kingdom's visible balance of payments. My Department does not maintain lists of exporters to any market.

Mr. Barron: Will the Minister accept that it was nothing more than hypocrisy for the Prime Minister to comment as she did on the NUM's trip to Libya earlier this year when those amounts of money are coming into Britain from Libya? Has any of that money been laundered into the Conservative party?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well the difference between trading with a country, which in no way implies an approval of the regime, because we trade with many countries whose behaviour we dislike, and——

Mr. Barron: That is hypocrisy.

Mr. Channon: It is not hypocrisy. If we traded only with countries whose regimes we liked, we would trade with remarkably few. I am astonished that the hon. Gentleman should repudiate the leader of his party, who, referring to the miners' visit to Libya, said that any offer to them would be an insult to everything that the British Labour movement stands for.

Mr. Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the NUM went to a country which does not allow any free trade unions? Can he shed——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about trade, not trade unions.

Mr. Greenway: What trade is likely to have come out of the deal between Mr. Scargill and the Libyan regime?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend has made his point forcefully. None whatever.

Mr. Ryman: Despite the Minister's nonchalant arrogance in purporting to answer questions, is he aware that Her Majesty's Government have broken off diplomatic relations with Libya and that it is therefore disgraceful that, by implication, we should be receiving the Government's approval in continuing trade with Libya? Is he aware, for example, that the National Coal Board is at the moment training Libyan nationals in computer technology, which is easily adaptable for military purposes? Does that not imply a tacit approval of the Libyan regime?

Mr. Channon: The House will be able to judge whether or not I am arrogant. The House can certainly judge that the hon. Gentleman is wrong about that matter. Whether or not we have diplomatic relations with a country, we try not to impede normal exchanges, including normal civil trade, between two countries. That policy was followed by our predecessors just as much as it has been by ourselves.

Mr. Evans: Is the Minister satisfied that leaders of Libyan industry who wish to trade with Britain have adequate access to Britain?

Mr. Channon: I have heard no complaints to the contrary.

European Community (Internal Market)

7. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress towards eliminating all barriers to trade in the internal market of the European Community.

Mr. Channon: The Government have taken a leading role in the Council of Ministers in eliminating barriers to internal trade. Yesterday we made a major step forward on simpler documentation for customs purposes—the so-called single administrative document. Other practical measures already secured include many common industrial standards, better opening hours at custom posts and faster clearance of lorries. We shall continue to press vigorously for progress.

Mr. Favell: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his achievement yesterday. May we have more details about what the agreement achieves? Will he tell us more about the faster clearance of lorries, which is immensely important to the haulage industry?

Mr. Channon: When it comes into force the single document will replace about 70 forms now needed for goods circulating within the Community. It will reduce and standardise the information which traders must provide and, over a period of years, it will provide savings for traders, Governments and all those involved in trade. I think that it is a step forward which the whole Community will welcome.

Mr. McCrindle: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the European Parliament has called for an investigation into the different approaches of customs officers at internal borders? Does he agree that there are differences of approach which we could do well to iron out if trade is to be maximised?

Mr. Channon: There are certainly differences of approach and there are many historical reasons for them. We are making progress in that area with this document and with the measures to facilitate movement at frontiers in general. We shall continue to do so. I shall consider my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Skinner.

Mr. Skinner: Yes, Mr. Speaker, you must provide balance.

Mr. Kirkwood: It is about time that the hon. Gentleman tried doing so.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman is only a whippersnapper.

When the Minister goes to the Common Market to try to dismantle these barriers to trade—[HON. MEMBERS: "We are already in it".] I am talking about the Minister going on a trip on a gravy train. Will he, when he goes have a word with the two clever ex-Commissioners, who, during the last two weeks of their tenure of office, have suddenly become vice-Presidents? They have done that to line their pockets to the tune of a further £2,500 a year in pension payments. It is a scandal——

Mr. Speaker: Order—

Mr. Skinner: —and it is a barrier to trade.

Liverpool

8. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many applications for selective regional aid have been received from firms having business in Liverpool and by firms intending to set up businesses in Liverpool.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Between April 1979 and September 1984 some 300 applications for regional selective assistance were received for projects in the Liverpool travel-to-work area.

Mr. Loyden: Does the Minister agree that there have been a record number of bankruptcies in small businesses? On a number of occasions I have written to the Department asking for assistance to provide jobs in an area of high unemployment. In view of that, does the hon. Gentleman agree that that shows that this is yet another failure in the Government's portfolio of policies? When will he consider the genuine problems of businesses in that area and ensure that the Government assist them, if that is the Government's intention? This is supposed to be the Government of small businesses.

Mr. Lamont: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman listened to my earlier answer when I said that 182 offers have a value of £32 million. That is only selective assistance. On top of that, large amounts of automatic grants and regional development grants have gone to the Liverpool travel-to-work area. Whatever else Liverpool has lacked, it has not lacked money from the Government.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim: Is my hon. Friend aware of the great resentment in areas which do not receive regional assistance but have high unemployment——.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The same rules apply to all hon. Members. The question is about Liverpool.

Mr. Oppenheim: Is my hon. Friend aware that many places such as Liverpool are treated generously compared with other areas of high unemployment, which receive no assistance?

Mr. Lamont: That is no doubt why my hon. Friend supported our decision to cut £300 million from the regional policy budget.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Will not Liverpool be hit, like many other regions, by the cut in regional aid under the new regime that will operate? Will not Liverpool, other parts of the north, Scotland and Wales, have less money going into their economies because of the massive cuts in regional aid on which the Government have embarked?

Mr. Lamont: As the hon. Gentleman knows, Liverpool will continue to receive the highest status. It will qualify in the inner tier for assistance automatically. That assistance will be much better spent because it will be much more closely related to the creation of jobs. If we are to spend money on regional policies, it is sensible to relate it to jobs.

Mr. Ryman: Will not the dilemma of Liverpool under the Government's new plans for regional aid be similar to that in many other parts of the country, especially the north-east of England, where, because of a refusal to honour a previous commitment, companies which made plans long ago for capital expansion involving job creation must now change their plans because the Government have peremptorily introduced a new policy on regional aid, on the completely false criterion of travel-to-work areas?

Mr. Lamont: It is incorrect to say that the Government introduced these changes suddenly. There was a long period of consultation. Furthermore, the changes in the map were accompanied by generous transitional provisions which take account of the hon. Gentleman's point that companies may have been in the middle of formulating investment plans. Those are catered for in the transitional provisions

Mr. John Smith: I assume that the Minister considered the position of Liverpool carefully in anticipation of answering this question. How much less money will be available to Liverpool as a result of the recent changes in regional development policy? What does it cost to create a job in an enterprise zone?

Mr. Lamont: I cannot answer either question.

Mr. John Smith: Why not?

Mr. Lamont: We have not made an estimate of how each area will be affected by the changes in regional policy. Expenditure on regional policy is demand-led and depends on companies putting forward projects, as it always has. It is impossible to make an assessment for each travel-to-work area.

British Industry (Shareholdings)

9. Mr. Christopher Hawkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has plans to seek to promote wider ownership of shares in British industry.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Alex Fletcher): We have just completed the biggest single step so far this century towards wider ownership of shares in British industry. More than 2 million people purchased BT shares, including many first-time investors and 184,000 employees of BT. We shall continue to encourage wider ownership of shares by employees and by individual investors.

Mr. Hawkins: Is my hon. Friend aware of the pleasure that most Conservative Members feel at the success of the British Telecom sale? Is he further aware that we hope that the Government will pursue a policy of extending share ownership to a wider proportion of the British public?

Mr. Fletcher: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's remarks. The Government will take his advice, not least through more privatisation.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Minister agree that, in addition to the generous price at which BT shares were offered to the public, one reason for the great success of the sale was the change in marketing and the determined effort made publicly to sell those shares? When the Government prepare their White Paper on investment protection, will they examine the old legislation and, while ensuring investor protection, try to relax the rules on advertising and on prospectuses to ensure that similar efforts can be made for other share sales?

Mr. Fletcher: As the hon. Gentleman will know, we are planning to replace the existing Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958. That will be the subject of a White Paper to be published early next year. We have learnt two lessons from the British Telecom privatisation: first, that there are many hundreds of thousands of willing investors in Britain; and, secondly, the stockbroking profession has learnt that by advertising its wares on a much bigger scale than usual it can ensure that those who wish to buy shares, including small investors, can do so.

Mr. Hanley: While congratulating my hon. Friend on the success of the British Telecom issue, and on the fact that nearly 2 million people are shareholders for the first time, including more than 180,000 employees of British Telecom, may I ask whether he has considered an education programme for the new shareholders in the light of today's press reports that some understand the nature of a contract on the Stock Exchange? Will my hon. Friend consider running a programme of education about the nature of share ownership in conjunction with the Stock Exchange?

Mr. Fletcher: I am almost tempted, in a lighthearted way, to ask my hon. Friend whether he might not have an interest in such an educational programme. The sale of shares in this way and on such a scale is an educational programme in itself for the whole country, and not least for the Opposition parties.

Mr. Williams: In view of the Minister's pleasure at the sale of BT, will he tell us whether he would be pleased with, and would re-employ, a broker who sold his shares for half price—or would he run to a solicitor to take action for incompetence and negligence?

Mr. Fletcher: With respect to the right hon. Gentleman, he has the wrong end of the stick. It is incorrect to conclude that the whole offer can be made at today's price or at the level of any increase in price since the offer was made. The current price reflects the marginal demand — that is the excess of willing buyers over willing sellers. That has always been the case in an issue such as this.

Small Businesses

10. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to encourage greater use of official and commercially collected data in connection with the provision of statistics on the small business sector; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The findings of the studies that regularly appear in British Business are that there was a net surplus of 112,000 small businesses over the past four years and that these firms create or preserve more jobs than their share of the labour market suggests. We take every opportunity to publicise these facts.

Mr. Ashdown: I asked whether the Minister would consider greater use of the official statistics. Does he not recall that, at the small business conference in Amsterdam in October this year, he rightly said that reliable and accurate data, which he admitted we did not have, on the life and death cycle of small businesses, are to use his own words, the "life blood of governmental policy-making"?

In the light of that brave statement, and of his agreement that the official information is inadequate and should be improved, is not his answer somewhat complacent? When will he match that rhetoric with some action?

Mr. Trippier: The stock of reliable statistics is improving all the time, and I referred to that in my substantive answer to the substantive question. I admit that there is a paucity of available statistics for employment in small firms, although that is getting better. For example, we have established that the figure for self-employment is 2·25 million, which is the highest figure on record. My difficulty, as Minister with responsibility for small firms, is that I have to balance on the one hand the paucity of statistics in that particular sector with the fact that I wish to try to reduce the form-filling burden on small firms, which they regard as a handicap.

Mr. Richard Page: Are the collected statistics used by the small firms service? Is my hon. Friend satisfied with the expertise in the breadth, and particularly the depth, of the service that is offered by the small firms service, particularly through the local enterprise agencies?

Mr. Trippier: I have said on the Floor of the House before that I am extremely proud of the expertise in the small firms service. There has been a rapid growth in the local enterprise agencies. There has to be a close relationship between the small firms service and the local enterprise agencies. I have always believed that the directors of the enterprise agencies should be generalists and that the small firms counsellors should be specialists. I am taking steps to ensure that that happens and is successful.

Power Engineering Industry

12. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what his Department is doing to assist the power engineering industry.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The industry is supported by SFI assistance under the Science and Technology Act and by Industry Act grants. Many overseas projects have also benefited from Government assistance in the form of export credits and aid and trade provision.

Mr. Lloyd: Is the Minister aware that this industry, particularly in my constituency, still continues to shed jobs at a high and regrettable rate? Is he further aware that the industry is suffering because of the collapse of domestic and overseas demand? Will the Government look seriously at their role in ensuring that we have a power engineering industry in the future, which means that we shall have to bring forward, with Government assistance, plans for the refurbishment or rebuilding of power stations in the near future, and not leave it for the next decade?

Mr. Lamont: As the hon. Gentleman knows, questions about domestic power station orders are for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy. As regards support in export markets, we shall continue to support the industry. We have been successful. GEC, a company located in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, between 1 January 1980 and 31 December 1984 won more turbine generator orders than any other company in the world. It is the world leader. However, we recognise that the market position remains uncertain, but the company has had a lot of help, including £100 million from the aid and trade provision since 1980. There has been a lot of Government support, and we shall continue to do all that we can to help.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Is my hon. Friend aware that one of the few remaining effective firms in the gas turbine industry, is situated in my constituency? Is he further aware that the real costs facing such industries in developing new models to enter world markets are high? If there is to be any Government support to the turbine industry, my hon. Friend should look carefully at the support needed to develop new models to beat our overseas competitors.

Mr. Lamont: I note what my hon. Friend says. Since 1980, under the Science and Technology Act, £11 million has gone towards supporting this sort of development. We shall, of course, continue to do what we can to help.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

13. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to be in a position to publish the Silbertson report on the future of the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Channon: The report was published on 13 December.

Mr. Kirkwood: A cursory analysis of the report shows many parts where the conclusions seem to be based on speculative hypotheses rather than on firm evidence, and where the policy recommendations seem to fail to take account of the implications for some of the areas affected by the report's conclusions. Will the Minister assure the House that he will take other counsel as well as consider the recommendations in the Silbertson report before agreeing to phase out the agreement rapidly?

Mr. Channon: Most definitely. Before any decision is taken, I hope to obtain the views of the industry and all the other people who are interested in this topic.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Is my right hon. Friend aware that this is a sunrise and not a sunset industry? Is he further aware that the industry is not afraid of fair free trade, but that many non-tariff barriers are imposed on British textile exports? Until those non-tariff barriers can be eliminated, some type of MFA is required.

Mr. Channon: I note my hon. Friend's views on that topic, and we shall bear them very much in mind.

Mr. Madden: Does the Minister agree that the proposals in the report met with a chorus of criticism from the British textile industry and that his reply during the last Trade and Industry Question Time gave rise to considerable concern? Will give a clear assurance, without equivocation, reservations, winks or nods, that the British Government are totally committed to the renegotiation of the MFA to ensure that there is no unfair import penetration and to protect British textile jobs?

Mr. Channon: I read accounts which were critical of the report and the comments which were favourable. At the moment the Government are merely consulting. Surely we are entitled to consult and consider all the evidence before any decisions are reached.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Is my right hon. Friend not conerned that the report appears to support and enourage the export of British jobs? Should not such a policy be resisted with great vigour?

Mr. Channon: Put like that, my hon. Friend makes a very persuasive argument. I do not necessarily accept his preface, but I must repeat to the House that all views will be gratefully received. We shall consider them carefully. The Government will have to make their position clear to the House when the decisions have been arrived at.

Mr. John Smith: Is the Minister aware that much of the criticism focused on the report has pointed out that its conclusions are flawed because of the doubtful assumptions and methodology adopted by its author? Will that fact be borne in mind? Is the right hon. Gentleman seriously telling the House that the Government have not reached a conclusion about whether they want a new MFA? Is it not high time that the Government committed themselves clearly to another MFA and told the House of that commitment?

Mr. Channon: Of course we shall tell the House. The report was received only six days ago. Surely we are entitled to study the report and the evidence in favour of more liberalisation, and the evidence in favour of less liberalisation. That seems to be perfectly reasonable, and I believe that any sensible Government would wish to study all the evidence before coming to a conclusion.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Does my right hon. Friend accept that, although we appreciate the fact that he must study this newly published report, a word of encouragement to the textile industry, which during the past 20 years has suffered traumatically, would be much appreciated? The industry urgently needs not just one renewal of the MFA, but possibly two.

Mr. Channon: From the exchanges in the House today, I am left in no doubt about the feeling that exists on both sides on this issue. It is something which I and the Government must consider. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. The textile industry has done extremely well and has good prospects for the future.

Child Pushchairs

14. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with safety standards relating to child buggy pushchairs.

Mr. Fletcher: No, I am not. That is why I propose to remake the existing safety regulations on pushchairs. The consultation process is almost complete, and I hope to lay draft new regulations before the House in the spring.

Mr. Chapman: While welcoming my hon. Friend's reply and applauding the initiative that he has taken, may I ask him to confirm that some designs of collapsible child buggies have caused serious accidents and that, by definition, they are pushchairs and therefore come within the 1978 regulations — a fact which apparently some trading standards officers do not appreciate?

Mr. Fletcher: I take my hon. Friend's point. There should be no doubt in trading standards officers' minds that pushchairs are included in the existing regulations, as they will be in the new regulations.

Insurance Market

16. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress he is making together with other European Economic Community Ministers in securing a free market for insurance within the European Economic Community.

Mr. Channon: Finance Ministers discussed the proposed directive on freedom to provide non-life insurance last week. Negotiations are continuing on this directive, and on this and in general we shall continue to press for rapid progress towards a free Community market for insurance.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: When will the EEC give substance to its claim to be a common market? When will the European Court take effective action against those countries which continue to block our insurance industry? The British people are becoming tired of paying an expensive membership fee to a club which continues to block our trade in that way.

Mr. Channon: No one would dispute what my hon. Friend has said. There are four court cases pending. The British Government are intervening in each of them. I am told that the oral hearings in the first two cases have been set down for next March.

Mr. Gould: The Minister has again fobbed us off with a meaningless answer on that point. Our trade with the EEC in manufactures is running at an annual deficit of £9 billion. Is it not time that he insisted that we had proper access for the British insurance industry and other providers of financial services to the Common Market? Has he not allowed the Germans and others who have been obstructive for such a long time to get away with it for far too long?

Mr. Channon: I have given the best and most truthful answer to the House. Whether the hon. Member likes it is neither here nor there. It is all very well for him to say that I must insist on certain things taking place. He knows perfectly well that there is no way of insisting in this case. Nothing will happen until those court cases are settled. He knows that just as well as I do. There is no point in pretending otherwise.

Mr. Budgen: When did the EEC first promise to secure a free market for insurance?

Mr. Channon: I cannot give my hon. Friend a definite answer, but my view is that we are entitled to freedom of insurance under the Treaty of Rome.

Mr. Heffer: Is the Minister aware that it is difficult enough to get money out of insurance companies in this country? It would be a dead loss to try to get money out of insurance companies in the EC countries.

Mr. Channon: My idea is that British companies should have more opportunities abroad, rather than the other way round.

Small Firms (Government Contracts)

17. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what specific steps Her Majesty's Government take to faciltate the access of small firms to Government contracts.

Mr. Trippier: For lower value contracts firms need no longer go through the Department's approval procedures before winning orders. The threshold was initially set at £2,000 two years ago and has since been raised to £10,000. Above that level, non-approved firms can tender for contracts which are not urgent, subject to being approved afterwards if they are successful. Departments have been asked to rotate invitations to tender among firms on their approved lists so that more firms get an opportunity to bid. For firms seeking approval we have standardised the financial and general information that Departments require.

Mr. Hamilton: I am sure that the House will welcome that encouraging news, but what proportion of Government procurement contracts go to small firms? Is my hon. Friend satisfied with that figure?

Mr. Trippier: Records are not kept at the moment of the details of which business goes to small firms, but we have asked the Ministry of Defence to supply information, through a survey that it is currently conducting, as to how much of its procurement business goes to firms employing fewer than 200 people. The findings of that survey will, of course, be of great interest to us.

Mr. Ashdown: Does the Minister accept that such records should be kept for all industries? Does he agree that the size and power of the Government's procurement system makes it the most potent weapon available to the Government for assisting small industries? Surely it is even more powerful than the Government's much-vaunted 103 measures put together. When will he take more strenuous action to use the Government's procurement system to assist small industries more effectively?

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman is being uncharitable to the Government. We have done a great deal in the past five years to improve access for small firms to Government procurement contracts. In my answer to the supplementary question of my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) I referred to another initiative that we have taken. I appreciate that it is important and valuable that we adopt such an approach, and that is why we are doing something about it.

Sir Dudley Smith: Will my hon. Friend ensure—I am sure that he will—that when small firms deservedly win contracts with Government Departments the Departments settle their accounts on time? Is he aware that it is becoming a common complaint that small firms are not having their accounts settled by large firms as quickly as they should be?

Mr. Trippier: My hon. Friend is right. I take every available opportunity to try to get the message across that large firms should pay the bills of small firms on time wherever possible. I accept that there are a number of laggards. If my hon. Friend is aware of any examples of Government Departments not paying the bills of small firms on time, I shall be grateful if he will let me have the evidence, whereupon I shall investigate the matter.

Mr. Williams: If this basic information is not available, what steps is the Minister taking to ensure that it is available in future?

Mr. Trippier: It seems that the right hon. Gentleman did not hear my reply to an earlier supplementary question. I said that we were taking the initiative of asking— [Interruption.] That is a good example. There is much business there that is available for small firms. Having taken the initiative, it will be interesting to compare how much public procurement business goes to small firms in Britain as against that going to similar firms in the United States.

Telecommunications Equipment

18. Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress he is making on removing barriers to trade in telecommunications' equipment between European Economic Community member states.

Mr. Channon: The Government have strongly encouraged the development of a Community telecommunications programme aimed at expanding intra-Community trade. Two important measures recently agreed are the urgent development of harmonised standards for terminal equipment and a recommendation that operators should open up their tendering procedures to suppliers in other member states.

Mr. Coombs: I welcome my right hon. Friend's remarks about terminals, but will he give the House an assurance that the proposals that he has mentioned will be implemented and brought to fruition in 1985? Does he agree that reciprocal trading agreements for other telecommunications equipment such as PABXs, which directly affect firms in my constituency of Swindon, which wish to manufacture and market them, would be of advantage in creating inward investment and, therefore, jobs, and in providing more export opportunities throughout the European Common Market?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend makes a persuasive case in the second part of his question. As for the first part, it is the British Government's hope that that will be done in 1985. That is not entirely within our gift, but I hope very much that that will be done.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Great though the progress may be on our side in liberalising the purchasing arrangements in Government telecommunication contracts, is the Minister aware that in the EEC as a whole there may not be anything like a similar desire and determination to do likewise? Will he note that the French Government have clearly taken no steps to liberalise and open their ordering and tendering system? Will he undertake to the House to obtain matching agreements so that there are clear commitments from our European partners, especially the French?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point about reciprocity. He has said that the British Government's attitude is not always the same as that of other member states. I shall be grateful if he will have a word with those sitting beside him, so that he can understand some of the problems.

Mr. Conway: Where telecommunication developments require certification by the division within my right hon. Friend's Department, especially if they are inventions of small firms in non-assisted areas such as my constituency of Shrewsbury, will my right hon. Friend assure me that the applications will be processed with the greatest possible speed?

Mr. Channon: I had better look carefully at what my hon. Friend has said. I shall consider it and reply to him sympathetically and quickly.

Manufactured Goods

19. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he proposes to take to seek to ensure that in 1985 the United Kingdom exports more manufactured goods than it imports.

Mr. Channon: There is no means, short of direct controls incompatible with our interests as a trading nation, of doing what the hon. Member wants.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister accept that this country's wealth has always depended on the manufacturing industries and that it is essential that we get back into a surplus of trade in those industries as soon as possible? Does he further accept that many Opposition Members and people in the country at large are very concerned at the Government's apparent disregard of the fact that we have been trading in deficit on manufactured goods?

Mr. Channon: What is far more important than a surplus or deficit in any one part of our trading account is whether we are making any progress in trying to increase the productivity of the British manufacturing industry and, indeed, other industries. We are making considerable strides, in that our productivity has been increasing in the past three years at more than twice the rate achieved by either France or Germany. That is a creditable achievement.

Mr. Forth: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Labour party's obsession with mercantalist economics is typical of its attitude to economic policy in general, and that what is required is recognition of the fact that the contribution to be made by the export of services to our economic future is as important, if not more so, that of manufacturing?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend is absolutely right about the voodoo economics practised by Opposition Members, but what we should like to see, of course, is a good performance — [Interruption.] It is the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) today——

Mr. Skinner: And the hon. Gentleman yesterday.

Mr. Channon: What he said yesterday, the hon. Gentleman says today.

It is very important to the British economy that we should try to make all our industry competitive, and we should try to do as well as we can with all sectors of our industry. Both manufacturing and services are important.

Mr. Crowther: Does the Minister accept that the rate of productivity in many British manufacturing industries is now very high and that the real problem about competitiveness is in areas that are within the scope of the Government's own policies; for example, energy prices and the alarmingly imbalanced exchange rates between sterling and European currencies?

Mr. Channon: In fact, at the present rate of sterling in many parts of the world, British goods are more competitive than ever before, rather than less competitive. This is because so many currencies are linked to the dollar. It is perfectly true that other factors affect competitiveness, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be fair enough to recognise the steps that we have taken to try to help businesses, via taxation reforms, the abolition of the national insurance surcharge and the control of public spending—which I emphasise. There are major efforts to help British industry.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, important as our manufacturing base is—as long as it suits its product to what the market actually wants—our service industries in the export market do not have the import element within them that most of our manufacturing industries do, and that makes them even more important in terms of balance of payments to this country?

Mr. Channon: As my hon. Friend says, it is absolutely right that our service industries are providing more substantial amounts for our balance of payments and our export effort. I am sure that that trend will continue over the next few years.

Mr. Gould: Is not the acid test of our international competitiveness how well we actually perform in international markets? Is the Minister completely unaware of the fact that the deficit in our trade and manufactured goods which appeared for the first time last year threatens already this year to more than double? Is that not so alarming a trend as to dent even the Minister's complacency?

Mr. Channon: We have had this discussion before. So far, I have been unable to convince the hon. Gentleman that, although there has been a considerable surplus in the past few years, it is impossible at all stages to have a surplus in oil, manufactured goods and everything else —

Mr. Gould: Rubbish.

Mr. Channon: It is not rubbish. If we did that, we would have to export even more capital. When the hon. Gentleman is not whingeing about one thing, he is whingeing about the other.

Mr. Batiste: Will my hon. Friend confirm that during 1985 the Government will have to make a decision about participation by Britain in the American manned space station programme? Is he aware that that participation is vital to our manufacturing industry over a wide range of high technology products? When will he be in a position to make a statement about participation in that very important programme?

Mr. Channon: I hope that we shall be in a position to make a statement early next year.

Nationalised Industries (Accounting Practices)

20. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the accounting practices within the nationalised industries for which he is responsible.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Yes, I am satisfied with the accounting practices employed by those industries within my Department's responsibility in preparing statutory accounts.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Has the Minister ever intervened to direct British Shipbuilders as to the way in which it prepares its accounts?

Mr. Lamont: I have never issued a directive to British Shipbuilders about the preparation of its accounts, although a couple of years ago we had discussions about the presentation of results as between different divisions.

Mr. Speaker: Question No. 21.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take the point of order at the end of Question Time.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: A number of hon. Members wished to ask supplementary questions on my question No. 20.

Mr. Speaker: Order. A number of hon. Members—well over 40 of them — wish to ask the remaining questions on the Order Paper.

Manufactured Goods

21. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the current balance of trade in manufactured goods.

Mr. Norman Lamont: In the first 10 months of this year there was a deficit of £3·7 billion.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Minister confirm that the Government's trading record is the worst in British trading history and is yet further proof of the abysmal failure of the Government's economic strategy? Is he not ashamed to be a member of such an inefficient, uncompetitive Government? Is it not time that the Department of Trade and Industry team resigned en masse so that Britian can regain leadership in world markets?

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman will have already heard the exchange of questions on this at Question Time. We have had a surplus on current account in each of the past four years. We would have had a surplus this year but for the miners' strike, and we expect a surplus on current account next year. That is a pretty good record.

Soviet Union

23. Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on trade with the Soviet Union.

Mr. Channon: In the first 10 months of 1984 the level of trade between our two countries increased by 32 per cent. I consider that the prospects for trade with the Soviet Union are better now than they have been for a number of years, and I hope that this trend will be maintained.

Mr. Terlezki: As Mr. Gorbachev is visiting our free, democratic country this week, can my hon. Friend say whether he has already met or is about to meet Mr. Gorbachev so as to ensure that Anglo-Soviet trade can be increased in some areas, with the exception of certain scientific, technical and industrial equipment which it could be against our future interests to sell?

Mr. Channon: I have met Mr. Gorbachev once this week. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) and I, among others, are giving him dinner tomorrow. One of the main topics so far has been Anglo-Soviet trading relations and I hope that we shall be able to make important progress in that regard.

Mr. Heffer rose——[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to ask a question?

Mr. Heffer: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but it is difficult due to the rabble beside me.

Is the Minister aware that, although many of us have severe criticisms of the Soviet internal regime and believe that there must be greater democracy and human rights there, we nevertheless believe that it is vital for the interests of this country that trade with the Soviet Union should increase? Will the Minister give a guarantee that in tomorrow's discussions with the Soviet representatives every avenue will be explored to see what can be done to improve trading relations with the Soviet Union?

Mr. Channon: Yes, Sir.

Share Ownership

24. Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to provide encouragement for greater employee participation through share ownership schemes in the enterprises under his control.

Mr. Fletcher: As I have already told the House today, we have just completed the biggest single step so far this century towards wider ownership of shares in British industry. Over 2 million people purchased British Telecom shares, including many first-time investors and 184,000 employees of BT. We shall continue to encourage wider ownership of shares both by employees and by individual investors.

Mr. Hayward: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer, but may I ask him whether he has any expectation that, in the near future, share ownership in this country will rise to the levels that currently exist in France and West Germany?

Mr. Fletcher: We would be extremely pleased to see that happen. We are taking other steps, too. Privatisation is very important, but changes are also taking place in the Stock Exchange and in the financial services sector in general which will encourage wider share ownership.

Mr. Williams: Does the Minister recollect, in relation to BT, that there were warnings that those who made multiple applications could face actions for fraud? Can he tell us that his Department intends to initiate such legal action, bearing in mind the Prime Minister's injunction that the law must be obeyed? Or is it only working men and women who have to obey the law, and not the Government's friends in the City?

Mr. Fletcher: There is no justification for that remark. My Department is investigating very carefully the cases that have been brought to our attention.

RAF Basic Trainer

3.32 pm

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the ministerial decision not to select the Hunting Firecracker as a basic trainer."

In an answer yesterday to a written question about the replacement of the RAF basic trainer, the Minister for Defence Procurement rejects the all-British Hunting Firecracker and short-lists a Brazilian and a Swiss aircraft as the contenders for the contract. That decision has astounded many hon. Members and many in the country who cannot understand why a British-designed and British-built aircraft, the Firecracker, which fully meets all the design specifications of the RAF, should be rejected in favour of foreign contenders built by countries that are not even members of NATO.

There has been a mine of misinformation about the contenders. In the written answer, the Minister said that the foreign aircraft had advantages in cost and performance. Clearly, he has not properly evaluated the costs. The Brazilian aircraft is heavily subsidised by that Government, which in turn has been propped up by the western Governments. We would therefore pay twice over for that aircraft. Each of the Swiss planes—the Pilatus —will cost up to £300,000 more because, unfairly, it has been built greatly to exceed the RAF specifications. In other words, one pays one's money and takes one's choice. If the RAF were going to change the rules in mid-air, the other contenders should have been told. One does not learn to drive in a racing car, which is what the Swiss Pilatus is; one learns in a British Maestro.

The Hunting Firecracker is British-designed and British-built. It is entirely financed by British entrepreneurial enterprise—by people who are prepared to risk their own money.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that he is applying for leave to move the Adjournment of the House. He should not be making detailed arguments.

Mr. Ashby: I take your point, Mr. Speaker. This is an application under Standing order No. 10. I shall attempt not to put the argument but to present the facts.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The relevant words are "urgent", "specific" and "important".

Mr. Ashby: The aircraft was to be built in an area of mining decline where pits are closing, which faces 20 to 30 per cent. unemployment and where jobs are really needed. The enthusiasm and the great hopes of the people involved in the company and the area have been dashed. The contract is to go to a foreign aircraft manufactured under licence either by the great nationalised giant of Shorts or the great denationalised giant of British Aerospace. Whichever one it is, the British taxpayer pays for it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman again, but he must not go into the detailed arguments that he might advance if the House gave him permission to move the Adjournment of the House to discuss the matter. He must make out his case for its urgent consideration.

Mr. Ashby: This is of course an urgent matter because of the answer that has been given and because of the decisions that must be taken. In terms of cost, the Hunting Firecracker — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] — this matter relates directly to the written answer. Hunting Firecracker offered to come back with reduced costs but was told that that was not necessary. The Swiss and Brazilians are unfairly being given the opportunity to re-tender. In terms of performance, it was acknowledged by the RAF that the Hunting Firecracker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must stop the hon. Gentleman. He must not go into the details of the matter. He is well outside the rules. Will he now come to a conclusion?

Mr. Ashby: In terms of cost and in terms of performance, Hunting Firecracker is being treated unfairly. That is why it is essential that we debate the issue. There has been a debate in another place and it is right that the matter be debated here as well. That is essential to the future of the British aircraft industry.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the ministerial decision not to select the Hunting Firecracker as a basic trainer."

I have listened with great care to what the hon. Gentleman has said——

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret that I do not consider that the matter which the hon. Gentleman has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10, and I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

Teachers (Independent Pay Review) (Scotland)

3.36 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish an independent pay review body with powers to fix the annual rates of pay for teachers, their conditions of service and related matters in Scotland.

The Houghton committee of inquiry reported its findings on the pay of non-university teachers to the Secretary of State for Scotland in December 1974. The committee recommended salary increases of 30·5 per cent. for Scottish day school teachers with effect from May 1974. [Interruption.] The committee concluded that further independent examination of teachers' pay would be necessary. [Interruption.] I should like to quote from paragraph 274 of the Houghton committee report.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I cannot hear what the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) is saying, because Tory Members, who have no interest in Scottish education, are talking so loudly.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the whole House wishes to hear what the hon. Gentleman has to say.

Mr. Kirkwood: I am grateful for your protection, Mr. Speaker. The Houghton committee said:

"However good the information, and whatever the improvements in negotiating machinery, there are bound to be occasions when a further independent examination of teachers' pay is needed. We recommend that there should be periodic reviews on the lines of this Inquiry perhaps every seven years. Such inquiries would have as their task the total re-examination of the levels of pay and salary structures in the teaching profession, assessing not only the validity of current internal differentials but also adjustments to salary levels in the light of social and educational circumstances at the time."

Lord Houghton later opined that seven years was inappropriate and that there should be quinquennial reviews. From July 1974 to July 1979, the index of retail prices increased by 109 per cent., whereas the salaries of Scottish teachers rose by only 72 per cent. Inevitably, in July 1979 the salaries of Scottish teachers were remitted to the Standing Commission on Pay Comparability—the Clegg commission. That commission reported in March 1980 and awarded increases totalling 18·2 per cent. in two phases, the first from 1 January 1980 and the second from 1 September 1980.

Since September 1980, the erosion that followed Houghton has inexorably followed Clegg. The index of retail prices at September 1980 stood at 270·2 and at September 1984 at 355·5—an increase of 31·6 per cent. Teachers' salaries have increased by only 23·2 per cent. over the same period, a drop of 8·4 per cent., or about £821 in an average teacher's salary. Teachers' pay has fared worse in relation to average earnings. While those in work increased their earnings by about 39 per cent. between August 1980 and August 1984, teachers' pay rose by 23·2 per cent. — a differential of 16·2 per cent., which is the equivalent of £1,584 in average teachers' salaries.

Obviously, a teacher has no more right than anyone else to an immutable salary relativity, but movement up or down must be related to changes in the nature of the job —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to give the hon. Gentleman consideration; it is difficult to hear him at this end of the Chamber.

Mr. Kirkwood: The Scottish joint negotiating committee has just produced a report which confirms that, within the last five years, the workload of Scottish teachers has increased substantially. That report was compiled by a joint teacher-management working party, and was accepted unanimously by the full Scottish joint negotiating committee, which includes representatives of the Secretary of State for Scotland. That report covers changes in the curriculum, the nature of teaching, discipline and administration. In particular it focuses attention on increased teacher workload in and out of school and on the greater stress and pressure so prevalent in our classrooms today.

That report concluded that, unless pay, conditions, staffing and resources are improved, the morale of teachers will continue to decline and the education service will deteriorate. In that atmosphere, educational development will surely perish.

The current salaries negotiating machinery is incapable of producing fair results, as the arbitration report in 1982 pointed out. That report admitted that teachers were due an increase of about 11 per cent., but notwithstanding that, the arbiters accepted the "ability to pay" argument and awarded only 6 per cent. rather than the 11 per cent. they considered due. In so doing, they proved that neither negotiation nor arbitration can provide for teachers a means of securing a fair evaluation of their skills and efforts.

It is nevertheless necessary that salary negotiations continue, because only the management and the teachers' sides are sensitive to the changing needs of the service. The negotiating machinery cannot withstand the pressure of financial restraint imposed annually by Government for reasons unconnected with the value of teachers' work. Teachers cannot be regarded as a rearguard as inflation rises and as a vanguard—setting the good example—as inflation falls. An independent review body established every five years would guarantee a limit to the extent to which teachers could fall behind other similarly qualified professions and would give an opportunity for fair adjustment. That is all that teachers ask. How much more effective teachers would be if they could channel all their energies into the classroom and leave the streets to others and other causes!

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Archy Kirkwood, Mr. Malcolm Bruce, Mr. Tam Dalyell, Mr. Roy Jenkins, Mr. Russell Johnston, Mr. Charles Kennedy, Mr. John Maxton, Mr. Robert Maclennan, Mr. David Steel, Mr. Gordon Wilson and Mr. James Wallace.

TEACHERS (INDEPENDENT PAY REVIEW) (SCOTLAND)

Mr. Archy Kirkwood accordingly presented a Bill to establish an independent pay review body with powers to fix the annual rates of pay for teachers, their conditions of service and related matters in Scotland: And the same was read the First time ; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 18 January and to be printed. [Bill 50.]

Local Authority Capital Expenditure

3.44 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I beg to move, That this House do now adjourn.

Leave having been given on Tuesday 18 December under Standing Order No. 10 to discuss:

The statements made on 18 December relating to local authorities' capital expenditure in England and Wales.

There are a number of very important reasons why this debate should take place today: its importance to millions of people; its importance in respect of local democracy; its importance to the building and construction industry and, not least, to those who work in it. The debate will give the House of Commons the opportunity to vote upon yesterday's statements about local government capital investment and to record its views on the Government's abysmal management of these matters, which affect millions of people in this country.

The Government's record is one of broken promises, of regular changes of mind, of misleading statements and of prevarication and delay which add up to incompetence in the management by the Government of this crucial area of local government activity. The Tory policies of stop-go of the 1950s and early 1960s pale into insignificance when seen beside this Government's performance since 1979. As a result of that performance, this country is now rapidly sliding back to an era of private affluence for some and public squalor for many. A real crisis exists now in housing and the situation is deteriorating rapidly. The crisis affects people who own their own homes, tenants of private landlords and council house tenants, too.

Many recent studies, including those by the Policy Studies Institute and the National Economic Development Office, have shown the continuing and rising need for more public investment in housing. The present backlog exists both in the public and private sector, both of which depend upon support through the national housing investment programme. There are over 1 million households on waiting lists for council accommodation, of which over 200,000 households are overcrowded; almost 250,000 households share accommodation; 190,000 people await sheltered accommodation; 7,000 families await specialised disabled accommodation.

According to the English house condition survey, over 1 million dwellings are unfit for human habitation; almost 400,000 lack basic amenities; over 500,000 require repairs costing more than £7,000 per dwelling; and 2·5 million require repairs costing in excess of £2,000. A particular worry—it should be a worry to the whole House—is the increasing level of homelessness and the escalating cost to the taxpayer of board and lodging accommodation payments and the increasing use of hostels and hotels to accommodate homeless families. Over 80,000 households will be accepted as homeless this year. Many more are refused help.

Defective housing is also widespread in the public sector and the level of slum clearance is at an all-time low. Government policy means that the current year will see the lowest number of council house completions ever recorded. As I said yesterday, the best year of the Government's record produced 214,000 starts in the public and private sectors. In the lowest year of achievement of the previous Labour Government, that total was 264,000 starts—50,000 more.

In a letter to the Prime Minister on 2 November this year, the president of the Building Employers Federation condemned reports of the possibility of capital spending on housing being cut by £600 million in the coming financial year. That is, in effect, what has happened. He claimed that such a reduction was equivalent to 18 per cent. of the total housing programme and to the loss of at least 75,000 jobs in building and construction. He went on:

"A further cut in housing capital would do untold damage to the industry and would be seen as one more blow in a sustained campaign to undermine the confidence of the British construction industry."

The National Home Improvement Council said:

"It is incredible to think that, while housing is steadily rotting away, local authorities have ready money . . . but are not allowed to use it for putting housing in order. It is unbelievable that this state of affairs is allowed to exist, especially when money spent on improving our houses not only maintains our standard of living, but also creates jobs as no other industry can."

Those views are shared by the Federation of Master Builders—the paymasters of the Conservative party—the Federation of Civil Engineering Contractors, the British construction materials industry, the Confederation of Building Material Producers, the CBI and the TUC. Indeed, they are shared by everyone associated with the management, building and construction of housing and with the building and construction industry.

The Secretary of State for the Environment tried to argue yesterday that nothing had changed. That can only be described as an attempt to mislead the House. In the current year, £3,244 million was allocated to local authorities, new towns and the Housing Corporation. The revised projection for next year is a reduction of £188 million. However, in a statement to the press a few weeks ago, the Department of the Environment and the Secretary of State tried to present that as a reduction of only £65 million compared with the original projection.

The year-on-year cut of £188 million excluded any allowance for inflation. If that is taken into account—and taking the Government's figure of 5 per cent. inflation—the real terms reduction is as much as £350 million, or 11 per cent.

Furthermore, while capital receipts were expected to rise by £430 million gross, £310 million net, that was to be clawed back by a reduction in the Treasury contribution from £1,644 million in the current financial year to £1,326 million next year. Therefore, taking the two differences together, the total cut in the money available to local authorities is well over £600 million—a cut in real terms of about 20 per cent. That is what the Secretary of State was telling the House yesterday and that is why he should not have been surprised at the reception that he was given from both sides.

The Government have tried to work a con trick in saying that gross housing provision is being maintained. That is simply not the case.

Indeed, £1,600 million of housing investment programme allocation and 20 per cent. of local receipts mean a housing cash limit of £324 million, compared with more than £1 billion in the current financial year. Looked at that way, the cut is in excess of £700 million in the money that the Treasury is putting into the housing programme. We are told that this is being done to maintain the cash limit for 1985-86. but I suspect, as do many in housing, that that cash limit is already as good as broken by resources committed for the coming financial year. To suggest that it will somehow be maintained is ridiculous. If the limit were enforced in that way, the Government would have to declare, in effect, a total and obligatory moratorium now. I challenge the Government to say whether that is the reality.

The Cambridge Econometrics study that is used by most organisations, including many in the building industry and the private sector, equates £500 million of expenditure with 65,000 jobs in the construction industry and the economy as a whole. If cuts in excess of £1 billion are put into effect, the loss of jobs is likely to exceed 100,000.

The Government have got all this wrong. Their main argument is that the action is necessary to prevent overspending. But no local authority can overspend because, by definition, an authority must balance its budget. In so far as overspend exists at all in the Treasury's mind—the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) has used the phrase "voodoo economics"—it is simply an attempt to match the real world of local authority services and provision, and the needs of people and our infrastructure, with the increasingly unreal world of Treasury economics and accounting.

Will the Secretary of State tell us what the real economic effect would be of letting local authorities spend their capital receipts—their own money? What does he think the sound macro-economic arguments are against that proposal? We have yet to hear from the Secretary of State or from the Chancellor of the Exchequer any convincing arguments on the ground of macro-economic policy as to why the capital expenditure of local authorities, financed wholly from their own capital receipts and assets, should be controlled in the Government's increasingly draconian, arbitrary and unfair fashion.

Even the Financial Times is wholly unpersuaded of the sense of the Government's case. It described yesterday's announcement as "a particularly mean-spirited application of the Government's heads-we-win, tails-you-lose approach to local authoritities".

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): Would the hon. Gentleman be kind enough to share with the House his view on the following point? He has acknowledged, and none of us perhaps would dispute, that an enormous number of people want rented accommodation. Will he therefore take this opportunity to declare from thae Dispatch Box tht if his party was re-elected to office, it would repeal the shorthold provisions of the Housing Act 1980 which provide private rented accommodation for those in need?

Dr. Cunningham: I regret giving way to the hon. Gentleman. He abused the intervention. It was not even relevant to what I am discussing. I am in the middle of advancing an argument about expenditure of capital receipts to the Secretary of State.

Of course, the Government will argue that they are cash-limiting capital expenditure by local authorities and in doing so they will act to reduce the public sector borrowing requirement, since, if, local authorities cannot invest their capital receipts, they lend them to the markets or the banks, or use them to repay existing debt. In that way the size of the net total of public sector borrowing is reduced.

There is the gravest suspicion that the Treasury is using capital receipts as a back-door method of massaging down the PSBR figure and of indirectly financing Government debt. But only practitioners of voodoo economics—to use the colourful and accurate phrase of the hon. Member for Selly Oak—would regard that as either justifiable or sensible. It is nonsense, economically and socially, to withhold those capital receipts from use in local government where they could be put to effective use in the regeneration of the British economy, housing people and creating jobs and employment in our economy.

We are entitled to ask, and the House is entitled to know, what has changed since 3 November 1982 when, during the debate on the Loyal Address, the Prime Minister said:

"We need more capital spending by local government and in the public sector generally. I agree that it is vital to maintain the nation's infrastructure, its roads, its buildings, its water supply and its drains."—[Official Report, 3 November 1982; Vol. 31, c. 21.]

If that was right in November 1982, why has it suddenly become wrong in December 1984? If it was right in 1981 for the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), then a Treasury Minister, to argue that there should be no control over local authorities' expenditure of their own capital receipts, why is it right now for him as Chancellor to argue that there should be increasing turning of the screw, leading, presumably, to total control of local authorities' use of their capital receipts?

What has changed in the economy since the right hon. Gentleman changed his position as a Minister? There has not been any improvement, certainly not in housing and certainly not in the building and construction industry. What has changed is simply that an election has come and gone and that the commitments given at that time have been abandoned, just as the commitment to owner-occupiers for grants to improve their premises has been abandoned. Apparently, following yesterday's statement of the Secretary of State for the Environment, there is no longer any commitment either to young people who cannot afford to buy a house to be housed by the local councils. That commitment, too, has been ditched by the Government.

Since the Secretary of State said that people should look to the private market, can he explain the press notice from his Department today, which points out that not only is building falling in the public sector under his policies but that it is falling in the private sector as well? How do the Government expect young unemployed people to buy a house? How do they expect young people in the black and ethnic communities, trapped in appalling conditions and also unemployed, to buy houses? How can elderly and disabled people, living in often crumbling, inadequate, damp and cold accommodation, buy their way out of such situations?

What are the economics behind the Secretary of State's statement yesterday? For that matter, what social policy lies behind it? Do not the Government realise that everyday existence for millions of people in appalling and inadequate housing is abysmal? Do they not recognise the long-term damage to people's health of bad housing conditions? Do they not realise that every child living in overcrowded accommodation, short of space, peace and quiet, and the ability properly to communicate with his or her parents, is a child who will probably be damaged for life? Is there no feeling among Ministers about all that?

How incredibly stupid to argue that allowing the housing stock, the urban environment, the infrastructure and educational facilities in Britain to deteriorate is sound economics. Do not the Government recognise the effects of all that on the British people? The answer can only be no.

In pursuance of a perverse and failed economic policy, this crass and stupid Administration are imposing appalling sacrifices on the people of Britain through their housing policies. Frankly, it is not enough for Conservative Back Benchers to shoot the messenger as they did yesterday. This is the time to force a change, if they really want one. If Conservative Members believe what they said yesterday, if they are concerned about local democracy, employment, the building and construction industry and the infrastructure of Britain—if, above all, they are concerned about people—they will join us in the lobbies tonight.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): To listen to the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) one would think that somehow history had begun in 1979. He chided the Government with falling expenditure on new housing starts. He seems to have forgotten that when the Labour party was in government there was a cut in capital expenditure on housing of 45 per cent. That has to be compared with a figure of half that size under this Government.

If the argument today is about the treatment of capital receipts, my hon. Friends might well bear in mind that if the Labour party had been in office, with its well known opposition to the sale of council houses, there would have been no capital reciepts. Therefore, the only way that that party would have been able to sustain a capital investment programme in housing would have been to have either higher borrowing or higher taxation.

For the hon. Gentleman to chide the Government on the subject of home improvement grants is beyond belief. As he will know, in the peak year—it was a short-term major boost to home improvements—the Government spent no less than £900 million. That is 10 times the amount spent by the Labour Government when they left office.

The debate today goes to the heart of the Government's economic strategy—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am glad that the Labour party recognises that. The public expenditure plans for next year were announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his autumn statement on 12 November. That statement was approved by the House on 6 December. I shall remind the House of the terms of the motion. It stated that the House

"congratulates Her Majesty's Government on keeping the public expenditure planning total for 1985-86 within the figure published in the 1984 Public Expenditure White Paper."
—[Official Report,6 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 519.]

The motion was approved by a majority of 145. We have not cut the total of public expenditure for 1985-86. We stuck to the figure of £132 billion for 1985-86 that we announced a year earlier. We have kept on course. Now we have to deliver that figure, which brings me to the decisions that I announced yesterday.

I repeat that our plans for local authority capital spending remain exactly as provided in the autumn statement and as approved by the House.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Local authorities have in their possession capital receipts. They can spend them on housing or whatever, without borrowing more money and without raising extra taxation. For the life of me, I cannot see the economic objection to that. Will my right hon. Friend tell the House what the objection is?

Mr. Jenkin: I assure my hon. Friend that I am aware of that argument. I shall deal with it in some detail.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle) rose—

Mr. Jenkin: I make no complaint about the fact that the House was extremely rough with me yesterday, but I hope that hon. Members will listen to my argument today. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to give the Secretary of State a fair hearing.

Mr. Jenkin: The truth is that during the past two years local authorities in England and Wales have been spending collectively well above the Government's cash limits for each year. In 1983-84 the overspend in England was £368 million. For the present year it could be more than £500 million, even after our request for restraint.

Councils are able to exceed the national cash limit because they are free to spend part of the receipts from the sale of council houses and other assets on top of their allocations. Because of the undoubted success of the right-to-buy policy, the total amount of unspent capital receipts has now grown so large—it is £5 billion or more—that if councils were to spend as much of that as they are allowed to spend under the present rules, there would be another large national overspend in 1985-86. It could amount to £1 billion or more. That would be a direct claim on the contingency reserve. [Laughter.] It would add to the public sector borrowing requirement and obviously it would affect interest rates. [Interruption.] I shall answer the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) in a minute. The House wants to hear the argument. That is why I stress that the issue goes to the heart of the Government's economic strategy. I emphasise that we are not merely talking of tens or twenties of millions of pounds but of £1 billion or more.

My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham asked quite properly why that affects the public sector borrowing requirement. When a council sells a house, for example, for £10,000, that money, if it is not spent in the year in which it is received, will be used to reduce the council's borrowing or it will be lent. In either case it reduces the council's net borrowing. That reduction in borrowing reduces the total PSBR in the year in which that £10,000 is received. Those reductions have already been taken into account each year in the public expenditure White Paper figures.

Mr. Jenkin: I shall finish my point before I give way. If, in a later year, the council decides to spend that £10,000, it will have to borrow back the money to finance the expenditure. [Laughter.] It will.

Mr. Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Dr. Cunningham.

Dr. Cunningham: If all this kindergarten economics is true now, why was it not true in 1981 when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was Financial Secretary to the Treasury, and the Government were making the PSBR and the money supply the biggest test of economic and political virility? If it was not true then, what has changed?

Mr. Jenkin: It was true then.

Dr. Cunningham: It was not.

Mr. Jenkin: Yes, it was. Of course it was. The hon. Gentleman has made exactly my point. When the receipts were taken in and not spent, they went to reduce the claim on the PSBR. [Interruption.] Of course they did.

Dr. Cunningham: The right hon. Gentleman has a strange memory. In 1981 there were no central Government-imposed controls on the expenditure of receipts by local councils.

Mr. Jenkin: I shall explain in a moment — [Interruption.]? The Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 has always contained such a power. I shall come to that. The hon. Gentleman perfectly fairly asked why the figure was not taken into account. The answer is that it was. The figures go into the public expenditure total, net after receipt. Therefore, in the year in which the receipt was taken and not spent, it was taken into account. Therefore, if it is not treated as an addition to public sector borrowing when it is spent, it is being accounted for twice.

Mr. Tapsell: Does my right hon. Friend agree that in the leading article in today's Financial Times, that newspaper considers his argument in some detail and concludes that it is a purely statistical consideration with no relevance in the real world?

Mr. Jenkin: The writer of that leading article, which I have read, is not responsible for making the figures add up at the end of the day. [Laughter.] That is the responsibility that falls on my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. A large number of hon. Members wish to speak in the debate. It is the Secretary of State's decision whether or not he will give way.

Mr. Cormack rose——

Mr. Jenkin: However much Labour Members shout, the simple truth remains that if a receipt is taken in and not spent, it either reduces borrowing or is lent, and that reduces the PSBR. If, subsequently, it comes back from borrowing and is spent, that increases the PSBR. There is no denying that logic. Capital spending by local authorities——

Mr. Cormack rose——

Mr. Jenkin: I shall not give way. Mr. Speaker, you have reminded the House that this is a short debate and that many hon. Members wish to speak. I do not wish to take too much time.

Mr. Geoffrey Rippon (Hexham): If my right hon. Friend could leave this curious academic and statistical debate for a moment—some of us wish to help him and do not wish to vote with the Opposition—could he at least, in the real world, give some assurances to local authorities that are in great difficulty that he will abandon from time to time those irrational arguments and give authorities some latitude in capital expenditure? That would help us a little.

Mr. Jenkin: I must say, with the greatest respect to my right hon. and learned Friend, that they are not academic arguments. They are real arguments that affect the management of the economy.

The 1980 Act always recognised, for this reason, that there had to be some regulation of the pace at which local authorities spend their accumulated receipts. The Act gave an order-making power to regulate the pace, and that is one purpose of the system of prescribed proportions. In previous years, we have used the power by order to slow the rate at which receipts could be spent by reducing the prescribed proportion. It is because of overspending during the past two years, and because of the threat of a big overspend next year, that we must reduce the proportion again. It will give us a much better chance to keep total spending within the cash limit without having to resort to disruptive and unfair measures later in the year.

To come to the point made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon), that must be set alongside the increased end-year flexibility that I announced yesterday and that I am sure is welcomed by local authorities. My right hon. and learned Friend will also have noted that we have made provision for an extra £100 million to give a little extra allocation to those authorities which loyally complied with my request last year.

May I stress another point on which there has been much misunderstanding. The receipts are and will remain the property of local authorities. They can spend them in future years, but the Government must ensure that the pace at which they are spent is compatible with the Government's spending plans, which the House approved on 6 December. It is essential to stick to planned expenditure and to the economic strategy. We need financial discipline to maintain the economic growth that we are achieving.

I should quote something to the House:

"An essential element of the Government's strategy will be a continuing and substantial reduction over the next few years in the share of resources required for the public sector. It is also essential to reduce the public sector borrowing requirement in order to create monetary conditions which will encourage investment and support sustained growth and the control of inflation."

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): It sounds like the Chancellor.

Mr. Jenkin: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that it was not my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, nor was it me, although I agree with it. It was from a letter——

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, every time the Secretary of State for the Environment falters, to give him a kick?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I repeat that many hon. Members wish to take part in the debate, and this simply takes up time.

Mr. Jenkin: Opposition Members will probably recognise those words from a letter written by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, eight years ago this month, when he had to go cap in hand to the International Monetary Fund. He knew that those measures were right, the Cabinet of which he was a member knew that those measures were right, and the hon. Member for Copeland, who was a member of that Government, knew that the measures were right. The trouble with the Labour party is that it could not stick to its guns. The difference with this Government is that not only do we know that the policies are right, we stick to them.

Dr. Cunningham: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Jenkin: No.

Dr. Cunningham rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State is not giving way.

Mr. Jenkin rose——

Dr. Cunningham rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State is clearly not giving way.

Mr. Jenkin: I have given way many times already.

Dr. Cunningham rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) must realise that the Secretary of State is not giving way. He knows the rules perfectly well.

Mr. Jenkin rose——

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can you advise me whether it is the tradition of the House that when an hon. Member mentions another hon. Member and specifically challenges him, and the latter wishes to intervene, the Minister or the hon. Member who said that should give way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House knows the conventions. I thought that the Secretary of State was referring to another right hon. Member — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] If, nevertheless, the Secretary of State does not give way, that is entirely a matter for him.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Member for Copeland asked me several questions about housing, and he made some mistakes. I should make it clear that our priority in housing —there has never been a secret about this—is to enable more people to achieve what they really wish, and that is to own their homes. Since May 1979, more than 600,000 local authority homes in England have been sold to their tenants; 650,000 new houses have been built by private builders. Owner-occupation in England is now more than 63 per cent. and rising. Last year, 167,000 private sector houses were started, which is more than in any year of the Labour Government. Of course—the hon. Gentleman got this wrong—the Government agree that the public sector must continue to provide housing for those who cannot afford to buy or who have special needs.

Dr. Cunningham: That is not what the Minister said yesterday.

Mr. Jenkin: I say that today, and although the hon. Gentleman may have misunderstood me yesterday, that is now on the record.

The public sector housing programme for 1985-86 will be no less than £3,055 million. We need a better directed use of those public sector resources. The more radical authorities are joining in partnerships with the private sector to harness its resources to the task of improving housing conditions. Massive increases in the municipal solution are not the answer.

Yet the Government are still investing large sums. Total local authority capital spending in England next year will be more than £4 billion. Total United Kingdom public sector construction expenditure will be more than £10 billion. Total public sector capital expenditure will be more than £20 billion. The Labour party never takes into account private investment, which is at a record level. Total capital investment in the economy, public and private, is at its highest—about £55 billion—and in 1985 we expect the total to be even higher, at a new record of nearly £60 billion.

It is because the Government have stuck to their economic strategy that we are now getting this capital investment. If it is to be sustained in construction and elsewhere, we must continue to control public spending and borrowing so as to keep down interest rates and beat inflation. That is why the Government's policy deserves support.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before I call Back Benchers, I say again to the House that there is a very long list of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen wishing to take part in the debate. I appeal for brief contributions.

4.30 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): The Government have succeeded in embroiling themselves deeply with local government, first on the side of revenue and now in the matter of the total of capital expenditure. The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), who moved the Adjournment, said that the Government had done this in pursuit of their economic policy and that view, rather to my surprise, appeared to be shared by the Secretary of State. In fact, the bitter irony—very bitter not only for many Conservative right hon. and hon. Members—is that they have got where they have got by defiance of both the logic and the spirit of what is the core of their economic policy—the economic policy which they espoused when they came into office in 1979 and which, with this major inconsistency, they have followed since then.

I venture, as one who was into monetarism before the Chancellor of the Exchequer was into long trousers, upon a definition, not in its abusive sense but in its proper sense, of the term "monetarism". It is the proposition that inflation as we have known and suffered from it in the last generation is the consequence of the monetarisation of debt by Government. All parts of that definition are necessary to its truth; for it is only Government that can turn their borrowing into ready spending cash. No one else can do it—no private corporation, no individual, not the most powerful city such as Manchester with its statutory borrowing power or the smallest district council, can monetarise its debts. Only Government can do this.

The logic of the Government's policy, therefore, rests upon control not of the totality of public spending, whether it be central Government or other spending, but the control of the spending, and consequently of the borrowing, of central Government. That is the proposition from which the Government have departed to embroil themselves with the very institution of local government. If the Government had said to the local authorities, "Thus much and no more shall we pay to you by way of rate support grant; but if you decide, being elected persons and elected bodies, to spend more, then you must take the consequences of the rate that you must raise," their logic would not have been challengeable.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): It has not been challenged.

Mr. Powell: I agree with the hon. Gentleman.

However, there could have been argument about the element of Government expenditure that was involved.

Now the Government come to the local authorities and say that they propose to limit the amount that authorities can borrow. They do not say that they propose to limit the amount that is lent on to local authorities, having been borrowed on Government security. If they said that, they would have an important case, and a case that would deserve support from the Conservative party and the Government. If they had told local authorities, "Thus much and no more shall be lent on to you from the national loans fund, having been borrowed on Government credit; but if you care, on your credit, on the credit of your rates, to go into the market and borrow more—no doubt it may be at a higher rate of interest, and no doubt that will be reflected in the rate—that is your responsibility and that is a power that you have," the theory on which the Government were acting could not have been challenged. A Government who have announced their intention of denationalising the trustee savings movement are in no position to laugh at the notion that arrangements can be made to enable local authorities to borrow otherwise than from the national loans fund.

It is by departing from the central thesis of their economic policy that the Government have not merely embroiled themselves with local government from one end of the country to the other but set themselves at issue with the underlying democratic principle of local government —that is, that as councils raise a revenue upon their responsibility to their ratepayers, therefore central Government will not intervene — otherwise than by statutory control and regulation, by those statutory definitions of policy that belong ultimately to the House —to curb or limit the extent to which in any particular place they decide so to do.

So I exhort the Government to return to the inner logic that should characterise their action, and to control Government expenditure and Government borrowing. If they say that they want to reduce taxation, they will find that that argument will lead them to the same conclusion, for it is upon the Government's own expenditure that the level of taxation for which the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have to ask next spring depends. So even if they take refuge in the argument that their policy is to reduce taxation, they are still destitute of defence for the assault that they have delivered on local government.

I have nearly done, and have only this to say. It may seem strange for a right hon. Member sitting on the Northern Ireland Bench to take time in a debate that concerns Great Britain. I say it is not only not strange but inevitable. My right hon. and hon. Friends and I were returned to say to the House that those whom we represent demand that there be restored to them the same democratic local government as is enjoyed in the rest of the United Kingdom. It would be an absurdity and a contradiction if we did not today use our voice and our vote against the destruction of the democratic principle, of local government in the rest of the United Kingdom.

4.37 pm

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) gave us an interesting exposition how we might change our public sector borrowing requirement, but, with the greatest respect, I point out that the public sector, no matter whether it be central Government or local authority, is competing against investment in the private sector. Consequently, when the right hon. Gentleman says that if a local authority wants to overspend it can increase the rates, I remind the right hon. Gentleman that many people do not pay rates to their local authority because the rates are paid for them by the DHSS. This has a massive effect on the country's income.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn) rose—

Sir William Clark: No, I shall not give way.

The hysterical reaction of the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) to this matter is unbelievable. I cannot see what the fuss is about. I point out to my hon. Friends that one of the main planks of our last two election manifestos was an undertaking to control public expenditure, and we are doing so, although many Conservative Members still think that public expenditure in its totality, at 42 per cent. of GNP, is far too high and must come down. The statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is absolutely true. The figures produced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State were in the autumn statement, and they are proof positive that the Government have not changed their view. The autumn statement says that, next year, local authorities will spend £30 billion and that the capital expenditure by local authorities on services, including housing, will be £4 billion—there has been no alteration.

The Government have a responsibility to examine overspending. In 1983-84 the local authorities overspent by £368 million. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said that this year's overspend will be about £500 million. Yesterday, my right hon. Friend announced that in 1985-86 local authorities will have to restrict their capital expenditure on services, including housing, to £4 billion.

People talk about reserves, but I do not believe that many of us understand what they are. The are not cash reserves. As my right hon. Friend said, the sale of council houses, land and such assets has produced a reserve of £5 billion in the hands of local authorities. Much of that money, although it is in reserve, has been lent to council tenants to buy their houses.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir William Clark: I shall not give way.

Some local authorities have been giving mortgages to purchase council houses, and in this case those mortgages canot be called in. People believe that the £5 billion is cash in reserve; it is not. Part of the money is in reserve, but not all of it. The bulk has been lent to the local authority to be used in its area or to other local authorities, and they have used the money. Consequently, if authorities wanted to spend some of those reserves, they would have to call in some of those loans.

Mr. John Fraser rose——

Sir William Clark: I shall not give way. It would not be a bad idea if the Opposition waited.

If there were a massive calling in of loans to use the money to provide extra housing or other capital projects, the market would be affected. We must remember that, next year, the public sector borrowing requirement may increase. I believe that everyone, including my hon. Friends, would agree that it is high enough at £8·5 billion. Some of my hon. Friends would like more money to be spent on capital projects, and I can understand their point. We must find the money either by borrowing or by taxing, and I do not believe that we shall obtain the money by taxation.

Mr. Charles Irving (Cheltenham): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir William Clark: I shall not give way.

Statements have been made about linking these reserves to the amount of capital expenditure. The Housing Act 1980 allows a council to spend up to 50 per cent. of receipts from the sale of assets, apart from the money that the council could generate itself. That percentage was reduced to 40 per cent. and then was reduced again to its present level of 20 per cent. It is incorrect to say that this is a new measure. It has been done since 1980. The same principle applies to the sale of land.

There is no question of taking these capital reserves from local authorities. The Government are saying merely that the pace at which those reserves are spent is to be restricted so that the public sector demands on the market are contained within the £8·5 billion limit. I am sure that all my hon. Friends would like increased capital expenditure, but I certainly would not like more capital expenditure at the expense of more taxation or borrowing.

I agree that public sector starts in house building have decreased. Last year, 167,400 houses were built by the private sector—a 10-year record. During the first nine months of 1984, construction industry output increased in real terms by 4·7 per cent. compared with 1983. In 1983, capital expenditure by the private and public sectors amounted to £45·5 billion in 1980 terms. That is not a bad record.

The Opposition talk sneeringly about home improvement grants, but they have little room to criticise this Government. In 1983-84, the Government spent £770 million of taxpayers' money on those grants.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth) rose——

Sir William Clark: During the last year of the term of the previous Labour Government, only £98 million was spent on those grants. False excitement has been generated by the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. As he rightly pointed out, on 12 November the House agreed the autumn statement—no doubt the Opposition did not agree—and I should have thought that every hon. Member would agree that the public sector borrowing requirement should not be exceeded. We must support the Government in this issue. I remind those hon. Members who want to increase the public sector borrowing requirement that the national debt is costing the taxpayer £16·5 billion a year in interest alone. It would be folly to increase that debt.

The Government are to be commended on sticking religiously to their economic strategy, despite the wishes of vested interests, the Opposition, and so on. It is only because we have not been deflected from our purpose that we are now enjoying a rate of inflation which is the lowest for many years.

Mr. Eric Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): I wish to declare an interest. I believe that only three hon. Members are former construction workers—myself, as a member of the Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians, my hon. Friend the member for Motherwell, North (Mr. Hamilton), who is sponsored by the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers, and my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry), who is a member of the Transport and General Workers Union. I have an interest in this subject from the angle of the construction workers and those who, like myself, when first married, lived for seven years in two rooms and therefore understand exactly what it means to be on a housing list and to live in overcrowded conditions without a proper home of one's own. That is why I was angry when I listened to the Government's statement yesterday.

To some extent I feel sorry for the Secretary of State because I do not think that he is the villain of the piece. I believe that the villain of the piece is the right hon. Gentleman who has just walked out of the Chamber—the Chancellor of the Exchequer—and who is backed by the Prime Minister. The Treasury, backed by the Prime Minister, is responsible for what the Government are doing today. I remember that the Secretary of State was asked to fight his corner—to fight for the industry. That call came not just from Opposition Members; it came clearly also from Conservative Members.

I give the Secretary of State his due. We were told that £600 million was likely to be cut from the housing budget. He undoubtedly put up a fight inside the Cabinet. We were all delighted—although not completely, because we did not want to see any cuts; we would have liked to see further investment in the construction industry—when he said that there was to be a reduction of only £75 million. The National Builder this month says:

"The Autumn Statement was better than at first feared."

The truth is, as one of my hon. Friends said yesterday, the Treasury has now got its revenge. I am not always in agreement with The Guardian but it said, rightly, I think:

"In yesterday's package the Treasury seized back £588 million in an accounting trick which is likely to deceive all but the closest observers."

I have a great deal of sympathy with the Conservative chairman of the Association of District Councils who, following the announcement, said:

"In the Autumn round of public expenditure decisions, the DOE claimed that £600 million of spending cuts had been avoided. Today's announcement gives that claim a hollow ring."

That is right. The Government—to use an Orwellian phrase—are using "doublethink" and "newspeak". In the debate on the Queen's Speech on 3 November 1982, the Prime Minister answered my right hon. Friend the

[Mr. Eric Heffer]

Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot)—before the general election of course, that is the important point—and said:

"We need more capital spending by local government and in the public sector generally."—[Official Report, 3 November 1982; Vol. 31, c. 21.]

In a letter to Sir Jack Smart, then a prominent figure on the Association of Metropolitan Authorities—before the general election, of course—the Prime Minister said:

"Local authorities have been enabled, and indeed encouraged, to increase their capital expenditure by using capital receipts to supplement their capital allocation."

We are seeing the opposite of that policy being carried out today.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): My hon. Friend will recall that when Liverpool city council was negotiating with the Secretary of State he told the council that although the Prime Minister was opposed to the spending of capital receipts, he was not. It was on that basis that Liverpool eventually found a solution to its problem. Does my hon. Friend see the announcement as a breach of faith with Liverpool?

Mr. Heffer: I do. I agree with my hon. Friend. It underlines the next point that I was going to make. Mr. George Smith, the president of the Institute of Housing, has said that local authorities had been

"the victims of a monstrous confidence trick."

That is the position in which we are today.

I have no doubt that many of my hon. Friends will rightly demand the Secretary of State's resignation. I do not care whether he resigns or not, and I will tell the House why. If he resigned, leaving the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister, we might have someone even worse. Just imagine that. With their majority, we might have someone even worse than we have now. I can see that happening.

It is interesting to read the exchanges that took place in the House yesterday afternoon. There were Conservative Members who regarded the policy as "voodoo economics". Only two Conservative Members defended their Front Bench. Conservative Members must do what many Labour Members did when our Government made drastic cuts in housing expenditure. We were prepared to get up and say that that was wrong. Conservative Members must not just say that the policy is wrong; they must show that it is by their vote. If they do not want to vote with the Opposition, they do not have to vote with the Government. It is the only way in which the Government will take notice of what is happening.

The Secretary of State said that the announcement goes to the heart of the Government's policy. He is right. I draw attention to what the Minister for Housing and Construction said to the Building Employers Confederation in London recently. I have a high personal regard for him, but politically I feel differently. Before he spoke, Mr. Millwood, the national president, said:

"In the last decade total construction output had fallen by around one-fifth while output of new work had dropped by no less than one-third. The effect on building employment of that drastic reduction in workload made even more sombre reading."

The Minister responded to that, and I want the House to listen carefully to what he said because it is at the heart of the Government's philosophy. It is reported in this month's National Builder that he said:

"Employment creation is not in itself enough to justify public spending on construction, nor for that matter on anything else."

That is at the heart of the Government's argument. They are not interested in investment in the construction industry, as a Conservative Member said yesterday, to create homes and employment for the people. When some of us have said that the Government have used unemployment as a weapon, we have been told that that is exaggeration, but that is a clear statement by the Minister, and it is the essence of the Government's position.

I speak as a construction worker. There are 400,000 of my people—construction workers—out of work. Many of them are highly skilled. Many of them have been out of work for well over a year and in some cases two and three years. Thousands of young working couples wanting a home are on a waiting list. They are living in appalling and overcrowded conditions. Many of them have no hope of having a home for five or six years or even longer. Many are living in homes that need improvements and repairs. The Government have affected all those people. The Government must be prepared to change their policy. If not, the right hon. Gentleman should cease to be Secretary of State and the Government should go out of office to give those of us who want investment in the construction industry the opportunity to get our people back to work.

Mr. Geoffrey Rippon (Hexham): It is a pleasure for me to find myself once again in full agreement with the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). I, like him, have been a monetarist for many years—indeed, ever since I was assistant to Professor Hayek, who I think is well regarded by my colleagues on the Government Front Bench. I have always made a distinction, as the right hon. Gentleman did when a Labour Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced the monetarist policy that the Conservative Government carried on, between good and bad monetarism. That is a distinction that sometimes my right hon. Friends and the Secretary of State for the Environment have failed to make. The argument that he advanced today is bad monetarism and irrational economic nonsense. It should be dismissed for the reasons outlined by the right hon. Member for South Down, which I warmly support.

The right hon. member for South Down referred to a factor which has been central to the policy of both Conservative and Labour Governments for many years. As Professor Hayek wrote in his great work, "The Road to Serfdom", we cannot have real democracy without effective and real local government. That is what the debate is all about. Many of us on the Conservative Benches have been worried for a long time about the growing divergence between central Government and local authorities which, for generation after generation, have worked together in partnership. They have certainly not worked always in absolute agreement, but there has been an understanding of each other's points of view and problems. That is why we have been so disturbed by the nature and manner of the statement that was made yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

My right hon. Friend's statement appeared irrational, and it can be considered erratic in the context of the request made by the Government—it was made in the speech of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and in the speeches of other Ministers—to the local authorities to quicken and increase capital expenditure. What could be more irrational than to urge local authorities in January to increase capital expenditure by March? It is impossible for local authorities, companies, Governments or any other organisations to plan capital expenditure, except on a rational long-term basis against the background of some consistency of policy from the Government.

The money is in the hands of the local authorities in the sense that I regard my money to be in my own hands when I sell my house and lend the money to a bank at a high rate of interest, happily, thanks to the Government. Having done so, I do not consider it wrong to say, "I want the money back because I want to build a new house." The money is available, so that is M1.

Secondly, we have the men. There is no question of too much pressure being placed on the labour force. We have M1, the money, and M2, the men. Thirdly, we have M3, the materials. I suggest that that is a much more rational concept of economics than the motorway madness, as I used to call it, of M1, M2 and M3 statistics.

I welcome what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had to say—I think that I understood him aright although it was rather noisy at the time—about bringing orders before the House and providing the opportunity for debate. Of course, we want to be helpful to my right hon. Friend. I do not want a vote on the Adjournment of the House to hold up all the other important discussions that are to take place this evening. I do not think that I can vote on that Question this evening, but I am prepared to abstain. However, many of my right hon. and hon. Friends and I want to leave entirely open the attitude that we shall take to the orders that my right hon. Friend lays before the House. Much will depend on his ability to give the assurance for which I asked—that the Government will consider the problems of the inner cities, some of which are great and desperate, in a broad way. In other words, between now and the laying of the orders, I hope that clear undertakings will be given to local authorities that my right hon. Friend's use of "flexible" means that if their needs can be proved they will be met, because of need, not loyalty.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The announcement that I made yesterday had nothing to do with the substantial sums that the Government have earmarked for the urban programme. Those sums will not be affected by the statement, and the Government will continue to make them available. there will be an increasing concentration on the partnership and programme areas. In that respect, I can go quite a long way to meet my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Rippon: I am grateful for that. I have no doubt that that issue can be clarified further in subsequent discussions with local authorities before the orders are laid. Many of us are concerned that the necessary dialogue between the Government and local authority associations is not taking place. If there is further clarification on the issue to which my right hon. Friend referred, and an indication that where a case can be made a local authority will be allowed to use in a proper way more of its capital receipts, it may not be necessary to vote against the orders.

5.6 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I am happy to be called by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, after the right hon. and learned Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon), because I think that I can speak with some authority on behalf of the inner city areas he referred to. Only 2·6 per cent. of the housing in my constituency is owner-occupied, and nowhere in Britain is there a constituency with a lower percentage. There are only four areas in Britain where the council sector is a larger proportion than in my constituency. It is over 80 per cent. in Southwark and Bermondsey. It seems to my constituents, and those of many other hon. Members, that we are debating two main issues, one being economic and one social.

Perhaps the best way to encapsulate what has been said so far is to say that the prophecy made in the autumn of 1983 by the president of the National Federation of Building Trades Employers has been fulfilled. The president warned that Treasury pressure would undermine the Government's housing policies. We have now arrived at a position at which the only available economic arguments seem also not to carry weight. If the best that the Government can do is to put up their Back Bench chairman of the finance committee to advance arguments that are spurious and points that are misleading, they had better change some of the officers who advise the Conservative party on economic affairs.

The arguments about the balance of expenditure between central Government and local government make it necessary first to remember that central Government have been by far the worse culprit. The local authorities have not been overspending considerably in excess of targets but that sort of spending has been carried on from Whitehall. It is only since the Government came to power in 1979 that we have had controls on local authority capital expenditure. We have not had the present system under any other Government, and the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) was wrong to intimate otherwise. First there was 50 per cent. control, then it was 40 per cent. and now we are told it is 20 per cent.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West) rose——

Mr. Hughes: How do the Government answer three questions that arise from the debate and which have been asked by various organisations and writers? First, how do they answer the question that is put in today's edition of the Financial Times? When the local authorities are financing from capital receipts, they are not financing from borrowing because the money is available to them and is not locked away elsewhere. How does that financing undermine the Government's economic strategy? That strategy does not require the moneys to be drawn from another source. They are present and available to local authorities and they are not, as the hon. Member for Croydon, South suggested, being lent out by local authorities to their tenants to finance mortgages. Most of the mortgages that are made available under the right-to-buy scheme are from building societies, not local councils.

Dr. Hampson: My intervention is almost redundant but I think that the hon. Gentleman will wish to put the record straight. The present system, which stems from 1980 legislation, is much freer and flexible than its predecessor. Until the 1980 legislation, there had been project controls by individual central Government Departments on everything spent by local authorities. That system was reformed and the new flexibility allowed authorities to move their capital receipts between various sectors.

Mr. Hughes: In one respect, some flexibility was introduced between the different blocks of spending, but there was another element that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) criticised so validly — the power of central Government to intervene in an unparalleled way in 1980, under the 1980 Act — in theory, and, since then, increasingly in practice—in the moneys, expenditure patterns and democratically made decisions of local authorities up and down the country.

I should like to ask the Minister the second question. Is it or is it not the view of the Treasury and its colleagues in other Departments that money spent on house building and home repair is a very good investment, in simple economic, financial and accounting terms as well as everything else? This figure is one of the most authoritative that I have recently seen. Is it not right that for every £100 million invested in construction, one saves about £75 million in taxation and social security benefits by taking people out of the dole queue and giving people the opportunity to live in a home of their own? If that is not right, how is it that there are criticisms from people who work in the industry—for example, only a couple of weeks ago from the president of the Building Employers Confederation — that at the moment 400,000 construction workers are being paid £600 million by the Government this year in dole money for doing nothing while the housing stock is sliding into decay and disrepair?

I have a last question for the Government. When the Secretary of State answered a question of mine on his trailer statement on the subject in July, he referred to the moneys that the Government would save by the announcement. He said that the percentage had been reduced

"so that we would have a larger slice to reallocate to those authorities which did not have the same opportunities for sales as others."

The right hon. Gentleman concluded:

"I had hoped that the hon. Gentleman would give the Government some credit for that."—[Official Report, 18 July 1984; Vol. 64, c. 336-37.]

I should like to pursue the question asked by the right hon. and learned Member for Hexham. Does the Secretary of State's reply mean that authorities such as mine, which have a large amount of public sector housing stock, most of which are flats, most of which are in high-rise blocks and therefore most of which will not be and have not been bought, will be the beneficiaries of the moneys that the Government are now saving? Or was what I was told in July a lie, because the whole exercise was designed simply to save central Government funds and put the central accounts in what the Government regard as some sort of order? If this is getting the Government off the backs of the people, which appeared to be the motto upon which the Government went to the people and secured a reduction in their vote last year, it is a funny sort of non-interference.

The social arguments are no less valid than the economic ones. How is it possible to justify the halving in London of the provision of public housing investment since the Government came to office? I accept that my borough is unusual because it has the largest public housing sector stock in London. In 1979-80, it received £54,068 million in Government support, which was reduced last year to £31 million, and will be reduced again. How is that justifiable when there is such a substantial need and all the figures prove that? [Interruption.] Conservative Members are rightly saying that there is mismanagement. Of course there is, and I am the first to criticise it. However, that does not justify the Government not putting money into housing when there is still a substantial need. If the Government made a substantial effort it would have immediate results in increasing employment and providing housing for our people.

The programme that we put to the electorate last year was similar in one respect to that of some other opposition parties, in that we said that what was needed was a substantial increase in public sector borrowing to make our country's infrastructure such that we would be allowed to prosper and not decline. Sewers, housing, roads and buildings are our national assets. It is ludicrous for the Government to say that they are unworthy of investment, just as it is appalling for them to preside over their perpetual decline.

One or two weeks ago the Minister for Housing and Construction used a phrase that may remain for a long time in hon. Members' memories. He said that the Government's policies in a certain area were designed to introduce into our national life the magic of the market place. This policy is the monetarism of the madhouse. It is economically, politically and socially mad. I accept that it is not even true to the Government's declared policy and philosophy and it certainly is not true to what the Government declared was their commitment to the people. If they do not believe me, I should like to tell the Government this. Compared with all the housing programmes and housing investment of all our partners in western Europe, it is in this country that the people are most miserably housed and where the smallest proportion of gross national product is spent on housing. I obtained the figures on that from Vol. 64 of Hansard. This country should therefore start to correct and not ignore the appalling disrepair and mismanagement of our assets, for which the Government and their predecessors in 1979 have been responsible.

We believe that improving the nation's housing stock would not only make a positive contribution to the well-being of the United Kingdom but create a better way of life for all sectors of our community. If the Government refuse to respond today, I hope that they will think again over Christmas and decide that they should alter their course, with a resolution not to be so stupid in the new year.

5.16 pm

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkstone and Hythe): The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) spoke of the Government's objective of getting off the backs of the people. His thinking and that of many of his hon. Friends and other Opposition Members is bedevilled by the fact that he confuses the people with local authorities. The Government's objective is indeed to get off the backs of the people, by trying to keep rates, taxes and interest rates as low as possible. It is sometimes necessary to intervene in the way in which local authorities conduct their affairs to achieve those objectives.

Having listened to what has been said by Opposition Members, one might suppose that this was the first occasion on which central Government have sought to intervene in this way to control the expenditure of local authorities.

That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was right to remind the House about the events of 1976. We have the benefit of the account that has been given to us by Lord Barnett, who was then Chief Secretary to the Treasury. We can obtain the flavour of those events, particularly through the description of Cabinet meetings, in which the exchanges culminated in bitter controversy over the issue of whether the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) would sell his own grandmother or ask Lord Barnett to do that work for him. However, that is a reminder of the fact that all Governments have recognised that it is an important and central part of their responsibilities to control public spending as a whole, and that includes the spending of local authorities.

It is in the context of the Government's overall economic policy that one has to examine and assess the proposals before the House. It is predictable that Opposition Members should seek to make political capital out of the fact that control of public spending often means that it is necessary to postpone desirable projects, but, given the failure of Opposition Members when they were in government to achieve so many desirable objectives that they themselves set, their extravagant language on the matter will be heavily discounted by anyone who does not share their partisan point of view.

We have to see how the proposals before us fit in with the Government's overall economic policy. That is why I am somewhat puzzled by the criticisms advanced by so many of my right hon. and hon. Friends, especially as so many of them supported the Government in the Division after the debate on the autumn statement less than a fortnight ago. The proposals announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State yesterday were foreshadowed in the autumn statement and form a central part of the strategy at the heart of that statement. That must be taken fully into account in any assessment of the proposals.

Mr. Irving: I am most interested in my hon. and learned Friend's speech and am listening carefully to every word of it, but I do not quite understand what he is talking about. I do not recall there being anything about this in the autumn statement — unless it was in the same jingle-jangle language as the rate support grant proposals, so that people could not understand it. Local authorities were told previously that the money that they contributed to the pool would be at their disposal. The Secretary of State has repeated today that that money will be "available" to local authorities—but they will not be able to spend it. Why?

Mr. Howard: I shall tell my hon. Friend why. The matter is dealt with in paragraph 2.29 of the autumn statement. If local authorities spend an unlimited amount of money, less money will be available for the private sector — [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] Other things being equal, that means that interest rates will be higher than they otherwise would be. That remains the case whether the money being spent by local authorities is borrowed or is derived from the proceeds of selling council houses or other assets. In any event, the money is being spent, and it is thus not available to be borrowed by the private sector. That is why interest rates would be higher than would otherwise be the case. Local authority treasurers do not sleep with that money under their mattresses. It is either used to diminish existing borrowing or put on deposit and is available to be borrowed by the private sector. If that source of finance is removed, less money will be available to be borrowed and interest rates will be higher.

Mr. Rippon: Paragraph 2.29 of the autumn statement says:

"The outlook for local authority capital spending in 1984-85 is uncertain. Early returns suggested a large overspend on cash limits in England and Wales, and local authorities were asked to restrain spending, and to generate extra receipts. Net provision for Great Britain in 1985-86 is about £3·1 billion. This is a reduction from Cmnd. 9143 of about £600 million, to take account of the 1983-84 overspend and of increased receipts"— to which I would add, which, to the best of our knowledge and belief, they will be allowed to spend.

Mr. Howard: The figure for Great Britain is indeed £3·1 billion. The figure given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State yesterday represents the proportion for England. There is a reduction from Cmnd. 9143 of the amount stated, and it certainly takes account of the previous year's overspend and increased receipts.

Dr. Hampson: There are a couple of distortions that my hon. and learned Friend seems not to have considered. No one is arguing for unlimited freedom to spend capital assets, but we all know that local authorities borrow against capital assets. Moreover, as they are gaining interest on them, that revenue can be and is spent on current account. The Government constantly argue that current account spending is running away and should be controlled while capital spending should be increased, but the current proposals positively encourage the reverse.

Mr. Howard: That is one of the matters to be taken into account. If the money were spent in the year under discussion, less would be available for future years and pressure of interest rates on local authority current account payments would be that much heavier and more difficult in the future.

I hope that the whole House will welcome the objective of keeping interest rates as low as possible in the cause of job preservation and creation. In all our constituencies there are many businesses on the cusp of profitability. If interest rates were raised, they might well cease to operate or have to make workers redundant. That would increase unemployment. There are also businesses contemplating new projects and people contemplating starting new businesses. Interest rates are a critical component in the costs that those people have to take into account in making their decisions.

It is all very well for my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon) and others to share the general approbation of the attempt to reduce interest rates, but it is one thing to say that that is a good thing and quite another to will the means for that end. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot permit himself the luxury of that mental dichotomy between the means and the end. He has to make the connection between the two, and that connection is embodied in the autumn statement that so many of my right hon. and hon. Friends supported less than a fortnight ago. The proposals now before us represent a central part of the strategy embodied in that statement. If one wants lower interest rates, one must will the means and accept the sometimes uncomfortable consequences of so doing.

Mr. Straw: Even within the hon. and learned Gentleman's view of the money market as a closed system in which crowding out pushes up interest rates, does he not realise that, although holding cash balances in local authorities may reduce interest rates, the reduction in orders and the increased borrowing by companies that this causes will increase interest rates? If the money were transferred from local authority balances to construction company balances, the result would be more construction, more people back at work and an increase in company liquidity without any overall increase in interest rates.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman leaves out of account the overriding importance of encouraging at every turn the wealth-creating private sector of the economy. That is best achieved by pursuing policies that will keep interest rates as low as possible.

I stood for election 18 months ago on a manifesto containing the following words:

"We shall maintain firm control of public spending and borrowing. If Government borrows too much, interest rates rise, and so do mortgage payments. Less spending by Government leaves more room to reduce taxes on families and businesses."

I am proud to have been elected to the House on that manifesto, and I adhere to its commitments. That is why I supported the Government in the Division after the debate on the autumn statement and that is why I shall support the Government today.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): While the hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) was speaking, one of my hon. Friends suggested to me that the hon. and learned Gentleman was trying to become the new Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. John Fraser: No—just Creep of the Year.

Mr. Winnick: If that was indeed the hon. and learned Gentleman's purpose, I must say that I doubt whether he would have any more success at the Dispatch Box than the present Secretary of State.

We should be grateful to the Secretary of State for the Environment for one thing only—turning the spotlight on the present appalling housing situation. I had often wondered how long it would be before the media and others outside the House turned their attention to the situation in the building industry and the difficulties faced by so many people as a result of the housing shortage.

Ministers often refer—the Secretary of State did so today — to what happened under the Labour Government. They try to use that as an excuse for what is happening at present. It is true that there was a decline in public sector house building under the Labour Government—I would not wish to deny the obvious, and my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) has made the same point — but it is interesting to note that in 1978, after that decline had taken place, there were 107,000 housing starts in the public sector. By 1981, under the present Government, the figure was just 37,000. The estimated number of public sector housing starts in 1984 is 40,000. There is no comparison between what happened under the Labour Government — even bearing in mind the decline that took place between 1976 and the time the Labour Government left office — and what has occurred under the present Government.

It is possible that, as a result of yesterday's statement, the number of public sector starts in 1985 will be 36,000, or less. It is interesting to note, too, that there will be fewer starts in the private sector this year than in 1978.

So far, I have dealt with the national position. In Walsall borough no contracts have been entered into for new council house building since 1979. As a result, an increasing number of people there have to wait to be rehoused. In many cases, tenants have to wait for many years before any improvements are made to their pre-war council dwellings.

Nationally the position is appalling. The House should be very concerned about the cuts that are to be made in addition to all the previous cuts. In England, last year, it is estimated that 78,000 households were accepted by local authorities as being homeless. In London, more than 2,000 homeless families were using bed-and-breakfast hotels as temporary accommodation last summer. The cost of such temporary accommodation in London alone is estimated at £12 million a year.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): What about shortholds?

Mr. Winnick: Instead of shouting from a sedentary position, the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) should bear the facts in mind. That money would pay off the loan charges of 3,000 rented homes costing £30,000 each.

Mr. Marlow rose—

Mr. Winnick: I shall not give way, because of time.

There are other categories of people about whom we should be deeply concerned. There is the plight of the young, young marrieds. If young couples cannot obtain a mortgage and if the local authority is unable to rehouse them, they will probably not have adequate accommodation. There may be nowhere for them to live. That appalling situation is one more reason why a proper housing drive should be undertaken.

There are also families with young children in my constituency and, of course, in many other areas, living in high-rise flats, who wait for years on end to be rehoused in rented houses. It is all very well for Ministers to talk about the number of dwellings sold. Almost without exception, those dwellings have been houses, not high-rise flats.

Many homes remain unfit. I have received some figures from Shelter on the subject. The Minister for Housing and Construction should be deeply concerned about the problem. Nearly a million homes are unfit for human habitation. Nearly a million homes lack one or more basic amenities. Nearly 4 million need substantial repairs. The number of homes needing expensive repairs—repairs that will cost more than £2,500—has risen by over 20 per cent. in five years. The situation, therefore, is extremely serious.

Mr. Hardy: My hon. Friend is presenting a most realistic appraisal of the situation. However, he has not mentioned the fact that last year we cleared only 0·1 per cent. of the housing stock. As the houses now being built in the private sector will not last for a thousand years, we are storing up trouble for the future.

Mr. Winnick: I take my hon. Friend's point.

I do not blame the Minister for Housing and Construction. The real culprit is the Chancellor of the Exchequer. However, it was leaked to the press, before the autumn statement was made, that if there was to be a cut of £600 million, the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) intended to resign. The story was never denied. It appears that the cut is to amount to over £400 million. The hon. Gentleman should remember the stories that appeared in the press, which I took to be true. As a housing Minister, he has duties and responsibilities. I certainly do not see how he can carry out his duties after the statement made yesterday by the Secretary of State.

Like all my hon. Friends, and many Conservative Members as well, I find it difficult to understand how when so many people are desperately in need of new accommodation or repairs to their homes, nearly 25 per cent. of building workers can be on the dole. What justification can there be for allowing so many people to remain on the dole when they could be building and improving the homes so urgently needed for our people?

We must always bear in mind how much money is paid out in total in unemployment and supplementary benefit to people in the dole queues. How can the Government be serious about trying to reduce unemployment when, as a result of yesterday's statement, so many more building workers will join the dole queue during 1985?

I find it difficult to envisage how historians in future will write about these days. How will they explain the present Government's refusal to allow local authorities to spend their own capital receipts—not borrowed money—on providing the dwellings that are needed, while at the same time the Government are spending overall such large sums on supplementary and unemployment benefit? It is no wonder that, when the Secretary of State made his statement yesterday, hardly any Conservative Members defended the Government's position. At most, two Conservative Members did so, including the hon. Member for Northampton, North.

Conservative Members who refuse today to support what is, in essence, a Treasury diktat to the Secretary of State for the Environment will be not only doing a service to the homeless and to others in acute housing need, but showing that, unlike the Secretary of State, they cannot vote for an economic absurdity. I hope that a sufficient number of Conservative Members will demonstrate their independence as Back Benchers by refusing to support measures that can only harm the country and substantially increase unemployment.

5.38 pm

Mr. Peter Hubbard-Miles (Bridgend): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling an hon. Member who represents a Welsh constituency. Local government in Wales might have something to teach English local authorities. Anyone who has been involved in local government for some time must have concluded that the breakneck acceleration in local government spending during the 1960s and 1970s could not have continued indefinitely. Most of the years that I have spent in local government have been punctuated by dire warnings from Ministers in successive Governments. Those warnings started with our being told that the party was over.

I have served on a large county council in Wales and am a member of a Welsh district council. I am surprised to be taking part in a debate on an Opposition motion that criticises the Government for cuts in capital expenditure. If any party has acquired expertise in the use of the knife, it is the Labour party. It has been responsible for much heavier cuts in local government capital expenditure than the present Government.

If there were any Welsh Labour Members present, I should not apologise for reminding them of when the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) trekked around housing authorities in Wales boasting of the Labour Government's intention to expand the capital investment programme. He urged us to spend, spend, spend. He cheerily waved as he told us to go out and try to break the bank. Only a few short weeks later we received the bad news that the bank was broke. We then received the worse news that no houses had been built and that the programme had been scrapped.

In July 1976 the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) announced cuts of £1·012 million, four fifths of which was in capital spending, and which the Treasury admitted cost 150,000 jobs. Further cuts of £800 million in 1977-78 and £1·5 million in 1978-79, about half of which were in capital spending, caused the loss of another 140,000 jobs.

In 1973-74, Welsh capital spending was 42 per cent. of revenue spending but in 1978-79, when Labour was in office, it had been reduced to 18 per cent. of revenue spending. So much for the bleatings of Opposition Members about the need for more capital expenditure. They support policies that produce a level of revenue spending that precludes any increase in capital spending. In Wales, capital spending has increased from £226 million in 1978-79 to £388·5 million——

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): Give the figures in real terms.

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: The hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) was in the council chamber when the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney announced his expansion of capital spending. He was the first to welcome that tremendous expansion in housing investment but had to apologise later when the programme was scrapped.

Mr. Powell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: I cannot give way because time is short.

Mr. Powell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: No. I shall consider a local authority that the hon. Member for Ogmore knows well——

Mr. Powell: Give way, then.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Hubbard-Miles) is clearly not giving way.

Mr. Powell: But he has mentioned me.

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: The local authority of which the hon. Member for Ogmore was a member for a time increased its capital expenditure——

Mr. Powell: But how many more homeless people are there in Ogmore now?

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: I shall answer that question later.

In 1982-83, Ogmore borough council's capital expenditure was £12 million. In 1983-84, it was £17 million—an increase of 40 per cent. I am sure that Opposition Members will say that that is a great thing and that the authority is providing services. However, not one penny of that increase was spent on housing. The Labour party in the local authority which the hon. Member for Ogmore knows so well got its priorities right, like all other Labour-controlled authorities in south Wales, and spent the increase on new council offices and leisure centres. So much for the Labour party's caring about homeless people in south Wales. The Ogmore council's projected spend for next year is £21 million—a further increase of 24 per cent. Only a fraction of it is to go into housing.

I know that some of my right hon. and hon. Friends have a great deal of sympathy with Conservatives in south Wales. They recognise that we have to live with extravagant and profligate councils that are so heavily Labour-controlled. If I were to tell ratepayers in my constituency that the local authority was prudent and budgeted wisely, they would laugh in my face. They believe the local authority to be profligate.

Mr. Powell: They will be laughing in the hon. Gentleman's face at the next general election.

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: I did not lose my community council seat and I was not defeated in the borough elections. The hon. Member for Ogmore will remember those elections. Although ratepayers think that local authorities in my area are profligate, if Welsh local authorities had increased their current expenditure last year in line with their English counterparts, they would have spent £66 million more — equivalent to an additional rate burden of 24p in the pound.

As a result of Welsh local authorities' comparatively wise budgeting, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has been able to release resources for a wide range of capital schemes. For 1984-85, Government expenditure plans amount to £84 per head—45 per cent. above the equivalent figure for England. The lesson from Wales to English local authorities is that English authorities have eaten their seed corn and have too often followed high-spending, extreme and extravagant Socialist priorities. I welcome the fact that, as a result of overall restraint by Welsh local authorities on public expenditure, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has been able to announce a more flexible and generous capital settlement this year. I also welcome what, for me, is one of the most important aspects of the English and Welsh proposals—the fact that those proposals build much more flexibility into the capital control system.

The Labour Government and the present Government have overspent and underspent. As a result they have had to take midstream corrective measures. Both Governments have witnessed resources being wasted through underspending — there was an £85 million underspend in housing in the two years 1981-83 — and both Governments have had to act because overspending was likely to send the economy out of control.

The advantage of the present proposals is that they afford longer lead times for the planning of capital expenditure by local authorities; a higher proportion of underspend can now be carried forward into the following year; and a modest amount of overspending will not upset the programme. This is important because there are bound to be occasions when vital and unforeseen projects will have to be carried out when the local authority will find that it has already committed its total capital allocation. If the need for mid-term intervention can be eliminated, that will be a great step forward. It will avoid the need for local authorities to commit the bulk of their capital allocation as early as possible in the financial year, thereby avoiding any possibility of restraints midstream. That is what presently happens.

My own local authority, in the first three months of the year, contractually committed £11 million out of its total capital allocation of £17 million. That produces a distorted picture of the pattern of capital spending.

It has been argued that the reduction in the prescribed proportion of capital receipts in England to 20 per cent. will affect the number of council house sales, but Wales has lived with a figure of 25 per cent. for a long time. That is now to be reduced to 15 per cent., but Wales has sold a larger proportion of its housing stock than England.

The Labour party's record on capital housing in Wales is dismal. The protestations of Labour Members about the reduction in the prescribed proportion is hypocritical, because as my right hon. Friend said, if they had their way there would be no capital receipts. If only for those two reasons, I intend to support the Government tonight.

5.52 pm

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I am glad to have this opportunity of following the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Hubbard-Miles), if only to apologise to the people of Wales for the fact that some Welsh Conservative Members, who are so totally uncritical of what the Government have proposed, are capable of making crawling, uncritical speeches such as the one we have just heard. We did not hear a word from the hon. Gentleman about the rights of Welsh local authorities to determine what to do with their resources. I wonder what his friends on the councils that he used to mix with will think about that.

The hon. Gentleman merely looked backwards to what happened in the 1970s. It was wrong then, and it is wrong now, and two wrongs do not make a right. He criticised profligate councils in his own area for what they have done in the past and more recently, but the answer should remain in the hands of the local electorate who have the right to vote such authorities in or out of office. That is what democracy is about. It is no use the hon. Gentleman pouring out his venom towards those councils simply because the Conservative party failed to take control of the local authority in his area.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn) rose——

Mr. Wigley: I shall not give way, just as the hon. Member for Bridgend did not give way, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to catch the eye of the Chair.

Yesterday, when the Secretary of State for Wales made his announcement, I had the opportunity to draw to the attention of the House the reduction in capital expenditure in Wales since 1979. The papers that have been supplied to the House show that capital expenditure in Wales for the next three years will be £349 million, £351 million and £345 million respectively—about £1 billion over three years, or an average of £330 million per annum — compared with £440 million per annum from 1979 to 1984. That is a reduction in capital expenditure which Wales can ill afford.

I realise that part of the problem arises from the success of the Government's repair and renovation policy, which presented opportunities for the people of Wales, whose housing stock is appreciably worse than the average housing stock in the United Kingdom as a whole. We have been told that 1 million houses are substandard in Britain as a whole. In Wales, the figure is almost 100,000.

Therefore, 5 per cent. of the population has 10 per cent. of the problem, and the aging housing stock in Wales reflects the old industrial patterns of many south Wales areas.

Out of that repair and renovation policy came a tremendous demand for money. I concede that the grants available were extremely attractive. The tragedy was that having given this promise before the general election in 1983, the Government subsequently failed to make the money available, and thousands of people in Wales who expected to carry out renovation programmes have been unable to do so. Some have been caught in the impossible position of having to wait six, seven or eight years before the money will be available.

The small Dwyfor district council area had asked for £1·25 million capital, but is to get only £605,000 for housing. Within the £1·25 million for which it asked, £500,000 was to deal with 130 applicants for repair grants, even though it received a total of 710 applications. Although only a small fraction of the number of applicants would have been catered for, the Government have given half what the council asked for. It will therefore be virtually impossible for any of those 710 people to be paid. Even though they have a right to expect it, hardly any of them will receive the money next year. That is the net effect on the ground of the policy which the Government are pursuing.

Dwyfor also has a contractual obligation for a refuse disposal unit, but it will be extremely difficult to meet that commitment, given the settlement that has just been announced.

There is a similar pattern in the Arfon borough council area. Even though 1,100 people had a legitimate and legal right to a repair grant, only 250 at most will be dealt with next year. The other 850 will have to wait for a second or third year until the grants are paid. That just is not good enough.

In fact, money is available. As the Secretary of State for Wales said last year, when speaking about capital allocations for 1984-85:

"Local authorities can, of course, augment the spending power of those allocations by the use of capital receipts".

He made that promise to Parliament, yet he has now gone back on it. The right hon. Gentleman is in breach of promise, and as a result local authorities which took him at his word have been caught with the responsibilities but without the resources to meet them. Indeed, capital resources for local authorities are reaching the same state as post-war credits—after the depression is over, those resources will be unfrozen and local authorities may have a hope of doing something with them.

The first issue at stake is the freedom of local authorities to use money which they rightly thought would be theirs, and which the Secretary of State told them would be theirs to spend. That will now be cut to the bare bone. A couple of hundred million pounds will be held up which could be pumped into the economy to meet the cost of housing, education and the other capital projects in Wales.

Secondly, there is the effect that this announcement will have on the thousands of people who need to have this work done, not to mention the effect it will have on the 40,000 building employees at present out of work. They could have looked to the Government for the money to be used to alleviate the social problems facing many families and the unemployment problems now facing building workers. Many small building companies will now go bankrupt because of the drying up of funds from the Government's capital programme.

The third issue is the effect on the economy. It appears that the Government think that this is necessary in the context of the PSBR, but we are really seeing money taken from the private sector as a result of the sale of council houses. We are debating today a necessary corollary of the programme of selling council houses. The Government did not envisage that by selling council houses they would be taking millions of pounds out of the private sector to pay for them. The assets remain, but they have been transferred from the public to the private sector. The money has gone the other way. Capital resources are now at the disposal of local authorities, which could use that money to build other capital resources for the community. The balance would then be the same.

Approximately the same proportion of money's-worth of capital resources would be in the public sector as in the private sector. However, less money is available in the private sector. Some private money has been dried up by the transfer to the public sector for the purchase of council houses. The point that the Government do not like is that there is less money in the private sector. It does not make any difference to the public sector borrowing requirement. It is as broad as it is long. However, the consequence of the policy of selling council houses on the availability of finance in the private sector is hitting the Government. Instead of sticking to dogma, they ought to release this money and get it to work for both economic reasons—employment—and social reasons—housing.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): I have a suspicion, following the speech of the hon. Member for Caernarfon, (Mr. Wigley), that the Treasury is rubbing its hands with glee. Far from not recognising what was likely to happen, I feel sure that it felt unhappy in 1980 when local authorities were given greater freedom over the use of their capital receipts. The Treasury felt that to give such freedom to local authorities would create problems. The success of the policy of selling council houses in particular — most of the £5 billion came from council house receipts — is now a cause of embarrassment. I fail to understand, however, why we are raising the matter on a hypothetical overspend for 1985-86. At times we have encouraged more spending. Why should we antagonise yet again our friends in the local authorities? They are upset because it was part of the deal to give them greater freedom on the capital side when we imposed tighter restrictions on the current side. It was argued that we had to tighten up much more on current account as a result of the passing of the 1980 Act.

What is happening to housing? The figures are depressing. There is a 23 per cent. reduction on the same quarter last year on the public sector housing side and an 8 per cent. reduction on the same quarter last year on the private side. That would be understandable and acceptable if there were a commensurate increase for home improvements, the policy adopted by several of my right hon. Friends. They accepted a reduction in new building because of the massive increase in home improvements. There was a fourfold increase in home improvement grants during the first four years of this Government. They have been reduced from 90 to 75 per cent. The rate of home improvement grants is slowing down. At the same time, there is a slowing down of new building. Consequently, there is a dampening of economic activity in housing. My right hon. Friend's approach will psychologically dampen down prospects even further.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Will the hon. Member therefore support a move requiring local authorities to stop selling council houses because this will only lead in the future to greater embarrassment?

Dr. Hampson: No, quite the contrary. I should like there to be greater freedom within ceilings for local authorities to use their assets as they wish. The Secretary of State for the Environment deserves a great deal of praise —I am glad that he is here to hear me say this—for the way in which he defended the housing investment programme. However, there is a certain irony about the fact that although we refer to the housing investment allocation, it is not an allocation of cash but an authorisation to borrow. The permission to borrow is held up while at the same time local authorities are restricted in their freedom to use the cash which is in their hands. That distortion is even more acute when that cash, put on deposit, generates revenue. It results in interest charges, which provides them with more revenue to spend upon current account. Minister after Minister has said that most of all we have to get to grips with the current expenditure of local authorities. There was a graph which showed current account spiralling out of control, with capital account being crucified and falling away rapidly. What is the sense of our present approach when we ought to be encouraging the use of cash assets and controlling the current account of local authorities?

The first-class speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) put superbly the Treasury case for job creation. However, is the fact that these assets are available for private companies to draw on and hence, theoretically, to create jobs, the most effective way in the real world of creating jobs as a matter of urgency? Or is it not the case that if the same money were allocated to private companies for the construction of houses and for home improvements it would create jobs immediately? The person who carried out my home alterations told me that every time he is given a contract to modernise bathrooms in council houses which were built in the 1930s he hires at least 12 to 20 extra unskilled people, in a pocket of unemployment, in order to fulfil those contracts. This money is creating jobs, but which is the right way to create them? This casts real doubt upon the PESC theology relating to what is public expenditure over that period. My right hon. Friend has not yet convinced me that his proposals are worthy of support.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): Conservative Members have given very little encouragement to the districts and metropolitan areas where the hurt is felt most. Yesterday's statement by the Secretary of State, and today's contribution, leave no doubt about what is in the mind of the Government and the effect that it will have upon those who want new housing, particularly in the rented sector, and its effect upon improvement grants. There is also the question of the capitalisation of repairs and the infrastructure. The claim made by the Secretary of State will affect the destinies of many people. The consequences of the Secretary of State's actions will shatter the hopes of those who want rented accommodation. His statement will add further to the despair of those who want grants from local authorities for improvements and repairs to property. It is a further blow to the construction industry. Both the public and the private sectors have appealed to the Government for a capital injection into the construction industry.

Minutes before the statement was made yesterday, a meeting was held between the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir George Young), and the Institute of Maintenance and Building Management, at which the members of the institute appealed to the Minister to give special consideration to the construction industry because of the effects that the statement will have on the industry and because the restrictions applied by the Government will reduce still further the low level of investment in both the public and private sectors of the industry.

Conservative Members have referred to partnership agreements. They have been tried, but no real help is given to existing partnership agreements. The training needs of the industry have to be considered. The industry has been decimated because it is denied the required capital expenditure. If there is no training, the practical, experienced people who are required to make sure that the industry can continue to function effectively will not be available. That is because of the way in which the Government have been attacking the construction industry. Conservative Members have claimed that this is the first cut in the capital programme, but I remind the House that there have been capital and revenue cuts in local government for many years under this Government. The latest cut is a further blow to democracy in local government.

The Secretary of State said that there had been a 4 per cent. growth in the building industry in the past year. But a 4 per cent. growth from a low base means little, and that is how the captains and workers in the industry view the Secretary of State's statement. Unless the Government help the industry, there will be redundancies and more unemployment.

Many local authorities, including the two in my constituency, have had to stop providing improvement grants—only grants for the bare necessities are allowed —because of reductions in their HIPs. The Secretary of State's statement means that there is no hope for people who want improvement grants.

I served on the Wakefield council for many years and I know that council house improvements in that area have ceased because of expenditure cuts. About 5,000 houses built immediately after the war have had no improvements made to them. Tenants have demanded that their houses, which are 35 or 40 years old, should be brought up to modern standards. The Secretary of State's statement gives them no hope. In Wakefield, 4,000 old-age pensioners—including 518 over the age of 75—are on the waiting list. They have no hope of being housed.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): I understand why my hon. Friend is concentrating on the problems of improving homes, but many people do not have a home at all. During the debate on homeless persons which I initiated on Friday, the Minister for Housing and Construction, in a sympathetic and understanding speech, said:

"It is up to local authorities, first, to discharge their statutory duty and, secondly, to determine their own priorities after we have made our HIP allocations. No one disagrees with the hon. Gentleman when he says that the resources available for housing are a material factor."—[Official Report, 14 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 1337-8.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a speech.

Mr. Boyes: No. I have finished. Is not this——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. O'Brien: I agree with some of the points made by my hon. Friend.

The Leeds district council applied for £66 million to cover its housing needs for the coming year. It is to receive only about £28 million, which means that there will be no new starts in the city of Leeds in the next financial year. There is a demand for more investment and we must wonder what will happen under the Housing Defects Act 1984. No one knows what effect the Secretary of State's statement will have on that Act. I hope that the Minister for Housing and Construction will give us some information on that.

Will the Minister also explain what will happen to capital receipts from land? Will there be no interference with those receipts? Will that money be available to local authorities or will it come under the whiplash of the attack on freedom and democratic procedures in local government?

6.15 pm

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): A few facts: capital allocations this year, on the same basis as last year, after London Regional Transport has been stripped out, go down from £4,200 million to £4,000 million—not a great difference. Education, despite falling rolls, will have the same level of expenditure allocated. Transport and roads will have an increased level of expenditure. Personal social services will come back a bit, but only to reflect the actual level of expenditure on those services.

There are only two significant changes. One is that the Government have devised a strategy for keeping within limits that have been agreed, but not met in the past, and the other is that local authority expenditure on housing will be reduced against last year by about £200 million.

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Marlow: No. There is no time.

Local authority expenditure on housing divides, as everyone knows, between an authority's expenditure on its own resources and expenditure on grants. The House was moist yesterday with the weeping of the Opposition over grants. Hon. Members would hardly think that in the last year of the Labour Government housing grants amounted to less than £100 million, whereas in the last full year of this Government they were £700 million.

After the orchestrated cacophony of misinformation from the Opposition Front Bench yesterday, many people would not have realised that those without basic amenities in their houses are still entitled to statutory grants. Mandatory awards remain mandatory.

To the extent that discretionary grants are being reduced, if the Opposition are concerned to provide cash for the middle classes to carry out improvements to their homes—which they would probably have carried out on their own account anyway—with the taxes of the lower paid, we shall be interested to hear that in the winding up speech from the Opposition Front Bench.

I must say to my hon. Friends that all that is happening is that cuts will be made in local authority housing programmes—the building of council houses. I do not know about my hon. Friends, but I believe that we were not sent here massively to increase the number of council houses. We are here to increase private housing. If my hon. Friends are concerned about it, let them go to other countries in Europe where there are fewer council houses and more private sector rented accommodation. Are the slums worse there? Is homelessness worse there? Is the standard of housing worse there? Do we want more council houses or do we want more private accommodation?

Look at the record of local authority housing. Look at the massive mismanagement that has taken place in some areas. Who built the tower blocks that are causing us problems now—the private sector or the public sector? Who uprooted communities and built slums in their place—the private sector or the public sector?

Let us have a quick glimpse at some of the more infamous Left-wing local authorities and see how they have dealt with their housing assets and with the people who live in their council houses. For example, 105,000 local authority homes are currently vacant. In Hackney, one council house in 14 is empty; In Liverpool, 6,500 are vacant. In the Socialist republics, vacancy rates—wastage—are three times the national average and three times as high as they need to be.

Shirts were torn on the Opposition side on behalf of the homeless yesterday. Hypocrisy! The Floor was overflowing with Socialist crocodile tears about homelessness. Why is it that Labour authorities predominate on the list of housing shame? Why are there between 700,000 and 1 million houses vacant at the moment? Is it not because they have been blighted from use by Socialist threats of retribution against the private sector? Why are Labour Members holding the sword of Damocles over the shorthold provisions which would otherwise provide housing for many of the homeless?

Time is short, so I have just one plea to make to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Some houses have been transferred from the public sector for privatisation and improvement. Privatisation is so successful in many areas of the economy—let us get hold of some of these little Moscows and pass them on to people who know how to manage them. Let us privatise more houses and cut the public cost of housing.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): As the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) has illustrated, the debate has been both contentious and lively. Indeed, it has been a Back Benchers' debate. The pity of it is that many hon. Members sought to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, but were prevented from speaking by the pressures of time.

In his opening speech, the Secretary of State undoubtedly nailed his colours of Thatcherism to the mast. But I believe that many hon. Members on both sides of the House rejected that academic defence. Many of us thought that we saw the very bankruptcy of the Government's policy throughout his speech, just as we saw it yesterday when he delivered his statement. The response of hon.

[Mr. Barry Jones]

Members on both sides of the House demonstrated that. After a searching examination by hon. Members from all parties, there was precious little support for the principles that the right hon. Gentleman had attempted to expound from the House.

The right hon. Gentleman's speech was replete with many revealing phrases, such as "public expenditure plans", "the overspend", "the contingency reserve", "the PSBR", "the cash limit" and "public sector resources". It was the dry as dust, unfeeling, intellectual approach of the Treasury Minister in exile. But we would say that housing is about people, and that is what was missing from the right hon. Gentleman's speech. Indeed, it was a speech made with the Chancellor of the Exchequer at his side, looking for all the world like a veritable minder. Many of us, particularly in the Opposition, believe that yesterday's statements, which have scandalised opinion within and without the House, were effectively constructed inside the Treasury. Indeed, housing Ministers seem to be the prisoners of the Treasury.

From the point of view of statecraft and of good, just government, the state and the Government should not pass up the chance to create good housing. The aim should surely be to lessen the divide between the haves and the have nots, and between those in good and those in wretched housing. If Cabinet Ministers will not tackle the rotten housing in our great cities, but instead seek to strangle the efforts of housing authorities to enhance the lives of the underprivileged, the badly housed and the unwaged, they are accomplices to the storing up of immense social and economic problems for future Governments.

I shall briefly outline some of the problems that we face in Wales. They are desperate problems, which it will take a long time to put right, even if we were in the ideal situation of having all the resources that we asked for. The Welsh housing problem is both unique and extremely worrying. It is worrying not only to those forced to live in conditions of increasing squalor but also to the various sectors of the Welsh housing industry which view the next 20 years with profound trepidation. They believe—as I do — that unless a properly planned, long-term programme of housing investment is launched very soon, we shall need to undertake massive slum clearance schemes by the end of the century.

The problem is as simple as it is serious. We have a vast stock—much larger than the average—of older houses that are now in need of urgent repair. About 39 per cent. of our total housing stock was built before 1919, compared with a figure of 29 per cent. for Britain as a whole. Indeed, 9 per cent. of Welsh homes are described as chronically unfit and another 18 per cent. need immediate renovation work. Thus we say that the Government have failed to tackle the housing crisis effectively.

I beg the Government to reconsider their inflexible approach. We have major human, social and economic problems in our valleys and in the great seaboard of towns of Swansea, Cardiff and Newport. In our valleys, one in five men are jobless. In south-east Wales health problems abound and are well above the average. As hon. Members will concede, the environment is frequently most unsatisfactory—to put it mildly. Our transport facilities are poor. In effect, the debate must be about the quality of life of those who live in the valleys of south-east Wales.

We say that it is unjust of the Government to deny those communities the prospect of a better life. Good housing is needed for that better life but it is not promised by the Government's promises as enunciated today. Housing allocations, and allocations for all other services, have in Wales taken a reduction in real terms of more than £60 million. The Welsh districts now claim an effective reduction of nearly one third in capital housing expenditure over the past two years. The reduced prescribed proportions of housing capital receipts and of other capital receipts have reduced those districts' spending power next year by £50 million at a stroke.

I say to the Secretary of State for Wales that a veritable mountain of sales receipts is staring him in the face. He should use it. He should not forget that, under his regime, a housing crisis of mammoth proportions has arisen. That crisis has paralleled a mass unemployment crisis, to which he has also contributed. We say that he has neglected the social and economic needs of the Welsh people as much as he has attacked and restricted the freedoms of local government.

Despite the Secretary of State's claims, at current rates of allowance for capital expenditure, it is estimated that it will take 40 years to improve the housing stock of the Cynon valley. That is an example of how the right hon. Gentleman has starved housing in Wales. I say to Conservative Back Benchers that Ministers clearly have not moved an inch from yesterday's much-condemned statements. Conservative Members have no doubt listened hard to find reasons for supporting the Government tonight, but if they objected yesterday to the Government's policy, they will surely object to it tonight. They should remember the many homeless, the unemployed building and construction workers, the many tenants, and particularly — perhaps from their point of view — the hard-hit owner-occupiers, who should be given grounds for hope.

For those reasons, I ask hon. Members to support us in the Lobby.

6.29 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): We are being asked to adjourn the House and lose the business. I can confirm to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon) that there will be an opportunity in the new year to vote on the orders relating to these capital expenditure matters.

Three main points of view have been represented in the debate. There is the point of view of those on the Opposition Benches who do not believe in control of public expenditure and whose own reckless pursuit of that principle led them to the IMF and the largest cutback in capital spending that Britain has ever seen. For the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) to talk about stop-go policies against that background was a pretty good impertinence.

Mr. Edwards: We heard a great deal——

Dr. Cunningham rose——

Mr. Edwards: I am going to reply to the debate.

Dr. Cunningham rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that we shall not have a repetition of what happened earlier this afternoon.

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones)——

Dr. Cunningham rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside and others complained about the condition of the housing stock, but——

Mr. Ray Powell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you rule whether it is in order for a Minister, replying to a debate, to mention any Front Bench spokesman and not give way to that hon. Member?

Mr. Speaker: Order. We had all this earlier this afternoon. The House well knows the convention. If the Secretary of State or any other hon. Member does not give way that is entirely a matter for him.

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside and others complained about the condition of the housing stock. But we know that Labour councils have created some of the worst housing slums. My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Hubbard-Miles) reminded us that they had done nothing to improve their housing stock. The Government have made a concerted and determined effort to improve that stock. The latest example of that is the scheme for priority estates, which have such importance in some of our inner cities. The Opposition demand an unlimited right to spend accumulated receipts, yet they fought tooth and nail to prevent the sales that produced those receipts.

The second point of view in the debate is that of those of my hon. Friends who believe that Government policies to control spending should be relaxed, at least to the extent of increasing capital expenditure. But even they recognise that the totality of expenditure must be controlled and preferably matched by the control or reduction of current spending. The CBI was called in aid yesterday to support capital spending. It has specifically drawn attention to the need to cut current spending in order to make that possible.

The third point of view that has emerged from the debate is provided by those who, like my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe, believe that the Government's strategy of tight control of public spending on which we were elected is vital if we are to keep interest rates and taxes down and stimulate the industrial investment that alone will create the additional social resources that we all want. Some of them believe profoundly in that strategy but are understandably concerned, perhaps because we have not explained clearly enough, about why the overhang of housing receipts threatens that strategy. Others perhaps recognise that threat but are concerned about our relationship with local government

I want to deal with those understandable concerns, but I must first make it clear that what we did yesterday when we made the statements was not introduce a new policy; nor introduce a new round of cuts. We are concerned to deliver the plans that we announced to the House in the public expenditure White Paper which the House subsequently approved by the vote on 6 December. I shall return in a moment to the inherent threat to our public expenditure plans.

First, I want to say a word about one thing on which there is probably agreement on both sides of the House. It was raised in the debate by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hexham who spoke of the inadequacies, under successive Governments, of the long-term arrangements for capital planning by local authorities. It is undoubtedly true. We have had underspend under both Labour and Conservative Governments. We were reminded by my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend that in an earlier age the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) urged us to spend, spend, spend, and break the bank. He did, and the Labour party called in the IMF and had a full-scale moratorium.

We had our own problem of underspend in the early 1980s and then we urged local authorities to spend. When they did it was on a scale that threatened our public expenditure control programme. It is because of those inadequacies——

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Edwards: I want to deal in detail with the point.

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Edwards: It was because of those inadequacies——

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Edwards: —that, in the summer, I launched consultations with Welsh local authorities and my right hon. Friend is launching parallel discussions with local government. That is why I announced yesterday that we have begun to move towards a system that gives greater stability and assurance, flexibility around the cash limit, enables us to carry forward a reasonable level of underspend, and accepts that a comparable level of overspend should not lead to mid-term intervention or moratorium. That, combined with increasingly firm forward indications, will enable local authorities to plan better for the future.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Edwards: Some hon. Members have implied that local authorities have been prevented from making use of the assets that have been released from the sale of houses. But over the past three years a large proportion of new housing receipts were built into the housing allocations in order to encourage local authorities to use them, and, in addition, the authorities were free to use the prescribed proportions. If, in practice, those built-in receipts had been used simply to finance house building instead of, for example, for reducing debt, we might not have the threat to the cash limit that we now have. The fact is that up-to-date housing allocations have carried 100 per cent. borrowing approval and the availability of that has enabled local authorities to accumulate receipts on a massive scale. Those receipts provide a large potential overspend on the cash limit, and, indeed, enabled local authorities in effect to spend their resources twice over.

The potential overspend amounts to hundreds of millions of pounds and it comes on top of a current expenditure overspend. All the receipts have flooded in over two or three years and all that the Government are urging is that local authorities should spend that expenditure over a somewhat longer period——

Mr. Simon Hughes rose——

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Edwards: —and not to spend it all at once.

[Mr. Edwards]

My hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Irving), in an intervention, said that authorities were not being allowed to spend their receipts. They are being spent. They are being used to enhance spending over the net amounts that we could otherwise afford. They are making an important contribution to the spending power that is available.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) suggested that we had cut back sharply in Wales the spending plans over the next three years compared with the previous six years. The hon. Gentleman got his maths wrong. He calculated it on five years when the comparison was with six years.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak) rose——

Mr. Barry Jones rose——

Mr. Simon Hughes rose——

Mr. Edwards: I wish to answer the points raised in the debate. I hope that hon. Gentlemen will forgive me——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Barry Jones.

Mr. Jones: Why does the right hon. Gentleman not tell the House that, as a Housing Minister, he has the worst record of any Welsh Office Minister? Is it not a fact that last year his starts record was a pathetic 1,500 houses?

Mr. Edwards: It is characteristic of the hon. Gentleman to believe that the only contribution to housing should come from the local authority sector. He has not referred to the massive increase in investment that is going on in the private sector.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Jones rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is little time left. The House wishes to hear what the Secretary of State has to say.

Mr. Jones rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Edwards.

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman also forgets the Government's massive increase in expenditure on housing improvements that the Labour Government totally neglected.

Mr. Jones rose——

Mr. Edwards: The Labour Government spent £90 million a year. We spent — [Interruption.] The hypocrisy of the hon. Gentleman——

Mr. Jones rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is nearly the Christmas holidays. Can we proceed in peace?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman is behaving like a Christmas clown. I remind my hon. Friends, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe did, that our success in keeping the overall control of public spending is the major element in the rising industrial investment that is taking place. Interest rates are lower than they would otherwise be, despite the pressures on sterling, the effect of a strong dollar, the mining strike and movements in oil prices.

Private sector building is especially sensitive to movements in interest rates. Manufacturing industry is investing now because it has confidence in our policies. In sharp contrast to the humiliation suffered by the Labour Chancellor and Prime Minister, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is setting out to two major international meetings with the confidence of investment, the markets and other world leaders behind her. They know that the Government mean what they say when they set about a policy, and that they will maintain it. The House by its vote will wish to maintain that confidence.

Question put, That this House do now adjourn:—

Adjournment (Christmas)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That this House at its rising on Friday 21 December do adjourn till Wednesday 9 January.—[Mr. Major.]

6.59 pm

Mr. John Silkin (Lewisham, Deptford): Most hon. Members will think that this Christmas recess is deserved and, indeed, overdue. Their complaint might be that the period of the recess is too short rather than too long. With great respect to those hon. Members who may believe that they have national or international points to raise, in an extremity the House can always be recalled. What cannot be done, however, is to give a feeling of necessity to the vital interests of our constituents.

I have such a constituent, who is liable to be deported immediately after Christmas. I must pay a qualified tribute to the Minister of State, Home Office, and I have given him notice that I was going to try to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, in this debate. I asked him on 30 November to delay deporting the lady at least until after Christmas, so that she can spend Christmas with her family. This he has done, but the fact remains that he notified me and her only yesterday. One can imagine the agony through which she and her family have gone during the period until yesterday, and through which they will go between now and her almost certain date of deportation early in the New year.

The facts of the case are alarming, and I do not believe that they will be contested by anyone. The lady's name is Ayse Halil and she has three children. The first is a boy, Sebah, who is aged 11 and is a British citizen. He was born in England and has always lived here. The second boy, Sarhan, is aged seven and is also a British citizen. The third, a girl, was born in Cyprus three years ago. The two elder children attend the local primary school, Myatt Garden school, where they are so popular that it is not difficult on any day to gather together many children and parents to see what can be done to help the lady who is being deported. That is a reflection of the popularity of the children and of the family in the locality.

Here we come to an interesting point. The grandparents have lived in Britain since 1971, and Ayse's father served with the British Army for 25 years before that time. He came here as a British citizen in 1971, and his son—Ayse's brother—is also a British citizen who lives here. If Ayse is deported, her elder son, who has lived here all his life, will either have to be left behind or must accompany his mother to the Turkish part of Cyprus, where he must speak a language that he does not understand—none of the children speaks Turkish—and must remain in what is effectively a foreign country for as long as it may be his fate to live there.

I do not contest the Minister's suggestion — the mother does—that she entered Britain by deception. I say only that she did so in 1971, when the rest of the family was already here. Had the parents known what to do, their daughter as well as their son would have had British nationality. But her father, who served for so long in the British Army, did not know what to do, so she did not acquire British nationality. She came here in 1971, she was regarded as an illegal immigrant and after a considerable period she was deported.

However, she returned again because her two older children were here. She is a very dutiful daughter and sister and a loving mother. She came back to be with her whole family. The extended family of grandparents, parents and children is typical of the way in which she grew up, and it sometimes still exists in the villages of our country. It was not unnatural that she should return, particularly as her relationship with her husband had undergone a difficult phase, and she is now pursuing an action for divorce.

The Minister, in such circumstances, can do one of two things. First, he can exercise compassion; I give him credit for some compassion because he has at least allowed her to stay until Christmas. Secondly, he can say that she was wrong in offending against the rules and that therefore she must go, regardless of what may happen to the family, her parents, her brother, herself or her children.

The Minister is basically a compassionate man, but one of the principal ingredients of compassion is not just sympathy with somebody in distress, but imagination. It is the ability to override bureaucracy, which will always, in my experience, tell one why one cannot do something. The Minister can tell the bureaucracy that it has to do something. Here is a family that has settled well into the community and is popular, and which consists of three generations. I believe that somebody who served in the British Army for four or five years is worthy of some support, and somebody who served for 25 years is entitled to even more support by that length of service. However, the Minister does not hold that view.

The Minister makes his point on the issue of the deception—I do not know whether there was one, but if there was, it was understandable. He does not view the matter from a human angle but from a bureaucratic angle. When I pointed out something that his predecessor had said in the debate on the British Nationality Act, the Minister chose to dispute it with me, so it is worth while repeating what was said then. The hon. Gentleman's predecessor said that any child who had been here for 10 years should be regarded as entitled to remain here, whatever the status of the parents. He said:

"We have chosen the tenth birthday as the cut-off point because we would not wish to insist on the deportation of a child born here who had lived here for 10 years. If his parents are here subject to conditions of stay or in breach of the immigration control at the time of birth, 10 years seems to the Government to be a long enough period in which to expect those problems to have been resolved.

Furthermore, the first 10 years of a child's life clearly are the formative years. By the age of 10, we believe, the child's roots could be regarded as being firmly set in this country." — [Official Report, Standing Committee F, 26 November 1981; c. 221.]

There could not be a clearer picture of the oldest child, who is 11.

When I put these various points to the Minister he replied in a long detailed letter. He said:

"Turning now to your specific points, you have suggested Mrs. Halil and her family have a long association with this country. But this is not so. Her father and her paternal grandfather were, like Mrs. Halil herself, born in Cyprus."

I am a little older than the Minister of State, and I can remember that Cyprus has a rather long association with the British Crown, which started in 1878 when Benjamin Disraeli brought back from Berlin peace with honour, and also Cyprus. As a result of that association, a number of people on that island joined the British Army, and I made that point to the Minister. It would seem to me that 25 years is quite a long association, but the Minister is entitled to take a different view.

The letter continues:

"Although her parents were registered as citizens of the United Kingdom and Colonies when she was still a child"— that is worth noting, as well—

"they continued to live in Cyprus for many years indeed, until after Mrs. Halil had grown up and married, and they never sought registration for their children."

I repeat that they did not even know that it was necessary, and why should they? The letter continues:

"Mrs. Halil had not contemplated accompanying her parents when they emigrated, and as on marriage she had ceased to be a dependent daughter, she could not in any case have come with them to this country for settlement."

What was the major crime that this woman committed against the British law, constitution and everything else? It is that her parents did not register her as a citizen of the United Kingdom and Colonies. What a terrible mistake she made when she was about nine or 10. I understand that the Minister of State would wish to punish her for that for the rest of her life.

One of the essential agreements of compassion is imagination. We are dealing with a family which does not speak a word of Turkish, which is useful—the father is well employed — is liked in the community and has settled down well. If the Minister of State gets his way, what will happen? The family will go to Cyprus. The children will be homeless. They will be separated from the rest of the family—from their uncle whom they look on as a second father, and their grandparents—and from their school friends. The Minister of State is condemning them to that.

I leave the House with one last gem in the letter of 6 February 1984 written to me be the Minister of State. It deserves to be put on the desk of every civil servant in Britain. I pointed out that the lady was being divorced and that I was worried about the children's fate. The Minister replied:

"I am not satisfied that her circumstances in Cyprus would be markedly worse than those of any other divorcee with young children."

Cyprus is, however, a foreign land, which is partitioned and speaks a language that the children cannot understand, and the children will be taken from the rest of their family.

7.11 pm

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): I do not believe that the House should adjourn for the Christmas recess without an extensive debate on a subject that is exercising a large number of minds—the BBC licence fee. Although I know that this subject will be debated in another measure——

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Much later.

Sir Dudley Smith: —much later, as my hon. Friend says—it is important that there should be contributions to this discussion.

There is no popular recognition of the need for a substantial increase in the television licence fee. Many people regard it as wrong that, to obtain a television set, one must pay a fee, whether or not one watches BBC programmes. Some people watch the opposition channels far more frequently. I am sure that all hon. Members are worried about the fact that although £60-odd for a licence fee does not matter much to an affluent person, many people on fixed incomes — pensioners and the unemployed—who will not receive any assistance in this respect, will find that amount a severe imposition.

[Sir Dudley Smith]

Over the years, the BBC has made a tremendous contribution in establishing radio and television, but it is not without its faults, some of which have grown up recently. Stories of a prince's ransom paid to some disc jockeys do not go down well, nor do accounts of junkets abroad for executives or stories of a not especially senior official stationed in north America who, if the press is to be believed, has been jetting backwards and forwards on Concorde. Those stories would certainly not go down well with two or three multinationals which, as a mark of stringency, impressed upon their directors and senior executives the fact that they must travel club class, rather than first class, when they travel backwards and forwards across the Atlantic. Even today, there is a newspaper story about a well-known television presenter on breakfast television who is, allegedly, offered the kind of money that one would expect an international footballer to receive. I am not saying that these are vast amounts of money compared with the totality of BBC finances, but it is indicative of an attitude that needs to be changed when dealing with public money.

The BBC should stick to those aspects of television in which it excels. The BBC excels in a number of respects. The BBC pioneered the advance of television, but it has, however, gone into other areas that need to be curbed in view of the request for financial stringency. By and large, breakfast television is a waste. Local radio is often a disaster. This is a highly competitive area, and time and again one learns that BBC local radio is well eclipsed by the commercial opposition.

I believe—this might not go down well with the Opposition—that the BBC might have more friends among Conservative Members and Conservatives outside the House if it were a little less biased. In many instances, it is fairly easy to detect that the BBC is left of centre. [Interruption.] The Opposition may scoff, but, to ascertain the reaction, they should ask the public. Commentators, analysts and presenters with a bias can be clearly perceived to be in the majority, and that is worrying in a democracy in which the BBC is the national broadcasting institution.

I am not suggesting that there is any conspiracy against the Government or the Conservative party. I am suggesting, however, that for years the corporation, perhaps innocently, has been attracting many more people from the Left than is healthy—be they producers, executives or presenters. I am talking not merely about current affairs; it spans the whole spectrum of programmes, including drama.

Above all else, the BBC should be seen to be neutral and even-handed, and most people would expect that of the BBC. The BBC must be properly funded. It is unsatisfactory to the corporation and to the public at large that there should be a special form of taxation to raise the revenue to operate the BBC. That system has applied for a long time. It is understandable in view of the way in which the BBC grew up, but I do not believe that it can hold water today. Although some fee element should be retained, there must, in future, be some element of advertising to provide for the corporation's financing needs.

The BBC, which is so good in many ways—technique and achievement—will not compromise itself by a sensible input of advertising. I am sure that the BBC in its heart of hearts will realise that, and most hon. Members—certainly Conservative Members—would subscribe to that view. Sufficient free advertising occurs on the BBC at present. Books and records are plugged, and during all kinds of discussion programmes there is a free dropping of product names. Once upon a time that was totally prohibited. Today there is advertising all the time. Let the BBC come clean and do that properly and sensibly.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House — I know that this is not entirely his responsibility, but he is a man of enormous influence—will consider seriously a strictly limited increase in the licence fee when we return in the new year and that there will be a genuine move towards some type of limited advertising.

Mr. Michael McGuire (Makerfield): Two matters should be debated before we adjourn for the Christmas recess. The first concerns unemployment. Most hon. Members, and certainly Labour Members, have waited for a long time for a statement that the Government will really tackle the scourge of unemployment. I raised this matter last year on the motion for the Adjournment for the Christmas recess. I said then that Conservative Members want the unemployment level to be reduced substantially. But they have not yet persuaded the Prime Minister and the Cabinet to give sufficient attention to this problem and to have a think tank considering the unemployment problem, which is the scourge of our time. We are simply tinkering with the matter and hoping that something will happen.

We need to have a fundamental look at unemployment. We shall have to redefine what we mean by unemployment. It cannot continue to be a lottery. Last Christmas, I related the story of a young woman who said to me that she had a degree. She had been unemployed for only a short time and had managed to secure a reasonable job. When she went to the social security office for the last time to get her P45, tax forms and other papers in order, the young men and women she had met during the few months that she was unemployed congratulated her enthusiastically and wished her well. They said, "You have a job, and we haven't but we shall remember you with great fondness." The young woman told me that the sad thing was that many of the young men and women, who were as qualified as she was, had not been lucky enough to secure a job. In other words, obtaining a job is a lottery. Some people can obtain jobs, but many suitably qualified people cannot. That is a scandal and a shame.

Whether we accept the massaged figures of about 3·5 million people at present unemployed, or the probably truer figure of 4 million if one includes the number of people who do not bother to register because there is no job available, it is a scandal of the first order that we have not given all our time and attention towards tackling the problem.

The massaged figure of 3·5 million people unemployed is being increased at the rate of about 20,000 a month. The optimistic view is that unemployment will remain at that level; the pessimistic view is that the figure might double or be half as much again and add about a further 375,000 to the number of unemployed. We do not seem to be doing anything about it apart from tinkering a little with job creation. Some attention should have been paid to this problem. The Cabinet should have given its powerful attention to solving the problem.

Other countries are dealing with the problem. West Germany is tackling the problem, and we must. The social fabric of this nation cannot endure if we continue to add to the already far too high total of unemployed. I shudder to think what will happen if we increase the unemployment figure by a further 200,000, 250,000, 350,000 or 400,000 year by year. The Government must make a statement to show that they recognise the scope of the problem and that they are going to do something about it.

The second subject about which I wish to talk is that of people being persuaded to take out guarantee insurance when they buy television sets. They are called extended guarantees and they are for consumer goods—television sets, refrigerators, deep freezes, washers, driers and other such commodities. Many people are persuaded by slick salesmanship and, we must recognise, by the attraction of the security obtained from paying an insurance premium of £30 or £40. They then believe that the television, or whatever, is guaranteed and that maintenance will be free if it needs repairing. They may have to pay a bob or two for one or two small things, but they have a virtual trouble-free guarantee for about five or seven years.

The problem is that many of those guarantees have turned out to be bogus and worthless. It is calculated that 800,000 people have taken out such guarantees. The companies have made rich pickings. When the people have called upon the insurance company they have found that it has gone bust. If one calculates that the companies have to pay some commission to the agents promoting the insurance, if the companies finish up with only half of what the 800,000 people have paid, they will make a great deal of money.

I believe that we are to have an insolvency Bill in the new year. There was an article in one of the Sunday newspapers about it, and those who have considered the matter do not think the Bill will deal with the problem that I have described.

Christmas is probably one of the most important times of the year for selling extended guarantee insurance. Most hon. Members will agree that it is the time when most people buy such goods and seek insurance. We have not had a statement from the Government about the matter. The Minister has been rather dismissive. I infer from what he said that people are expected to be more prudent when buying that kind of insurance. We have a duty as Members of Parliament to protect people. They are not imprudent. They have been sold bogus and worthless policies. I am not saying that the people who sell them know that, but when the customers call upon the companies to deliver what they are insured against, they find out that the companies are no longer in business. We have a duty to protect such people.

Those are the two matters to which I think we should have an answer before we adjourn for the Christmas recess.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): I am sure that no one in his right senses believes that we should rise later than Friday, so the points that are being made in the debate are for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to contemplate during the recess. I wish to raise a number of points briefly which my right hon. Friend may wish to brood upon before he replies.

The first is about disarmament. As my right hon. Friend knows, some extremely important talks have been taking place in this country between the Prime Minister and Mr. Gorbachev over the past few days. The Soviet Foreign Minister, Mr. Gromyko, is to meet Mr. Shultz and other such meetings will undoubtedly take place. I hope that the coming year will see a substantial commitment by the leaders of the West and the East to getting some agreement signed during the course of 1985.

For example, I cannot understand why it should not be possible to reach an agreement on chemical warfare. No one can favour the continuance of chemical warfare or the weapons to sustain it. The negotiations on that matter, which have been dragging on for so long, should be able to be brought to a conclusion.

Secondly, if both sides give sufficient impetus, it should be possible to bring to a more successful conclusion the negotiations on balanced force reductions that have been going on in Vienna for over 10 years and which have made no progress. I also hope that the Americans and the Russians will address themselves seriously in the new negotiations that are to take place, to the proposals that President Reagan made over a year ago about what he called "build down"—reducing the numbers of strategic weapons which exist.

I defer to no one in my belief in a strong defence policy, but I firmly believe that there are too many missiles in the world. It is possible to have a safe world and a safe balance if we proceed in the way that the President suggested with a mutual build down of the number of missiles. I hope that the Government will place the full weight of their diplomacy behind constructive talks to reach agreements during 1985.

The hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McGuire) mentioned unemployment. We have been reading a good deal in the newspapers recently about the fact that the Government are contemplating new initiatives on unemployment. They may be reflected in the Budget, but we must wait and see.

I hope that it will be understood by Ministers that many hon. Members on both sides of the House regard the reduction of unemployment as a matter which should be at the top of the Government's list of priorities. We are looking for initiatives from Ministers—not just throwing money at the problem—which will deal with this great social evil. I hope that nothing will be ruled out of serious consideration in advance. During the past few months there has been an investigation into various forms of social security. If there has not been an investigation into reducing the pension age of men, there should be one. That would have a substantial effect on the unemployment problem. It is a policy which has great public support, and it should be examined much more urgently.

I remember raising that matter with the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) when he was Minister for Social Security in the previous Labour Government. Ministers in both Governments have said that the policy is too expensive. Unemployment is costing the country more and more and we cannot afford to ignore such initiatives. I hope that the reduction of the pension age for men will be considered seriously by Ministers between now and the Budget, along with an expansion of the job release scheme.

[Mr. Michael Latham]

I received a letter this morning from a constituent which stated that about 84,000 are in receipt of the job release allowance, which is undoubtedly a worthwhile contribution. However, I hope that the scheme will be expanded. The unfortunate decision was taken some time ago to raise the qualifying age to 64 years and we should be looking to reducing it to the previous qualifying age of 62 years.

I hope that between now and Parliament meeting again on 9 January there will be a serious consultation on the limited list of drugs. I believe that every hon. Member has been disgusted by the circular which has been put out by Roche Products Ltd.

Sir Paul Hawkins (Norfolk, South-West): Absolutely scandalous.

Mr. Latham: Indeed. That circular has done great harm, undoubtedly, to the constructive points which have been made by general practitioners, which have been taken seriously by all hon. Members. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will be able to assure me that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health is starting from the basic proposition that patients must be able to have the drugs they need, and if two drugs are the same, it obviously makes sense to choose the cheaper one. I am sure that everyone supports that approach.

However, the present proposals seem to be unduly restrictive, for example, on laxatives, which are especially important to the elderly; they should be considered again. There should be proper consultation between now and 31 January.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is wrong-headed of the British Medical Association apparently to refuse to enter into consultation on this issue?

Mr. Latham: I concur with my hon. Friend's intervention. I have stated that I take that view in letters that I have written to general practitioners in my constituency. It is most regrettable that the BMA has taken such an attitude. I hope that it will reconsider its position as quickly as possible so that the best professional advice is available to Ministers before they make an important decision.

Finally, many of us are concerned about the attitude which seems to come from the Department of Health and Social Security, that rural maternity units are undesirable and should be closed. The Department seems to take the view that mothers-to-be should give birth in large central hospitals. There is no support for such a policy in rural areas. Mothers-to-be attach great importance to, and much enjoy, the support and help that they are given in rural maternity units such as those in Melton Mowbray and Oakham. If the DHSS takes the view that it can get away with closing rural maternity units through regional health authorities or district health authorities so that all facilities can be concentrated in large general hospitals, it must realise that that will be opposed by those representing rural constituencies.

I hope that that will be understood by Ministers. Our constituents are incensed by the "concentration" policy. I have raised this matter previously with Ministers and I must tell my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House that I have not been satisfied with their responses. I shall continue to raise the issue until I get satisfaction.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): In joining others in resisting the Adjournment of the House, I wish to make a firm protest about the way in which the Government, and especially the Foreign Office, have sought to introduce a fee for issuing entry certificates. I am pleased that the Leader of the House is in his place, as he had to endure three points of order from me on this issue last week. He undertook during business questions on Thursday to consult his colleagues in the Foreign Office to ascertain the procedures that they are proposing to introduce for entry certificate fees. I was therefore concerned to learn yesterday from the Foreign Office that it intended today to lay an order that would seek to introduce a charge of £10 for entry certificates from 1 January. It appears that it intends to use a procedure that is not subject to parliamentary procedure, either that of approval or annulment. It proposes to introduce an order to amend the Consular Fees Act 1980.

Yesterday, there was a meeting of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, which is charged with responsibility for scrutinising such orders. It was therefore denied an opportunity of scrutinising the proposed Foreign Office order. That goes to reinforce the concern that I and others have about the way in which the Foreign Office has proceeded.

It was proposed originally by the Foreign Secretary on 22 November to introduce entry certificate fees and the proposal is to become a fact in the way that I have outlined. Many hon. Members may not consider this to be a matter of great significance, so I remind the House that £10 is about a third of the annual income of a Bangladeshi family living in a rural area in that country. We should be concerned also about the principle lying behind the introduction of such a fee. It diminishes the right conferred by the Immigration Act 1971 on Commonwealth citizens freely to enter the United Kingdom. It may be ultra vires to diminish such a right conferred by statute by means of an order of the sort that I have described. As I have said, the order will seek to amend the Consular Fees Act 1980, which I would argue was never construed, when enacted, as a suitable vehicle for introducing a charge for entry certificates.

The entry clearance procedure, when established, was presented as a means of facilitating entry into the United Kingdom for Commonwealth citizens and others. It was suggested that it would avoid protracted and distressing problems of the sort that are often encountered at ports of entry. These problems are often encountered by those who have entry clearance permission, but that is by the way. There was no suggestion when the procedure was first introduced—and certainly when the debates took place prior to the introduction of the entry clearance procedure — that a fee would be introduced. It was never suggested that the Government considered a fee to be appropriate. It is entirely inappropriate for such a fee to be introduced, and if it is considered to be a precedent, we are no doubt on a fee escalator for entry certificates.

We all remember that nationality fees have been introduced and increased substantially over a short period. Even the Government were embarrassed by the obscene profits that they made from nationality fees. They were persuaded some time ago to introduce modest reductions in the fees charged. If an entry certificate fee of £10 is introduced, it is likely that a substantial increase will be suggested in the near future.

It is an outrage for the Government to introduce a fee by means of laying an order that will not be subject to parliamentary procedures. They have compounded the outrage by adopting a back-door method to implement it. They have committed a contempt of Parliament in so doing as they have denied those of us with an interest in these matters any opportunity to debate the fee in principle. We shall have no opportunity to question the Executive about the way in which the scheme was proposed.

It is clear that the scheme was cobbled together in a hurry. That was done in desperation when the Foreign Office was beleaguered by criticisms of the inadequacy of our overseas aid budget. With cuts in the British Council's budget and a reduction of the moneys available to the external services, some bright spark, no doubt buried in the Treasury, thought that it would be a good idea to introduce a fee for entry certificates.

I understand that the proposal has been resisted considerably within the Foreign Office, and that is understandable. I hope that considerable second thoughts will be given to the introduction of a fee during the recess. I hope, too, that the proposal will be deferred and that the House will be given an opportunity to debate the introduction of a fee so that we are not presented with a fait accompli.

Several hon. Members mentioned the financing of the BBC. I should like to comment on that issue which, as hon. Members said, will perhaps be debated more extensively at a later hour. I should like to express my concern and that of many of my constituents at the application by the BBC for a £19 increase in the licence for a colour television. It is clear that many pensioners will be unable to pay such an increase, if it is agreed. They might be faced with the prospect of giving up watching television altogether or, like my constituent Mrs. Lilian Swailes, might find themselves in prison. Mrs. Swailes is a widow, a pensioner, who was sentenced to 14 days' imprisonment recently because she could not pay a fine that resulted from her inability to pay her television licence fee. Other pensioners in my constituency have recently made it clear that they are prepared to go to prison because they do not want to pay the reported increase in their television licence fee.

I am sure that this belief is shared by many other hon. Members. I believe that the only way of resolving this matter satisfactorily is for a substantial increase in the pension to be agreed, which would allow pensioners to make choices on what they spend their own money. However, it is unlikely that there will be such a substantial increase in the pension, particularly under this Government. Therefore, the Government's options narrow considerably. They know that this has been a controversial issue for many years. The time has now come for all pensioner households to have free television.

Ministers should understand that television is often the only form of entertainment for pensioners, and often the only company for them. Many are isolated — the removal of bus services, the increase in bus fares and other difficulties have isolated many of them, who now look to that little box in the corner as their only entertainment and company. We should see television more and more as a social service for pensioners. That should be recognised by the Exchequer funding the moneys necessary to enable all pensioner households to enjoy free television.

The hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith), who referred to this subject, floated the idea that we could alleviate the problems over the financing of the BBC by the introduction of advertising. That presents a very serious threat. The idea might have superficial attractions for some hon. Members and sections of the public, but I believe that it presents a serious threat to the programme standards of the BBC, and certainly to its accountability. It would expose it even more than at present to commercial pressures. There are considerable doubts about the availability of advertising revenue to be extended to the BBC and, if there were advertising, what would be the impact upon many newspapers, particularly regional newspapers throughout the country?

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): If the hon. Gentleman does not want the licence fee to go up, or if he wants it to go up by a minimum amount, yet does not accept the idea of advertising income for the BBC, how does he propose that the BBC should balance its budget? Does he propose that the Government should subsidise the BBC? If so, it would become an arm of Government. It is s difficult problem. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can give me an answer.

Mr. Madden: It is a difficult problem and has been around for a long time. Government financing of the BBC's overseas services has not created the problems mentioned by many detractors of the idea of Exchequer funding of the BBC. In my view, it should be funded from the Exchequer as essentially a social service, and that could be done for a fraction of the cost of Trident nuclear submarines, for instance, and would do a great deal more good to many more people than increasing the licence fee in substantial dollops, as has been done year by year. If we continue with the licence revenue system, it will become more unwieldy than it is today.

As an hon. Member representing part of Yorkshire, it would be impossible for me to argue that we should not adjourn without mentioning the plight of the unemployed and the extent of unemployment in the Yorkshire and Humberside region and in my constituency, where in parts it reaches 40 per cent., 50 per cent. and 60 per cent. The debate earlier today highlighted the damage that Government policies are doing to the prospects of getting a job for many of my constituents, particularly school leavers, and those who have endured long-term unemployment for two, three and four years.

Those people want the Government to change their policies. They want a change of priorities. They do not want to see available resources being given in tax cuts to the relatively well-off; they want them to be put into public expenditure—into massive house building and construction programmes and improving the infrastructure of our county and our cities. Those are the sort of projects that they want. They do not know how long they will have to wait for changes in policy to come from the Government, but they do know that that is the only solution that they can look to. They hope that the Government will respond quickly to their plight and their needs, which they see so vividly. They know what the remedies are. What they are waiting for is a response from the Government, and they hope that it will come sooner rather than later.

Mr. Robert Hicks (Cornwall, South-East): I make no apology to the House for raising a problem that is probably exclusive to the county of Cornwall. We require an early indication from the Government in respect of the county's application for a milk quota for the new agricultural college that is to serve the needs of Cornwall and is located in my constituency. I should add that I have had extended correspondence on the issue with my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. I informed his private office earlier today that I intended raising the matter this evening.

As the House will know, Cornwall is a rural county. The importance of farming to the economy is not in question. Indeed, it is only an accident of history that no farm college was located within the county. The need for a farm education and agricultural training centre in the county for the national certificate in agriculture and, in addition, for training and education for part-time students was identified as an urgent priority in 1983, and was supported by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of the Department of Education and Science.

The county council was offered a lease of the 440-acre Duchy home farm in August 1983, which could be used for agricultural education and training in the county's main agricultural enterprises. Being located in the south-west of the United Kingdom, Cornwall is essentially a livestock-rearing area. We like to think that we grow the best natural grass in the world. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South-West (Sir P. Hawkins) will not disagree. A herd of 75 cows was established in 1983 on a county council smallholding as an interim measure, to be ready to transfer to the home farm in September 1984. However, in April this year we saw the implementation of milk quotas as a result of the EEC decision.

As no milk was produced on that farm on 2 April 1984, it did not automatically qualify for a quota under the regulations, and it could not be considered as a special case as the rules in that respect are very strictly drawn. Furthermore, the county council is unlikely to succeed in claiming a quota on the basis of exceptional hardship as it would have to establish that farming was its main occupation.

On the other hand, approval has been obtained from the National Certification Council for Agriculture for the one-year agricultural course to begin in September 1985. In practice, it is likely to begin in September 1986, but that does not alter the fact that the uncertainty is causing problems. Day release students are already attending the new agriculture college, and it is hoped eventually to provide residential accommodation for about 40 students who will undertake the basic one-year course.

The total capital outlay by the county council for the project is likely ultimately to be about £750,000. The livestock, new dairy units and other features have already cost about £250,000. At present, young people from Cornwall wishing to undertake a basic, standard one-year course in agriculture have to attend establishments in Devon or Somerset. With the exception of the cost of education, the farm is to be run on a financially self-supporting basis. The lack of a milk quota means that the farm will run the risk of a levy, which could significantly affect its financial viability.

I believe that the hardship caused by the EEC regulations to local authorities, such as Cornwall, which aim to provide an agricultural education provision of their own must be recognised and alleviated. The regulations which introduced milk quotas made no reference to the requirements of agriculture education or farm extension in general. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will be able to give us an assurance that, once the new EEC Commission is established in 1985, the Government will apply to Brussels for our special requirements to be taken into account. I do not criticise either the Commission or the Council of Agriculture Ministers for this omission with regard to agriculture training establishments. Nevertheless, there is a real problem.

It would be ludicrous if, after all these years, we finally achieved a farm college for Cornwall, which is essentially a livestock county, but could not allow students to be trained in milk production and all that is involved in the running of a dairy herd. Dairying is a fundamental part of the farm economy of Cornwall. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister of State has considerable sympathy with our position, which arises from a pure accident of history. I therefore ask my right hon. Friend, with his west country connections and no doubt his deep understanding of our problems, to assure the House that, once the new Commission is established in Brussels, our requirements in Cornwall will be drawn to its attention.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Looking forward to 1985, it is not a bad thing also to look back. If we are glad to get away from here for a short break, I am sure that Ministers are equally glad to get away and even more glad to know that we are going away. I hope that if Ministers get anything from Father Christmas in their pillow cases, stockings or whatever, it will be better briefs to use when they get back.

The Government's greatest totem pole of the last Parliament was the money supply. In this Parliament it has become the public sector borrowing requirement. As a matter of fact, I do not go much on totem poles and I think that the Government might do better if they did a few things slightly differently. There is a strange paradox about getting older. One realises that although one is getting older and has less time, in politics there is plenty of time, but Governments seem not to recognise that. I believe that the Government may be in too big a hurry about some things.

Looking back over the five years or so since the Conservatives came to office, one recognises that the Government have done many things which needed to be done following the period of the Labour Government. They got inflation down and productivity up. With the exception of the miners' strike, they achieved a great reduction in the number of strikes and much better order in British industry. Government expenditure has decreased as a proportion of GNP and industry is more competitive.

All those things are splendid, but one or two things are not so good. First, unemployment is much too high. We must be realistic and understand that unemployment is also high in many other countries, but that does not alter the fact that we must reduce it here. Secondly, manufacturing industry has received a buffeting and too much manufacturing industry has gone out of business altogether. Furthermore, the cost of welfare and social security arising out of unemployment has increased greatly and become an extremely severe imposition on the Treasury and the taxpayer.

I believe that some relaxation of control of the PSBR and some extra expenditure on construction and housing —I voted reluctantly in support of the Government in the previous debate tonight—would be a good thing. I do not want to pelt money at things. I just want a bit more to be made available. I do not believe that that would be catastrophic for the Government or the Treasury. However, I am told by my friends on the Treasury Bench —not least by the Prime Minister in answer to my question the other day—that there will not be any more money. On the contrary, the Government mean to stick to their policies and to the tightness of the PSBR, and not to give the support in the form of public money that I should welcome. They expect—they have said so—that, if the climate is right, British business and commerce will revive the economy, provide jobs and reduce unemployment without Government support.

Let us suppose that, by a strange mischance, I am wrong and the Prime Minister and the Government are right. At the moment, I am not sure that I am not right. However, let us suppose that I am wrong. One ingredient in the Prime Minister's strategy, which is absolutely vital to its success, is confidence about the future in industry and commerce. Confidence is vital if there is to be expansion and investment. Confidence is a very tender plant, and without it there can be no growth.

At the moment, industry and commerce are cautious, tentative and unadventurous. I am in business as well as being a Member of Parliament. I know that business men are thinking, "Things are all right, but we shall not push the boat out because we are not quite sure what will happen in the next year or so." Why is that? There may be several reasons, but one reason, of particular importance, is that we have had five years of turmoil, because there had to be five years of change. We have been working on the bad situation that the Labour Government left us, and trying to turn the state juggernaut round. To turn any juggernaut round in the middle of a motorway may seem to be the quicker option, but the wise and safer course is to take the juggernaut round by the slip roads. The distance is longer, but one will reach one's destination more quickly in the end.

Some of the turmoil of recent years could not have been avoided. As always, some of it arose from outside causes and was not the Government's fault. For example, the Government are in no way to blame for the miners' strike. It is entirely due to the refusal by the NUM and Mr. Scargill to do a deal. However, some of the aggro apparent in our society does stem from Government action. In the coming year, the Government must concentrate on less contentious legislation and try to create a more relaxed atmosphere. Industry and commerce cannot feel confident about their ability to advance in an atmosphere of political aggro, controversial legislation and dissention of various kinds. The Government and the Prime Minister will have to implement more slowly the programme that they believe to be necessary. I, too, believe that some of the Prime Minister's ideas are necessary. We must still continue to reverse some of the preceding trends, as we have been doing during the past five years. However, it is now necessary —indeed, vital—to slow the process down. Some of the Government's ideas should be left to the next Parliament. We need to win the election. The Prime Minister's strategy of depending upon industry and commerce to solve our economic problems and provide jobs cannot be implemented if there is any uncertainty about confidence, or if, as at the moment, confidence is limited. There must be real confidence for the future, and only the Government can create it.

The country depends upon industry and commerce. I believe that the Government could provide a little more help.

But, even with the little more help for which I have asked, it would still be the responsibility of the free enterprise sector to provide success. I plead with the Leader of the House and his colleagues, during the next Session of Parliament, to bring in less contentious legislation and to avoid some of the traumas from which we have suffered during the past week and month. If we are to effect an improvement in the economy, the mood of the country must be got right, and the Government must seek to get it right.

8.5 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Before the House adjourns, I seek assurances from the Leader of the House on two matters. The first is linked to early-day motion 243, which arose out of a trial in which sentence was delivered on Monday. On Monday, both the leading items on the 10 o'clock television news were about serious court cases following serious offences, both of which raise the same issue. The first was the case of Colin Evans who was convicted of offences against children and had been employed by Berkshire county council. The second case concerned the supply of drugs to young people by a Mr. Catherwood while he was employed as a supply teacher—the title is unfortunate—by the Inner London education authority.

My query relates to the work of several Departments of State. I hope that it will be appropriate for me to direct my remarks to the Leader of the House. How can we improve the situation for the parents and guardians of children and young people? It is clear that the present system is failing. Employers do not find out about highly relevant offences committed by employees who may then perpetrate similar offences against young people during the time of their employment.

At some stage Mr. Catherwood applied to ILEA for a job, but I accept that, at the time when he applied, the rule and the practice were different. Under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974, there is now a duty for a declaration to be made. However, the system is entirely fallible. Those who have most to hide will declare that they have not committed offences. They will conceal their recorded offences from the eyes of the authorities.

We have to respect the privacy of the individual. It should not be a matter of public knowledge that people have committed offences, if the slate has been wiped clean. However, we must find a way of assuring parents, guardians and other responsible people that youngsters are not liable to be looked after by people who may be a grave risk to them. Is there a chance of the House examining this grave issue soon? I accept that we shall not do so this week, but perhaps we might have an opportunity soon after our return.

The first offence involved sexual offences and the murder of a child and the second involved the supply of LSD, cocaine and cannabis, and was committed in the borough that I represent. Such drugs were supplied at a time of serious drug risk to young people. We should examine the law to establish how local authorities and other special employers can be guaranteed to know the track record of those whom they employ. In the Berkshire case, it appears that other employees knew about their colleague. While that in some way makes the occurrences far worse, it appears that ILEA did not know about the criminal drugs record of its employee at all. The present law is clearly inadequate if this can happen.

Early-day motion 156 relates to Crown post offices and sub-post offices, although it refers principally to the latter. It states:

"That this House views with concern the Post Office's campaign to close a number of urban sub-post offices; believes that it is becoming clear that the public consultation before closure is a sham; is concerned about the long-term structure of the Post Office network, both urban and rural; and calls upon the Government to allocate time to have this matter debated on the floor of the House in the near future."

In most parts of the country the Post Office is conducting consultations preceding the announcements to close sub and Crown post offices. The early-day motion asks for an opportunity to have a debate on the consultation procedure that the signatories, of whom I am one, regard as a sham.

I shall quote the example of my constituency because it illustrates the point clearly. We have two Crown post offices, both of which the local district postmaster proposes to close. They are the Bermondsey district office on the Old Kent road and the south-east district post office at 329 Borough high street. The post office at Borough high street has considerably more business than most other district or Crown offices in inner south-east London.

The Post Office Users National Council tells me that it cannot get involved in individual cases, so it is not an effective ally of the customer. The district postmaster has a duty to balance considerations of social need, which are widely drawn, commercial considerations and constraints imposed on the Post Office in its present form. The arguments are about priorities within a cash limit imposed by the Government. There is a major failing in the system which many of us do not accept when closures are announced at the same time as there are profit margins such as have been announced this week and when there is an overwhelming public demand from parents with young children, the handicapped and the elderly and from local commercial interests.

Some of the facts that the Post Office supplies about the time taken to be served and the number of counters open are also untrue. I can supply evidence to support that assertion in regard to the two offices that I have mentioned. Yet there is no possibility of any organisation asking the district postmaster to reconsider his decision, even when there might be a change in the area's economic circumstances. There might be an argument based on social need, but there might also be demographic change. The population in north Southwark is increasing after having declined for 10 years. Will the Leader of the House agree that there is a failure in the procedures as there exists no method for challenging decisions to close post offices? I hope that he will accede to my request soon. I am asking for an assurance today that we can debate this soon because there is not long before a final decision will be made. The post offices will be closed and then it will be too late. The House should consider these issues before such decisions are made.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): There are several subjects which ought to be debated before we adjourn. One is the televising of the proceedings of this House, which I hope will never come here in Trojan horse fashion from the other place. Another is the awful mess which I fear we might be getting into by giving emergency aid to many countries in Africa which, unfortunately, are often badly governed, as with Ethiopia. The long-term problems of feeding local populations will not just go away as a result of our sending emergency food and supplies. There are grave and difficult problems there. I hope that Britain and the Government do not feel any shame for the failures of Governments in Africa. Our part has been praiseworthy.

I do not apologise for saying that we should not adjourn until we have debated church affairs. I shall concentrate on that subject. I last mentioned the subject briefly on the Adjournment for the summer recess on 29 July 1982 at c. 1247 of the Official Report, following the controversy about the Falklands memorial service. Matters since that time have, unfortunately, got much worse. There was, of course, a time when ecclesiastical subjects were frequently debated in this Chamber, as in the 16th and 17th centuries, when most people believed that church and state should be one. I still believe that disestablishment would be a bad thing and damage the essential fabric of this old Christian nation. That is partly why I am so anxious about the state of the Church of England today.

The procedure for appointing bishops was changed a few years ago, so that now the two names which are presented to the Prime Minister are supposed to be widely supported after thorough consultation. The state has always had a say in the appointment of bishops since early Christian times, and rightly so. Whether the calibre of bishops has improved since the new procedure, it is difficult to say. A bishop used to emerge, rather like the leader of the Tory party, without any votes being taken. I believe that the new system needs to be looked at again. A democratic method is not always or necessarily the best method for top appointments in any walk of life.

There is much criticism of the bishops. Some of it, I agree, is unfair. Bishops still enjoy a position of considerable social and political influence in Britain. Some still live in palaces. I am glad that they do. Some still sit in the Lords, and I welcome them there too. However, they are in a position of great difficulty about speaking out on public affairs. If they speak they are accused of meddling in politics and if they do not speak people ask why the bishops are so silent. Nevertheless, bishops should be careful when making pronouncements outside their normal sphere of faith and morals. Furthermore, they cannot unfortunately speak from a position of great strength in their church where congregations are still falling, where clergy are few and diminishing and where, unfortunately, there is considerable discontent among the wives of the clergy.

We are now living in what in many ways is a heathen society, with great evils such as crimes of violence, divorce, rape and cruelty distressingly common. In my view, these are the first matters to which the bishops should turn their attention and on which they should speak out and be heard regularly. Divorce has now become horrifyingly common, with appalling effects on the family and children. Surely there is hardly a subject in social affairs which is more urgent and critical, yet how often do we hear the bishops speak on this subject?

Their first concern should be their clergy and their flock. Instead, they are often tempted to deal with less immediate problems in people's daily life, such as the atom bomb or the affairs of the Third world. More than ever, the nation needs teaching about our Christian faith and Christian heritage, yet how often do we hear this from the bishops? It is not that I object to their views on political matters, which may be Left-wing or perhaps wishy-washy SDP, but these matters are secondary to the great questions which we must all ask about life and death, redemption and sin, death and resurrection. These are the matters on which ordinary people desperately need guidance—not things like nuclear disarmament.

Sometimes the bishops put themselves in a ridiculous position: as, for example, over the coal strike, where some of them appear to equate the coal board's stand—which with all its terms of pay and redundancy is extremely generous—and that of Mr. Scargill and the miners on the so-called picket lines. The failure of nearly all the bishops to condemn the violence of the strikers, both on the picket lines and against working miners' homes and families, is quite disgraceful.

I shall pass over as quickly as I can the much publicised appointment of the Bishop of Durham. In the good old days, one of his chief responsibilities was to keep out the Scots. Today he seems to be letting all kinds of heresies into his speeches, which trouble and worry the faithful. However clever he may be in an Oxford common room, he should surely be more careful in his public pronouncements. Looking out from his castle towards his glorious cathedral, he should ponder his heavy responsibilities. Many a clergyman would desire to be in that marvellous position.

I am also troubled about some of the activities of the General Synod, and I wish that its proceedings were more often debated here because I believe that many Back Benchers—more than those who are Anglicans—more truly represent the feelings of the man and woman in the pew than does the Synod. The Synod seems to have attracted the activists who do not necessarily represent ordinary church people.

The near destruction of the Book of Common Prayer in the Church of England is dreadful. I prophesied that this would happen when we debated these matters more than a decade ago and when—unfortunately, as I now see it—we approved the new services. Nowadays, one can find a prayer book service only in about one out of 12 parishes. I live half way between my constituency and Westminster, and I have had to scour parishes in Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire to find a prayer book, Holy Communion or matins. Whenever the subject is mentioned by colleagues, great regret is expressed on all sides that we ever allowed the Church of England to do such a dreadful thing.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The hon. Gentleman will be well aware that three members of the General Synod also sit in the House. I assure him that when this place turns down a proposal from the Synod, the Synod clearly takes notice. he can be reassured that even if we do not manage adequately to represent all the views in this House, this House is near to the thoughts of the Synod more often than the hon. Gentleman might think.

Mr. Stokes: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

The General Synod has recently expressed its view on the introduction of women priests into the Church of England. I have no very strong views on that, although I would hesitate to support it. I would certainly counsel caution among my colleagues in the House.

The nation is undergoing a spiritual crisis. There is still a faint film of Christianity over this land, based largely on our past, traditions and character, but I fear that it is growing thinner. The enormous change in sexual morals is upsetting the institution of marriage on which our society depends. The rise in crimes of violence is terrifying. Even the old morality of honesty and fair dealing is dying, and in the City of London scandals have broken out which would have horrified our fathers.

People, particularly young people, are now longing for a lead and guidance. They want some benchmarks for their ordinary life. Discipline and respect are no longer what they were. We used to pride ourselves on the fact that England was a peaceful society. We prayed each week in the Book of Common Prayer that we should be "godly and quietly governed". These are the matters to which the bishops and clergy should turn their attention.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): My brief experience in the House has taught me that this debate is always a fascinating occasion, and I particularly wish to single out the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis), with which I totally concurred.

However, the subject I wish to raise concerns a constituent, Mr. Alan Russell, who, with three other Britons, is presently detained in Libya and has been since May this year. For the bulk of this period of more than seven months, the precise accusations against the four men have not been known. During this whole time their families have suffered great distress. The anguish and uncertainty that pervade the lives of those households as Christmas approaches deserve the sympathy and concern of this House, the Government and, indeed, the authorities in Libya.

I pay tribute to the fortitude of Mrs. Carol Russell and her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Walters, who are also my constituents. Their unswerving determination to do everything in their power to secure the release of Alan Russell has been wholly admirable. I hope that I would have the same courage and strength if I were ever in that unfortunate position.

Mrs. Russell's plight has been made worse by the fact that her husband was employed by a Libyan company, and payment of his salary ceased some time ago. It is unfortunate that in those very exceptional circumstances, which by no means apply to all Britons held abroad, there is no source of Government aid to help families meet the cost of journeys to and from the countries in which their relatives are held. However, far more urgent than any financial consideration is the need to secure the release of Mr. Russell and the other detainees.

Mr. Russell's trial, on charges which carry very severe penalties, opened last week in Libya and was adjourned for one week until tomorrow to allow a longer time for his defence to be prepared. We cannot tell what the outcome of that trial will be. I understand that a British representative in Libya will have access to the trial, and that is most welcome. However, whether we can have confidence in the outcome of the trial and whether it will be fairly conducted remains to be seen. I have no doubt that many people in this country and throughout the world will watch that process very closely.

I am particularly glad that the Archbishop of Canterbury's representative, Mr. Terry Waite, is paying a second visit to Libya. I hope that he will be able to bring comfort to the four men, whose morale, understandably, has been at a low level during a long period of uncertainty.

I should like to bring three points to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. First, I urge the Government, in the strongest possible terms, to take every action they can to secure the release of Mr. Russell and the other three men. I recognise that throughout the last seven months efforts have been made behind the scenes. Indeed, I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce), Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, for the way in which he has kept in close contact with me and with the families of the detainees. However, a more public effort must now be made by the Government on behalf of those men. Commercial factors and the position and status of Libya within the international community are negotiating cards which could be used. Is it not possible for an envoy to be sent to Libya to seek the release of Mr. Russell and the other three detainees.

Secondly, Colonel Gaddafi can be assured of my belief that the immediate release of the detainees would produce an easing of relations between our two countries. That would be most welcome in Libya.

Thirdly, I wish to send a clear message to Mr. Alan Russell — that, as long as I am his Member of Parliament and free to speak in this House, his plight will not be forgotten, his case will not disappear from the political scene and I shall continue to urge the Government to act.

At Christmas time, when it is the privilege of probably all Members of Parliament and of most people in this country to be at home with their families, I ask the House and the Government to spare a thought for those poor families whose Christmas will be dominated by their separation from a loved one, a separation which, without action being taken by the Government, may last for very much longer than the Christmas recess for which the House will shortly and deservedly adjourn.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): May I say to the Leader of the House that I am not opposed to a Christmas recess. I look forward to spending some days with my wife, children and grandchildren. I look forward also to spending some time with my constituents; in particular, the miners who are on strike, and their wives and children.

We are to return here on 9 January. Why should we not return on Monday 7 January and use both Monday and Tuesday to consider the wide-ranging problems of the prolonged miners' dispute? If the House were to spend two days exclusively on this issue, we might find a solution to a problem which is causing great distress to miners and their families. There is also the financial implication that the nation is forced to endure because of the intransigent attitude of the Prime Minister and her protegé, Mr. Ian MacGregor, supported by her somewhat dried-out wet, the Secretary of State for Energy.

The financial implications are not my only concern. The nation will return to normality only when the violence, brutality, bullying and bitterness are brought to an end. There seems to be less chance of a settlement after 10 months than when the strike began. Both sides are losing financially. Internationally, both the miners and the nation suffer. Surely this Chamber can resolve the differences. It is for that reason that I am pleased to have caught your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I appeal to everybody—to the Prime Minister, the Cabinet, other Ministers and Back Benchers—not to allow this dispute to continue. When one assembles and catalogues all the speeches that have been made and the questions that have been asked and answered since last March, one can only conclude that enough is enough and that the negotiations must begin again. Why not 7 and 8 January 1985?

Let me examine some of the reasons for the deadlock. The main contentious issue is the interpretation of what constitutes an economic pit. I have just read a document which was prepared by Andrew Glyn, fellow and tutor in economics at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, and an associate member of the Oxford university institute of economics and statistics. The document gives chapter and verse as to why the economic case put forward by the National Coal Board is totally false. Although the report was prepared by Andrew Glyn exclusively for the national Union of Mineworkers, the figures—the statistics and evidence presented — confirm the statement by Philip Bassett on 28 November in the Financial Times. It is undoubtedly sufficient to confirm the reasons for the refusal by the NUM to accept pit closures on grounds other than exhaustion or geology.

In my constituency, Wyndham Western colliery, which was closed on 7 January, employed 550 miners. It was the last pit in the Ogmore valley. Male unemployment in the Ogmore valley is now 24 per cent. There is very little prospect of further employment for the 550 miners who were pushed out of work. I wonder whether the evidence presented by the NCB's accountants on the economics of the Wyndham Western colliery was the reason for its closure.

Philip Bassett, on 28 November, in his Financial Times article—it is not often that we pray in aid that paper—says that six academic accountants carried out a study which enraged the NCB regarding the case for pit closures:

"The study was led by Mr. David Cooper, Price Waterhouse professor of accounting and finance at the University of Manchester Institute of Science and Technology and included senior accountancy academics from Sheffield and Manchester universities and the Manchester Business School."

The Financial Times article stated that the report by the academic accountants said that careful scrutiny of the underlying accounting reports that identify pit profit and loss

"produces the conclusion that they fail to form an adequate basis for informed management decisions".

The article states:

"The authors give the specific example of the cost of coal at the Cortonwood pit in South Yorkshire—the proposed closure of which was one of the sparks which led to the present strikes.

They say that NCB figures show that in 1981-82, the pit lost £6·20 per tonne. But they suggest that if the fixed cost element then was approximately the same proportion of total costs as in 1984, then 23·1 per cent. of the unit cost of £50·5m would not be avoided by the decision to close the pit — so that in 1981-82, Cortonwood would have contributed £5·50 profit per tonne to the NCB.

While not claiming this example to be definitive, they say it does indicate the difficulty of public debate on economic closures."

I should like to go into graphic detail about the document on the economic case against pit closures, but I will not delay the House. However, it is important for me to spell out what some of the sections include, so that if the House decides to have a one-day or two-day debate on the dispute, these matters can be resolved amicably. The 10 sections of the report demonstrate the difficulty of deciding what is an economic pit and what is an uneconomic pit. It considers the impact on the economy of lost coal production, the reduced production of mining investment in goods, reduced rail services, extra electricity costs and the reduced consumption of United Kingdom goods by miners' families, as well as losses to the miners, their families and children. In areas such as mine, there is also a loss to the whole community.

The document includes tables on the cumulative costs of closures in certain areas. It mentions the St. Johns colliery in Maestag and the Garw colliery in the Ogmore valley. Mention is also made of the Cwm Coedely colliery. Emlyn Williams and Terry Thomas of the south Wales NUM have told me that the NCB has repeatedly claimed that two of those three pits are uneconomic and should be closed. The board bases its arguments on its own accountancy assumptions, which need to be fully analysed before the NUM can consider further consultation on pit closures.

I toured my constituency last weekend and I know that the miners in Wales will not be forced, cajoled or starved back to work. Their wives back them and will ensure that the men do not go back if there is still a threat of colliery closures. The miners and their wives know that if the men go back and the axe falls on collieries in their small communities, there will be no alternative employment available.

As I said, we have 24 per cent. male unemployment in my constituency. If the St. Johns colliery, which employs 824 miners, is closed, unemployment in that community will escalate to 45 per cent.

The Observer on Sunday carried an article headed "No surrender in the valleys." That article mentioned the Ridley report, which was leaked to The Economist, and said that many miners carried grubby photocopies of the report in The Economist in their pockets. That report was the Tory party study, drawn up in 1978, which mapped out the policy to dismantle the nationalised industries. It mentioned the "political threat" from the "enemies" of the next Tory Government.

The Observer report said:

"The battleground should be chosen by the Government, it says, and it was likely to be the coal industry. The Government should prepare itself, the report says, by building up coal stocks at power stations, planning coal imports, encouraging haulage companies to recruit non-union drivers, and adapting all the power stations to burn oil as well as coal. As a deterrent, money should be cut off to the strikers and the union should be made to finance them. Finally, a large mobile force of police should be equipped to deal with the inevitable violent picketing. As the Economist predicted, little of the plan reached the Tory manifesto.

It has all, however, come true."

Even today, Norman Willis, the general secretary of the TUC, has suggested that the pit strike could go on for years. What a frightening thought that is when we analyse the cost to the nation. What a frightening thought it is for me as an hon. Member who represents miners, their wives and families and who knows what hardship they are enduring.

For the reasons that I have listed, which have been confirmed by economic experts, I ask the House to reduce our Christmas recess by two days to discuss fully the dispute in the mining industry, with the one aim of amicably resolving this long-lasting, damaging and frustrating dispute.

8.47 pm

Sir Paul Hawkins (Norfolk, South-West): I shall not be asking for the recess to be postponed. Indeed, I should like the longer recess to which we have become accustomed. If we had less legislation, we would have time for the debate that the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) seeks and which I agree is long overdue.

I wish to draw attention to a matter that is important to the whole world. There is an extraordinary contrast between plenty in Europe and famine in Africa and elsewhere, yet the European Community is asking all farming communities in the EC to cut food production. That is crazy.

I recently attended a meeting in Europe at which experts forecast that large-scale famines will continue for the next 30 or 40 years. I understand that the desert is extending by at least 10 miles every year. Privately and through the Government, the European Community and humanitarian organisations, this country has been in the forefront of helping famine-stricken regions and we have also given help during other famines and disasters over the past 20 years.

However, we cannot go on working from hand to mouth. We ought to have a plan based on the facts and an expert understanding of the situation. I should like to urge the Government, along with our partners in the EC, to find out the real facts as to how long the famine conditions in Africa and, for that matter, in Bangladesh and elsewhere in future, are likely to last. They should then decide what important steps should be taken, and in what order. Should we go for providing water supplies or, perhaps, or planting forests? Indeed, I believe that much of the trouble with the desert conditions has been caused by the felling of forests throughout Africa. Perhaps we should be sending agricultural advisers to help people, to teach them to grow more food for themselves. That is an important aspect of the work that should be done.

We must carry out research into how the food that Europe, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the United States can produce in abundance can be made palatable to Africans. Other than in extreme emergencies, it is not much good sending wheat to Africa, when Africans are used to eating maize. For that matter, it is not much use sending wheat to India when Indians prefer, and understand how to cook, other pulses, and so on.

Equally, it is important to be able to reduce the weight and bulk of food. The food sent in is often extremely bulky and that, in turn, greatly reduces the possibility of access to ports and of transportation. Ports are often primitive, and transport to the hinterland may be extremely limited and of poor quality.

The Government, together with our European partners, should look into those issues as a matter of urgency so that we can use the food that we could be growing here for the rest of the world, and so that we can help those all over Africa and other parts of the world who are suffering from famine to obtain that food on a long-term basis. It is no use dealing with such famines on an ad hoc basis. Thus, I hope that during the coming months we shall hear of a plan to assist those famine areas on a long-term basis.

8.52 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I came into the debate a few minutes late. Normally, I am pretty much on the ball. I was involved in speaking to some miners from Northumberland who are still on strike, but I shall deal with that later.

My first point is that I have been making some inquiries, and have found out that there has apparently been no call to hold a debate, instead of adjourning, on the VAT that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is taking from the record produced by Band Aid. I cannot believe it. Three weeks ago I came in here and asked a question fairly innocently about the Government sending that money to Ethiopia instead of shoving it into the Chancellor's chest. I think that the VAT amounts to 18p on every record. Those young people who made the record gave their services freely, but the money is being coined by this Tory Government while all the people mentioned by the hon. Member for Norfolk, South-West (Sir P. Hawkins) are starving in Ethiopia, the rest of Africa, central and south America, and elsewhere.

About a week later every man and his dog were on the radio. Every time I switched on the radio or television there was Dr. Death claiming that he wanted the VAT back. He was going to knock hell out of the Chancellor. Then there was the Liberal Chief Whip — [HON. MEMBERS: "Where are they?"] Indeed, where are the Liberals tonight? Is there a joint selection meeting on? The SDP and Liberal Members are all missing. David Steel finished up on television. He wanted VAT. They were all going to go knocking on the Chancellor of the Exchequer's door. Now they have a wonderful opportunity to speak on the subject just before Christmas. But I imagine that they have all gone. They have started on a fact-finding tour of the Caribbean. That is where they have them in the winter. They have not got the nous to come in here to raise that subject.

Having started this whole business, I am making a final appeal. I call on the Leader of the House, who used to be an expert on financial matters—

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): He still is.

Mr. Skinner: I thought that the right hon. Gentleman had got a fairly cushy number. In his job, he escapes all the facts and figures. He does not have to face all the brickbats that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the others have to face. He does not have to prop up the Secretary of State for the Environment. But as I have said, just before Christmas we are asking the Chancellor of the Exchequer to pay back that 18p on the millions of records that have been sold.

But having said that, I shall return to the subject of the miners. In view of what my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) and others have said, I believe that there should have been a debate on the mining industry during the past few weeks. One of the things that appals me is that we constantly hear Government spokesmen and spokesmen for the coal board say on television that the miners do not want to do a deal. It is worth reminding hon. Members that the strike is not about money. It did not start because people were after increased wages. By and large, most strikes and industrial struggles are about wages and conditions. But this strike has nothing to do with that. It is the most honourable dispute to have taken place this century, because it is about saving jobs. Hon. Members should understand that.

With every year that has passed since I became a Member of Parliament, more jobs have been created in the House. There are more Members of Parliament now than when I first came here. There are also more people in the Press Gallery and more people to feed them. More people are employed all over the building. I am not complaining, but the House is one of the most uneconomic units in Britain. If the Prime Minister's philosophy of profit or die was applied to the House, it would have to close down. After all, the canteens do not make a profit. They had to have a massive write-off not so long ago. Carpets were put down at £24 a square yard. If the Grantham grocer's shop mentality had been applied to this House and to the other place, the reserves would have been exhausted years ago and both Houses would have shut.

With 4 million to 5 million people out of work — according to how often the figures have been massaged — we are saying that the miners are trying to stop another massive addition to unemployment. When the strike began it was not about what some newspapers would describe as greed and materialism, as most strikes are portrayed in the Tory press; it was about trying to keep people in work. That is an honourable cause to support.

The NUM has not put a single demand on the table. It has not asked for anything. It has never been to the coal board to say, "By the way, this is our demand. We are going to strike if you do not give in." That is not what the strike is about. The strike came about because the NCB said, "We are fed up with 'Plan for Coal'. We want to get rid of it. We are going to close 20 pits and get rid of 20,000 jobs, and if we get away with that, we shall close 70 pits and get rid of 70,000 jobs."

The NCB says, as the Government often do, that Arthur Scargill has not budged an inch, but how can he? We have not asked for anything. We have not asked for a 10 per cent. increase, so no one can ask why we do not compromise on 7 per cent. The argument is about jobs.

If the miners in south Wales—one of the peripheral coalfields—go back to work, they know that half the coalfield will go down. Towards the end of the century, there will probably not be a pit left in south Wales. One reason why the south Wales miners have been the strongest in the strike is that they can see mass unemployment, such as they have had to face for decades, facing them now. They do not want to stand any more of it.

Therefore, I hope that the people will understand that we cannot move, because we did not start the strike. We have nothing to move on. We did not ask the coal board for a single thing from 6 May throughout the strike.

I want to put forward another argument in this short debate. The miners are not engaged in any special pleading. In every statement they make, the Government give the impression—the Tory press, the BBC and ITV follow them, gladly it seems—that the miners and the NUM want something that no other industry has. In other words, they say that the industry must be economic; that it must make a profit or go under.

I have just mentioned the Houses of Parliament—an uneconomic unit. "Uneconomic" applies to nearly every industry in Britain. Take farms. The hon. Member for Norfolk, South-West (Sir P. Hawkins) has just put forward a plausible argument suggesting that it would make sense —economic sense, really—for the world to produce as much food as we possibly can and of the right kind. We could then shovel it across to Africa and all those other places where the poor kids are starving. As a principle, I do not argue with that philosophy. I would argue whether it has to be done under the aegis of the Common Market, but I believe that the argument is sound. I believe that Britain should produce enough food to cut down the import of food. That is a good argument as well. Therefore, I am not complaining about the overall strategy of subsidising uneconomic farms in Britain.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): There are none.

Mr. Skinner: According to the think tank report, which the hon. Gentleman supports—he can go to the Library and get the report; it is dated November 1983— the Government will be financing farms to the tune of £1,000 million throughout this financial year. With the CAP payments on top, that comes to the equivalent of an average of £20,000 for every farmer in the land.

On top of that, because we have some even more uneconomic farms called hill farms, especially in Wales and such places, the Government sensibly say — all Governments have done it—that it makes sense to give those farms where the terrain is difficult to develop, more money. So on top of that they get another £200 million called the hill farming subsidy. Nobody argues about that. It went through the House on the nod during the miners' strike.

If the miners were treated like the farmers—taking into account the reports from Andrew Glyn and the other five accountants — there would not be a single uneconomic pit in Britain. That is the truth of the matter.

The miners are not asking for anything special. We are just saying: do not treat us as well as the farmers but go half or a quarter of the way, and every mine in Britain would be profitable.

Let me make a comparison with the Japanese car company, Nissan. The Government have given £200 million to Nissan because it would not come to Britain and employ people unless they did give that money. That company will employ a maximum of 500 people in the north-east. That is equivalent to a £400,000 subsidy for each job. Arthur Scargill and the NUM are not asking for that kind of money. They do not want £400,000 for every employee in the NCB. They will settle for a small proportion of that. Hon. Gentlemen cannot talk about special pleading, because we are not asking for as much as the Government have handed over to that so-called super-efficient Japanese car company, which is destined to smash British Leyland.

I shall compare the miners with the British Broadcasting Corporation. Every BBC unit of production is uneconomic. The BBC has no super-pits as the miners have. If all the radio stations that have sprung up in the past decade had to live or die according to the philosophy, under which the Prime Minister say pits must operate, every one would close. The same is true of large sections of British industry.

I hear solicitors say, "I wouldn't support the miners' strike. Every single miner is living off the back of the taxpayer." When people tell me that the mines should make a profit or be closed, I ask them where they work. Nine times out of ten they work in an industry that receives a massive subsidy from the Government or which is fiddling the books, either in a fashion that is allowed by the law or in some other ways, such as fiddling tax and capital allowances. None of the advanced factories have been built by an entrepreneur who is carrying out the Prime Minister's philosophy of "make a profit or go under"; they have been built by taxpayers. How are they filled with equipment? Money for that also comes from taxpayers. Taxpayers subsidise those factories up to the hilt. That applies throughout the British economy.

Every multiple store that uses cheap labour under the youth training scheme is subsidised. The £25 a week is paid for by taxpayers. The miners are not asking for as much as that. They do not want to be treated as well as that. We are not pleading a special case.

Most ironic is the fact that the so-called super-efficient oil industry is also receiving taxpayers' money. That is according to The Daily Telegraph of today. Most people imagine that oil companies can manage well, but, they have now run into difficult strata underground, just as we do in pits. Because some pits in south Wales are more difficult to mine, it costs more to extract the coal. The oil companies started with big economic pools of oil and have now drained most of them. The Daily Telegraph states that there is a rush for North sea oil licences. It continues:

> "Companies have been encouraged by the tax incentives aimed at encouraging offshore development, and the Government's anxiety to see the development of the smaller finds now accounting for most of the discoveries and the [illegible] of exploration of deeper waters."

That is exactly the problem of the so-called uneconomic pits. We have deep pits with small, narrow seams, but because the oil company is primarily in the private sector, it will get tax handouts to develop small, uneconomic pools of oil.

There is hardly a segment of the British economy that is not subsidised to some extent. Therefore, the miners are not receiving anything extra from the Government. Perhaps the most important and easiest comparison is with the Common Market. I know that the Leader of the House does not like it. On many occasions we trooped through the Lobbies against it in 1971 and 1972. I think we voted 36 times out of 36.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I voted more often than the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Skinner: No, I was there every time. I did not miss one vote, nor did the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). I am still opposed to the Common Market. The Common Market is up to its neck in debt. If the Government applied the same rule of thumb to the Common Market as they do to the mines, it would have been closed yesterday.

This autumn, the Common Market asked for more money from Britain and the other countries. The Community treats us with contempt. During the past few days, a couple of Common Market commissioners, because they are so contemptuous of the way they operate and because they have mechanisms that allow them to do what they wish, were promoted to vice-president for three weeks to increase their pensions by £2,500 a year. Yet the Government talk about mines having to make a profit.

[Mr. Skinner]

The most startling example of the Government's double standards was mentioned in the House on Monday. A gold bullion mine, Johnson Matthey Bankers, discovered that it reserves were exhausted in the last few days of September, yet it traded when it knew that it was insolvent. The Government decided to prop it up to the tune of £75 million so that their friends in the City could stay in business——

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Rubbish.

Mr. Skinner: It is not rubbish. I remember the night —30 September—when 200 people were brought to the Bank of England in Threadneedle street. There was no ballot. They did not bring in all the investors, and some of them were not even contacted by telephone. It was the most undemocratic procedure that has been carried out in the City, although it has seen a few in its time. Those 200 square briefcases went to the Bank of England to concoct a deal which the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by a nod and a wink, had said they could, to patch up the bank. It could not be allowed to fail because others would have fallen like dominoes. They have managed to hold it together since with taxpayers' money.

That is why we should have a debate on the miners before the recess. It will save money. There has been much talk about the public sector borrowing requirement. There is always one totem pole that must be saved. Since I have been a Member of Parliament, we have had to have wage restrictions to stop the value of the pound increasing; we have had incomes policies to stop the pound decreasing in value; and the same is true now of the PSBR.

Contrary to what the press and the media say, at the last ACAS meeting the members of the NUM executive said, "We will accept the final suggestion from ACAS." The media give the impression that the NUM turned down that proposal. That is a lie. Scargill, Heathfield and McGahey agreed to the last ACAS proposal. In Wales and the peripheral areas, where the miners know that there will be massive closures if MacGregor and the Prime Minister get their way, they will stay out and fight.

The Government have had some luck during the past 40 weeks. They have had to settle many pay claims from other trade unions because they do not want two major industrial disputes at the same time. But that will not continue for ever. I hope that they realise that, as the new pay rounds go through, there will be further industrial action on different fronts. They will not give in constantly. NACODS has turned down the first offer of 5·2 per cent., and I am encouraging that union to fight until it obtains a better deal and to take action if necessary. The Government will not be able to buy off those unions for ever.

I am confident that if the miners of Wales, Scotland and all the British coalfields, including Yorkshire, stand their ground, we can win this battle. But it is a scandal that the British taxpayer has been asked to pay £5,000 million to back the Prime Minister in a war of attrition against the miners. That represents £100 for every man, woman and child in the country. That is what everyone has paid until now to finance a strike that was started by the Government and by MacGregor. However, provided that we can maintain our resolve and determination, we shall win the fight.

9.15 pm

Mr. Christopher Murphy (Welwyn Hatfield): Before the House rises for the Christmas recess, it should have the opportunity to address itself to a number of issues connected with certain national services provided for our constituents. If this proves not to be possible during Advent, perhaps, after Epiphany, parliamentary time could be found to advantage.

On the Order Paper, in my name, is early-day motion 208 on the future of the pharmaceutical industry. This would provide a chance for wide-ranging discussions not only on the National Health Service, but on the contribution of drug manufacturers to the medical requirements of our citizens. My motion states:

"That this House, while recognising the need for value for money in the National Health Service and the possible rôle that generic drug substitution may have in achieving this, nevertheless urges Her Majesty's Government to give fullest consideration to the consequences of mandatory prescribing for the current and future strength and success of the pharmaceutical industry and of companies such as Roche, both in terms of ability to engage in continuing research and development and of satisfying the requirements of patient care."

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will immediately recall that Roche is a major employer in my constituency, as are other companies such as Smith, Kline and French, and that the pharmaceutical industry is an important contributor to the health—in more ways than one—of Hertfordshire. I very much welcome the fact that the Government have recognised the need for a consultation process over such a fundamental change in NHS policy, and I trust that the concerns expressed by Roche and its employees, together with those of the medical profession, will be given the attention that they undoubtedly deserve.

A further aspect of the NHS, and the subject of current parliamentary questions from me, is the planned development of the Welfield site in Hatfield for the expansion of geriatric and other patient care by the health authority. The recognition of the increased needs of the elderly in mid-Hertfordshire is very much to be applauded, and has been advocated by me and relevant individuals and organisations for the past five years or more. It is firmly to be hoped that the forthcoming inquiry will ensure the go-ahead for this much needed additional facility.

Other national services that are constantly the subject of the concern and scrutiny of my constituents are those that provide many of the public utilities—in particular, gas, electricity, telephone and water. On the latter, I am especially gratified that, after I have campaigned since my election to Parliament for the greater availability of water meters, the Government recently responded in this House by announcing a joint study between the water industry and the Department of the Environment on the possible extension of water metering generally to households.

Also on the Order Paper in my name is a private Member's Bill, the Standing Charges (Abolition) Bill, which is awaiting a Second Reading debate. This too would provide a chance for a wide-ranging discussion not only of the public utilities, but of the unfairness of the creation, in effect, of another tax without recognition of the ability to pay or of the level of consumption. My Bill seeks to abolish the levying of public utility standing charges.

My right hon. Friend will, I am sure, be aware that a typical family pays almost £3 a week in standing charges for gas, electricity, telephone and water before enjoying the benefit of any of those facilities. The net result is to impose a flat rate burden, which often falls most heavily on those least able to bear it.

Although the possible consequences of my measure would be a rise in the price of units used, it has been estimated that nearly two thirds of consumers would be better off by such a fairer system. If one considers the case of the elderly, an even greater number of them would gain from such a change, and this would be of special value in Welwyn/Hatfield, which has a growing pensioner population especially anxious about the cost of such services, on which it is increasingly dependent.

If I recognise the limitations on the time available before the House rises for the coming recess for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, I am certain that he will appreciate that this is a sign of yuletide goodwill to all men. However, may I encourage him during the 12 days of Christmas, to find a moment to reflect and make a new year's resolution to provide the opportunities that I have shown, albeit briefly, are needed?

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): Before the House rises for the Christmas recess I hope that it will seize the opportunity at its disposal to save life. Shortly after being elected to this place I was extremely disappointed when the House had an opportunity to save life but voted against the restoration of capital punishment. Because of its failure to act, murder as a crime goes unchecked and has, indeed, increased.

Another type of murder is committed thoughout the world, and especially in Britain — abortion. A few weeks ago, I saw a film called "The Silent Scream" and witnessed the calculated destruction of a human being and the dismemberment and the extraction of an unborn baby from its mother's womb. I saw abortion take place, and the ultrasound film gave me an inside view of what happens during that operation. What a contrast it was to the delight I experienced early this year when my wife gave birth to our first child, and I had the joy of understanding a little of the miracle of life.

The author of "The Silent Scream", Dr. Bernard Nathanson, used to run the biggest abortion clinic in the world and between 1968 and 1978 presided over 100,000 abortions. Today, Dr. Nathanson no longer campaigns for abortion but instead condemns it. He now believes that human life before birth is human life and that abortion destroys human babies. Thanks to the work of the three scientists and Nobel prize winners, Crick, Howell and Watson we now know that at conception something completely new is created, which can be traced from then on in an unbroken line of form and substance through birth, development and adulthood. Everything that a human individual will be is present in the first cell that is created by the fusion of the male sperm and the female ovum. Left in the correct environment, the early human being will grow and develop. By 11 weeks, the foetus is clearly recognisable as a human baby. A baby at that stage of gestation was aborted in Dr. Nathanson's ultrasound film.

The science of foetology has given us a wealth of information about unborn human life, yet we still question the validity of those babies. No one doubted the humanity of Louise Brown when she was created in vitro, and scientists witnessed the beginning of new life. We question human life only when it is unwanted and inconvenient and the decision is made to abort it. However, we cannot pick and choose about human life and say who is human and who is not. In 1983, we destroyed more than 171,000 babies by abortion in Britain. Numerous women have been profoundly physically and emotionally scarred by abortion.

Abortion is not always a safe or simple operation. The fact that abortion is legal does not make it safe. In May 1980, Dr. Robert Winston of London's Hammersmith hospital said:

> "Abortion, even done by the best hands, can lead to infection of the tubes and ultimately infertility."

There are those who fear that we shall return to back street abortions if there is any restriction on current legislation, yet, in countries where there has been a tightening of the abortion laws there has not been an increase in abortion deaths.

Abortion is not the great panacea for all social ills. A liberal abortion law has not fulfilled the promise of the slogan, "Every child a wanted child". According to the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, the number of children physically injured by their parents rose by almost 50 per cent. in the three years to 1982. Many aspects of the Warnock report have been profoundly disturbing to people throughout the country, so I am delighted that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) is to introduce a private Member's Bill concerning one aspect of the report. However, I feel that the Government should take urgent action, especially on the whole issue of abortion.

I would not wish to go into gory details, but the instrument the abortionist uses enters the womb and the baby rears away in anguish. As the instrument moves towards the child, it can clearly be seen to open its mouth in terror; so the title "The Silent Scream" is not used for dramatic effect. I challenge every hon. Member to see the film, remain unmoved by it and still be prepared to be a party to the murder of the innocent. Abortion should not be used as a form of birth control.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): In this Session we have had considerable debate about certain aspects of the public and private sectors. There is, of course, a third vitally important sector—the charitable and voluntary sector—about which we have had little discussion. The House should have a debate on that before it adjourns for the Christmas recess.

There is a wide range of subjects which at the moment are sources of anxiety and which, if dealt with piecemeal, will have an unsatisfactory conclusion. There is considerable anxiety about the role of the Charity Commission. Set up in the middle of the 19th century as a branch of the High Court, the Charity Commission has a large staff, but everyone says that the commission is incapable of carrying out the job for which it is intended because it has inappropriate and insufficient staff. That must be a matter of anxiety.

In the summer there was a short debate on a private Member's motion, during which the Home Office Minister with responsibility for charities admitted that he was anxious about charity fund raisers and the way in which they can often take a disproportionately large share of the money that they raise. There have been disturbing examples—fortunately, few and far between—of people who raise money dishonestly for charity or claim to be raising money for charity when they are not. My right hon. Friend the Minister promised to study the matter seriously. It would be good if some evidence of that scrutiny were to be forthcoming.

It is possible to change some of the ways in which charities are financed. As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House is aware, not long ago a group of hon. Members produced a pamphlet which contained some suggestions that deserve a response from the Government.

An important question is: what will happen to charities and charitable funding—in this I include the voluntary organisations, some of which are not charities—when the metropolitan counties and the GLC are abolished? I have no doubt that they will have a prosperous and useful future. In their dying stages, the GLC and metropolitan counties have taken enormous pains to finance a wide range of voluntary organisations and charities so that they may widen their constituency base. When those organisations have disappeared, are the Government confident that they can ensure that a great deal of the work that is being carried out will be continued successfully?

I should declare an interest as a trustee of Community Service Volunteers. In that organisation, and in a great many others, it has been well demonstrated that it can be cost effective to deploy volunteers on socially acceptable and useful work which costs considerably less than some of the Manpower Services Commission's schemes and with results that bear comparison with them.

I should like my right hon. Friend in his reply to address himself to the fact that each time we go to the Government with a suggestion about expanding the work that is being done by the organisations I have described, we are often unsuccessful, even when the case seems to be unanswerable.

9.30 pm

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Before we adjourn for the Christmas recess I wish to talk about road safety, especially drinking and driving. I am particularly concerned about the Government's campaign to "Keep low", which seems to suggest that we should not drink too much before we drive. That is unacceptable. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Transport has made it clear that she is against drinking and then driving but, unfortunately, the campaign message does not give that impression. I remain concerned, even now, that one should not drink and drive.

I am concerned also that so many accidents occur on stretches of motorway that are unlit. Recently and tragically, 10 people lost their lives on the M25. That happened on one day last week when there was thick fog. I do not wish to prejudge the inquiry, but I maintain and submit that if the M25 had been properly lit throughout its length, with the warning signals working and speed limits being adhered to strictly, there might have been a different result. With the Lion Intoximeter 3000 breathalyser working properly, or an alternative breathalyser, perhaps some of those who might have been tempted to have a little too much to drink, or who should not have been on the roads at the time, would have taken notice of the prevailing conditions and slowed down, or stopped driving altogether.

There are 1,688 miles of motorway in England and Wales and only 338 miles are illuminated. It seems obvious that if the remaining stretches were illuminated there would be a safer system and lives would be saved. In a written answer to me on 12 December it was estimated that the cost of lighting the remaining unlit stretches of Britain's motorways would be £90 million. Running costs would be £9 million. When the M25 is completed, an additional £7 million would enable it to be fully illuminated. Having a Leicester constituency, I travel on the M1 frequently, and it seems that it would cost £9 million to illuminate the stretches which are presently dark.

Speaking of the M1 and Leicester, I should say that I shall not be taking part in the debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill which will be initiated by the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner), but I can assure the House that I remain totally in favour of rate capping and against any campaign by Leicester city council to oppose it. I shall continue to fight for my constituents, who I know support the idea that the rates will be much fairer with rate capping.

Each night-time fatal accident on our motorways in 1983 cost £205,460. With 206 people on average being killed each year on our motorways, we would be saving money by ensuring that lights were provided along all stretches of motorway.

I shall resume my place as I know that others wish to speak. However, I shall be grateful if my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House devotes a part of what I know will be an excellent speech to the state of safety on Britain's roads.

9.33 pm

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): I do not think that the House should adjourn for the Christmas recess until, as my hon. Friends the Members for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) and for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) have argued, it has fully debated the miners' strike and the Government's attack on the National Union of Mineworkers.

The Conservative party's attack on the NUM started before the beginning of the dispute which has continued for 10 months. It goes back to a report which was prepared by the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley), who is now the Secretary of State for Transport. That document was commonly called the Ridley report, and it was leaked in 1978 to The Economist. It showed that the then Conservative Opposition were preparing to attack what they regarded as the main political enemies of a future Tory Government. Those enemies were, of course, trade unions such as the NUM which would refuse to sacrifice jobs and communities at the command of a Conservative Prime Minister and Cabinet.

In such a debate, we should get to grips with the argument that is advanced by the occupants of the Government Front Bench that the miners' dispute started on 6 March when Ian MacGregor of the National Coal Board tried to save the country £135 million of uneconomic spending on the coal industry. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover has said, the Government have wasted nearly £5,000 million, 37 times more than the stated target of the original savings when the dispute began. Had the dispute not taken place, there could have been a £25 a week increase for every registered unemployed person. There could have been a £4 a week decrease in the taxes paid by every working person. I am sure that that would have gained wide support throughout Britain. It is nothing to do with economic or uneconomic pits. The coal board's losses have been adequately torn to bits by reports such as that of Dr. Andrew Glyn of Oxford university.

When I was lucky enough to intervene in the debate about a fortnight ago on the orders for increasing the subvention to the coal industry, I told the Minister that the coal board had to pay interest back to the Government, pensions to retired mineworkers and compensation for subsidence of people's houses, especially in the Nottinghamshire and Mansfield area, caused by pits that might have closed down some years ago. I said that those costs still had to be borne by the industry even if every pit were closed. When I said that those costs as a whole should be borne by the Government, the Minister said that that was not economic sense, and that every business had to bear such costs. If we could remove such things from the coal board's accounts, Cortonwood would be making a profit of £6 per tonne of coal and the industry as a whole would be making a profit. The argument has nowt to do with economic or uneconomic pits. That should be brought out in a debate.

What should also be brought out in a debate on the coal strike and its ramifications is the way in which the Government have been prepared since the mid-1970s to try to take on and destroy the trade union movement, with its ability to protect working people. They thought, in the words of Lord Stockton, that if the brigade of guards of the working class, the NUM, could be cracked first, other workers would be demoralised and despair, and would not stand up and fight.

Two years ago, in what was probably one of the best years for British capitalism for some time, 30 to 40 per cent. of the capacity of major industries such as chemicals, engineering, construction and glass, was laid waste and idle. In the timber and furniture industry, 52 per cent. of the capacity could not be used. The situation has worsened since then and is getting worse under the Government, in the 1980s. The Government are worried about resistance to future massive redundancies, so they want to demoralise the trade unions. It is nowt to do with the tonnes of coal coming out of the ground; it is about destroying the capacity of the trade union movement to fight against the Tory Government.

We should debate that matter before anyone in the House goes home for a couple of weeks' holiday over Christmas while hundreds of thousands of miners and their families suffer. The House should debate the miners' strike rather than adjourn.

9.37 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): We have had the expected but nevertheless welcome series of short and serious speeches that are a feature of these three-hour Adjournment debates. No fewer than 18 hon. Members have raised matters of great concern not only to them and their constituents, but to the House and country. The Leader of the House will have his time cut out to answer them all intelligently.

When we debated the summer recess, the Opposition amended the motion because they did not think it right that hon. Members should be away and unable to influence Government policy for some 13 weeks while the miners' strike continued. It is with dismay and foreboding—a sentiment echoed and amplified by my hon. Friends the Members for Ogmore (Mr. Powell), for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist)—that one has to record the fact that the strike, which began over nine months ago, is still proceeding and we still await the first Government intervention to help to achieve its solution.

Nevertheless, the short break of less than three weeks between 21 December and 9 January is not open to the objections of the summer, and we shall accept the Adjournment motion, although with reservations, in the hope and expectation that we shall have replies to the points raised in the debate.

Many specific questions and grievances were raised today that I would wish to echo and reinforce. I refer, first, to the matter raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin), who brought up the tragic case of the post-Christmas deportation of a Cypriot family in his constituency who have been here for more than 10 years. Indeed, the eldest of Mrs. Halil's three children is 11 years old and was born in the United Kingdom. I had always thought that, in administering the Immigration Act, the Government's general policy was to give more favourable consideration to those who have been in the country for more than 10 years, particularly those who came here before 1 January 1973 when the new Act came into effect. I hope that the Leader of the House will deal with the various points raised and tell us that he has been able to give new and favourable consideration to that particular case.

The second matter was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), and I hope that the Leader of the House will reconsider it extremely carefully. It is wrong that no opportunity has been given and none will be given for the House to debate the important issue of the introduction of fees for entry certificates. It is even more astonishing that the order, which has apparently been laid today and is due to take effect from 1 January when the House is in recess, has escaped scrutiny by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, which met yesterday and which will not have the opportunity to consider the order before it comes into force. It is entirely wrong for Foreign Office Ministers to table an order before that Committee has had the chance to scrutinise it.

The third matter was raised by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). Post office closures affect most of us, and especially those who represent inner city constituencies. The only reason for closures on the scale contemplated is that the Post Office, which is not making any overall loss, has been required in the forthcoming year, under its so-called external financing limit, to make a net contribution to the Treasury of no less than £70 million in addition to all its normal costs and the servicing of its obligations. That is what is putting the pressure on post office services which are especially important in inner city areas and in communities in which a large number of people do not use banks and are heavy users of the various services of the Department of Health and Social Security which are administered through post offices. In many areas, pensioners, the disabled, the unemployed and women with small children will be seriously affected if their local post offices are closed.

In addition to those specific matters, I hope that the Leader of the House will address himself to two main issues. The first is the growing national concern about unemployment which has been reflected in so many speeches today. The seriousness of the problem and the remorseless way in which the numbers have increased is reflected in the pre-Christmas count taken each November for the period of Conservative rule. The figures are 1,259,000 in 1979; 2,016,000 in 1980; 2,770,000 in 1981; 3,063,000 in 1982; 3,084,000 in 1983; and 3,223,000 in November 1984. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Markerfield (Mr. McGuire) pointed out, the underlying trend is still an increase of about 20,000 per month. Moreover, the figures that I have given understate the true extent of unemployment. What is so dismally impressive about those figures is that they have grown larger every year. We are now in the sixth year of the Prime Minister's experiment and there is no sign of the number ceasing to grow, let alone of any reduction in the appalling total.

In 1984 the country has finally begun to wake up to the reality and the cost of what has happened to it. Conservative Members have at last begun to understand that, far from being a temporary expedient in consequence of policies designed to defeat inflation and to create more so-called real jobs, unemployment is endemic in the Government's whole monetarist and deflationary strategy. Many members of the Conservative party now seem to be uneasy about their Government's core policies. We hope to see the effects of that unease as the Session proceeds, not just in revolts on local government capital expenditure, such as there have been and will be, but in a changing attitude towards the role of government and the provision of community and social services generally.

I must also mention the tragedy of drought, hunger and famine not only in Ethiopia, but in vast and growing areas of the African continent. There is a clamant need for immediate action for relief. The British people expect such action from their Government. That is why — as my hon. friend the Member for Bolsover mentioned—they do not understand why the Government have failed to make their own contribution in terms of VAT to the moneys raised by the Band Aid record.

The problem is long-term and deep-seated. There has been plenty of warning. In September 1984 the World Bank, in its third report on sub-Saharan Africa, stated:

"The spectre of disaster. . . confronts Africa and the international community."

It is estimated that the famine in Africa threatens some 35 million people. The Christian West, with its food stores bulging with surplus grain, and other products has a duty to assist, but it has shown little recognition of the scale of the problem, its likely duration or the suffering involved.

The hon. Member for Norfolk, South-West (Sir P. Hawkins) had his own agricultural interests in mind, but he made a strong point when he said that what was needed was a longer-term plan to enable us to assist a continent which is in dire difficulties and will continue to face problems for many years. I hope that the Leader of the House will at least have something encouraging to say on that matter.

9.47 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and the Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): First, I thank the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) for endorsing the adjournment motion. He did so in a somewhat fastifious fashion, but in these difficult times the Treasury Bench is happy to receive support on any basis.

The right hon. Gentleman made some pertinent points. I hope that he will not think me dismissive if I try to contain them within my review of the debate as a whole. About 20 speeches have been made this evening and if I am to cover them all I shall be under a constraint in terms of time.

The right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin), who opened the debate, put with great force the case for Mrs. Halil. I shall refer the matter to the Home Office again. However, I should place on record the fact that, as recently as 1981, Mrs. Halil was deported after her case had been fully considered not only by the immigration appellate authorities, but also by the House of Lords, and that she defied that order by returning illegally, using another name.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, South-East (Mr. Hicks) told us about the problems of the farm college in his county. We all hope for a successful and common-sense resolution of the difficulty. I will draw the attention of my right hon. and hon. Friends to my hon. Friend's belief that an initiative to the new European Commission could prove valuable. Incidentally, we were all transfixed by the revelation that Cornwall has the finest pasture land in the United Kingdom. Clearly that fact is reflected in the margins of dairy farmers in that part of the country, and we will bear it in mind when—as seems regularly to happen—there is another peasants' revolt in the south-west.

My hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) referred to the sad fate of Mr. Alan Russell, who is now languishing in gaol in Libya. My hon. Friend will be encouraged by the fact that the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, was on the Front Bench to hear his comments. I hope that he will take comfort from that fact.

My hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith), who has explained why he has to be absent, ran a trailer for the debate which will take place later today on the television licence fee. I enjoyed my hon. Friend's trenchant comments. Mercifully I am not required to endorse his strictures on the BBC. Nevertheless, he set out what must be the real anxieties. The debate concerns the licence fee charge and the core services of the BBC which should be covered by such a charge, which is regressive in its impact. There is a constructive debate to be had on that matter.

The hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McGuire) opened the topical issue of unemployment, to which the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney also referred. My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) and the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) also contributed on this topic. I accept that this will be a continuing and major feature of political debate in the House as the Session proceeds into 1985. I should like to make just one contribution in the dying days of December. The training programme, which is running at £2 billion a year, and the great emphasis on improving the quality of the youth training scheme are an integral part of the campaign to provide a better pattern of employment. Much will turn on the mobility of our society and its response to the sharp economic challenge, which is wholly unavoidable for a nation with such a maritime and overseas trading tradition. Our ability to respond to such a challenge, which is the opposite of what is promulgated in terms of a protectionist resolution of the coal dispute, will be at the heart of the public debate of this matter.

I should like now to deal with the important issue of fees for entry certificates. I fear that the fox on which I was relying was well and truly shot, because I understand that the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) is not proceeding with the plan for a debate on this issue tonight. I fully understand that the hon. Gentleman has pursued this matter. As he said, he has raised three points of order which have been conducted with not uncommon for him but nevertheless uncommon courtesy in these times. I shall of course refer what he said to the Foreign Office. I entirely understand that his anxieties are held with great conviction.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) brought a note of philosophy to our proceedings. I do not believe in the politics of crusade. Crusades are all right for a while but then one has to change gear. The consolidation that follows a crusade begins to anchor a new climate in which politics are debated and in which social democracy gradually replaces the more exotic forms of Socialism which adorn the Opposition Front Bench—although not at the moment. My hon. Friend and I are at one in believing that we have a greater task in this than perpetual revolution. However, it was a little unnecessary for him to bring an echo of our previous debate into this one. I thought that all passion had been spent. He said that his vote had been cast with the utmost reluctance and reservation. I must inform him that the Whips Office, I suspect rather like the England changing room, goes on the homely philosophy that they all look the same on the score board.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) raised important issues concerning the Post Office, which I shall refer to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and fearful cases of recent crime. The collection of central records is always a delicate issue and for someone who sits the Bench that he occupies, it must be especially delicate. He will appreciate, therefore, that this is an issue on which we must try to have a reflective rather than an instant response.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Stokes) made some pertinent comments on the present qualities of the Church of England. I do not think that there is any requirement of me other than to note them, but I cannot resist the temptation to say that I have a lively sympathy with what he argued. It is perfectly proper for the Church to take a lively interest in contemporary social, economic and, perhaps, political matters. However, in the 18th century, when the Church became so other-worldly, it was quite unable to identify the spiritual poverty which brought forth the Methodist revival. There is a spiritual challenge, which can easily be overlooked, if the Church concentrates too heavily on other dimensions of its natural work.

The coal industry dispute was featured by the hon. Members for Ogmore (Mr. Powell), for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist). There can be a considerable diversion into matters of accountancy, but I suspect that charges of faulty accountancy will not long outface the basic fact that at present a subsidy of £1,300 million annually is being paid to the coal industry.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington) rose——

Mr. Biffen: I am sorry, but I shall not give way. I have an obligation to the House.

There are sound arguments for the economic concentration of the coal industry around those areas where it can perform to greatest effect. We have experienced this in respect of textiles, engineering, shipbuilding and footwear. It is simply quite untrue to say that we can insulate the coal industry from these other factors.

The hon. Member for Bolsover, whose contributions did not suffer from any understatement, feels a certain anxiety. But the strategems of the Government are not undermining his position. It is the action of one third of the coal miners who are still at work aided particularly by the 16,500 who have returned in recent weeks. They are also aided by those, predominantly trade unionists, engaged in the movement of coal, those engaged in the unloading of record shipments of imported coal and those at the power stations undertaking coalburn. The organised industrial class is undermining the position of the hon. Member for Bolsover, and although I am happy for those skills to be visited on the Government, I must tell him that is how it is.

My hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) referred to the problems in the pharmaceutical industry. My heart has other causes to which it warms more immediately, but none the less this is an important issue to my hon. Friend, who has a major pharmaceutical producer in his constituency. He is perfectly right to say that its voice, as well as many others, must be heard.

I note the enthusiasm for water meters. I only hope that that is not what at first sight seems to be an easy solution to proper levels of charging in that industry, because the House will learn to address itself increasingly to this issue over the coming years.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) made a powerful speech on abortion. While I can offer no promises of Government legislation, the Warnock proposals will come before the House in the new year, in the form of a private Member's Bill prepared by my right hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) —[HON. MEMBERS: "Right hon. Friend?"] Yes, why not?

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) again expressed great interest in charities——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Biffen: Happy Christmas.

Mr. Speaker: And the same to the right hon. Gentleman.

It being three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, Mr. Speaker put the Question pursuant to Standing Order No. 12 (Periodic Adjournments).

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House at its rising on Friday 21st December do adjourn till Wednesday 9th January.

Orders of the Day

CONSOLIDATED FUND BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Question, That the Bill be now read a Second time, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 113 (Consolidated Fund Bills), and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Nuclear Weapons (Tests)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lang.]

9.59 pm

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): Between 1952 and 1958 the United Kingdom conducted 21 atmospheric nuclear weapons tests at the Monte Bello Islands off the coast of Western Australia, at Emu Field and Maralinga in South Australia and at Malden Island and Christmas Island in the south Pacific. In addition, between 1953 and 1963 experiments in which some radioactive materials were dispersed into the environment were carried out in South Australia. Clean-up operations were carried out in 1963, 1964 and 1967. For some years there has been considerable concern about the effects of those nuclear weapons tests by Britain in Australia and the south Pacific, about the amount of radiation emitted during the tests, about the precautions that were or were not taken during the tests, about the contamination of the land and the natural environment by the nuclear explosions, about the damaging effect on the local aborigine population and about the damage that these tests may have done to the health of the servicemen and civilians who participated in them. I am sure that we should have the fullest information about the nature of these tests, about how they were conducted and about the results of the tests.

As a result of the concern that has been expressed in this country and particularly in Australia, in March 1983 the Australian Government asked Professor Kerr of Sydney university to look into the studies that had previously been carried out in Australia. Professor Kerr concluded that important data had not been considered by these studies and recommended that a full-scale Royal Commission should be set up. That Royal Commission was set up in July of this year under Mr. James McClelland. The setting-up of that Royal Commission reflects the widespread concern and anxiety in Australia about the reports of the precautions that were or were not taken, about the effects of the tests on the aborigine population and about the damage to the environment.

It was enormously important that the Australian Government took the decision to set up a Royal Commission. As the Minister will acknowledge, there was criticism in the first few months of the extent to which the British Government would co-operate with the commission. The Minister has recently indicated that some of the inhibitions of the Official Secrets Act will be relaxed to enable, in certain conditions, some people to give evidence about what happened during the tests. The Royal Commission is coming to this country next month. The Government have stated that they intend to give evidence to the commission. It is very important that the Minister should advise us about the information that will be made available by the British Government to the Royal Commission. There is no longer a case for secrecy. Surely the commission and the public are entitled to all the information about those tests.

Let me deal with the evidence that has been given in Australia to the Royal Commission. I make no apology for quoting again from some of the press reports in this country of the evidence given in Australia to the Royal Commission. A number of reports appeared in The Times from Mr. Tony Duboudin in Melbourne. One said:

"The highlight of last week's hearing was the allegation on Wednesday by a former Army lance-corporal who told the inquiry that 200 British and Australian servicemen were threatened with court-martial and the possibility of a firing squad if they recounted an incident in which an aboriginal family wandered into the Marcoo nuclear bomb testing site at Maralinga in the outback of South Australia.

Mr. John Hutton told the commission that on one morning in May, 1956, while he was putting on protective clothing in a caravan before going out into a 'dirty' area around the Marcoo site to help scientists, he saw an Aboriginal man aged about 20, through the window of the caravan, standing in the contaminated area."

That was about seven months after a nuclear bomb had been tested there. Another report said:

"The bodies of five Aboriginals were found near an Atomic bomb test site in South Australia in 1956, the Royal Commission into British nuclear tests in Australia was told in Brisbane yesterday.

Mr. Terry Troom, a former soldier, said he found the bodies of two adults and three children while on a mail run with five other soldiers. He described the bodies as being all skin and bones and said they were lying under a tree . . . After his commanding officer was told of the discovery, he believed that bulldozers were moved into the area."

I quoted reports of the evidence given to the Royal Commission in a debate on the Army just after the summer recess. The Minister who replied to the debate did not refer to my speech—I make no criticism of that—so I wrote to the Secretary of State for Defence, and the Minister of State for Defence Procurement, who is to reply to this debate, wrote to me:

"As regards the 'horrific' reports in the media of allegations made to the Royal Commission, most of the allegations are not new and many of them first surfaced during the time of the tests. However, I can assure you that Her Majesty's Government is not goin to allow the Royal Commission to remain ignorant of the true facts. I have already announced that the UK is to seek to be represented before the Commission and that it intends to give evidence."

I welcome the fact that the United Kingdom is to appear before the Commission, but no matter how old the allegations may be, they are important and we are entitled to ask whether there is any basis for the reports in the media. They are horrific and alarming and they cast great doubt on the validity of the claim that all adequate precautions were taken. It is not sufficient to say that the allegations were made at the time of the tests and have been repeated since then.

It is important that we have a statement from the people who know, and the Government have the data and the records and, I expect, full and detailed reports of everything that happened during the tests. Will the Minister tell us whether there is some basis for the horrific reports, or will the Government wait until they are represented at the commission in January before telling us whether there is truth in the disturbing evidence given, in the main, by Australian ex-service men?

There is substantial worry that adequate precautions were not taken during all the tests in Australia and the south Pacific. The Ministry of Defence has repeatedly assured us that the precautions were adequate, but it is surprising that many British ex-service men have stated that they did not wear protective clothing and that proper precautions were not taken.

I shall not quote the statements of all those service men, but there are fears that the instruments for measuring radiation—the badges that were supposed to be worn by service men—were not worn regularly and that in many instances the radiation to which service men were exposed was not recorded. Are the anxieties that are being expressed, particularly in Australia, about the measurement of radiation valid? Was the measurement of radiation as reliable as the Government have maintained?

Earlier I mentioned the contamination of the land, and I think particularly of the position at Maralinga. To what extent has the land and environment been damaged for a very long time by the radiation and the plutonium left there? How successful were the cleaning-up operations? Are the reports true that the land is still contaminated and that a very difficult and costly operation will have to be carried out if there is to be any hope of reducing the level of contamination? What about the reports that some of the aborigine population have been exposed to very high and damaging levels of radiation?

Above all, concern in this country has naturally focused on the very large number of service men who believe that their health has been damaged as a result of participating in the tests.

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Adam Butler): I know that the hon. Gentleman has made a very considerable study of this problem. However, he has just referred to a very large number of service men who believe that their present illnesses are due to the tests. Can he put any figure on that?

Mr. Strang: The figure that I have seen reported is up to 300. However, I should be the first to acknowledge that much of that data is dependent on the valiant efforts made by the British Nuclear Test Veterans Association to collect information. Whatever the figure is, we must expect it to represent only a fraction of the number of those who have suffered from leukaemia. As I have made clear in every debate on this subject in which I have spoken, I accept that the proposition that those tests damaged the health of those service men or civilians is unproven. Of course, in the normal course of events, a significant proportion of those service men, particularly at their present age, might be expected to die of leukaemia and other diseases that can be caused by radiation. But we cannot dismiss the other possibility.

The Government have set up an investigation. We are grateful for the very full note that I believe the Minister provided all Members of Parliament with on 6 December. It contains some useful information and data on the actual yields of all the tests. But it is somewhat regrettable that he should insist on asserting that he is convinced that no damage has been done to those service men. The last paragraph of the letter from the Minister dated 20 November 1984, which I quoted from earlier, states:

"In conclusion, I repeat that I have every confidence that the test programmes in Australia were planned meticulously and conducted responsibly, and that the safety precautions adopted at the time were more than adequate to ensure that no one should have suffered harm arising from the ionising radiation produced during the test programmes."

Some service men believe that in making that statement, the Minister is in danger of prejudging the outcome of the inquiry being carried out by the National Radiological Protection Board. The Minister is well aware of the work that the BNTVA, and Mr. McGinley as chairman, have put into this subject. Indeed, I hope that he will say something about the progress of that investigation. But I together with the BNTVA and many other people in this country still believe that, given the nature of the tests, the fears that have been expressed and the claims that have been made by those service men, it is not appropriate that the survey should be carried out on the basis of information supplied by the Ministry of Defence.

The Ministry supplies the names and addresses of the service men who participated in the tests. In addition, the Ministry of Defence supplies the names of the control group. I do not cast aspersions on the Ministry but the survey is basically being conducted by the Government. On the one hand the Ministry of Defence provides the data about the service men and civilians who participated in the tests and on the other it provides the data about the control group.

Secondly, the study is being carried out by a body that is funded by the Government and, at the same time, all its members are appointed by the Government. We respect the work of the people in the Ministry and in the NRPB, but it is to misjudge the situation to believe that that type of inquiry is adequate.

Most important of all, the service men should have full confidence in the inquiry. Therefore, I again stress to the Minister that we want a proper independent inquiry. If we cannot have a British Royal Commission, we should have a national committee, with leading scientists and experts drawn from universities, outside the Government machine, who will have full responsibility for supervising and conducting the inquiry and who will publish the results. That is the minimum that we require.

It is surely somewhat ironic that it is the Australian Government who have appointed a Royal Commission. The Australian Government did not carry out the tests, nor do they have the great mass of information about the tests and the way in which they were conducted. Those matters are entirely the responsibility of the British Government. Instead of the Australian Government setting up the Royal Commission—I welcome that—it should be the British Government. I hope that the Government will look again at that.

In conclusion, many hon. Members are taking an increasing interest in this subject. On the basis of the information that is now coming out in Australia there are grounds, to put it mildly, for real concern. I hope that the Government will think again about the secrecy that they are still applying to the tests, which took place about 30 years ago. There is an overwhelming case for making all the information public and enabling us to have a proper independent appraisal of everything that happened in relation to the conduct of the tests.

10.18 pm

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang), on winning first place in what some would call the ballot but which I prefer to call the lottery. This is not a party-political issue. Therefore, I am disappointed at the attendance in the House tonight. I regret that one has to wait for the debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill in order to discuss the issue at all.

We must recognise the loyalty and allegiance, good work and sterling service of the men and women who, some 30 or 35 years ago, served their country by willingly, but in ignorance, allowing themselves to be exposed to a form of experimentation which was quite unreal at the time. Most, but not all, of them were compelled to expose themselves to radiation without any form of protective equipment. Some of them merely wore a beret, pair of shorts and sandals. They followed an instruction to turn their backs to the explosion, which was x miles away and to cover their eyes. They were told that no harm would come to them. We are reliably informed that William Penney was advised to take out insurance to guard against future handicap. I have a file of documents with me that make that clear. Sadly, he is unable to remember such a reference, but we have evidence of it.

We cannot blame the scientists, because they could not know any more than they did at the time, and we have the benefit of hindsight. I have no vindictiveness in my heart. It is important that we realise that the scientists were exploring an element of creation, the depth and danger of which they did not realise. Thirty years after the explosion we must assess who bears the responsibility for it. That is why I strongly emphasise that this is not a party political issue.

It is incumbent upon every hon. Member to examine the population in his constituency, especially the majority of the population who, as the Prime Minister said, served their country, "well and truly". She said that their good and faithful service would never be forgotten. It is important that all hon. Members recognise that, because we must consider the matter without any form of party political bias or emphasis.

We now have a middle-aged element in society which is experiencing an inordinately high incidence of disability —not necessarily deformity—in themselves and in their offspring. I remember that the Minister asked how we could verify the statistics, and I shall come back to that. If disability is in one's offspring, one can expect to see further evidence of it in future generations.

This afternoon I heard of a man who, during his first marriage, had three deformed children. That is unusual, but not so unusual that one would justify it statistically by exposure to a nuclear test. However, he divorced, remarried and had a further two deformed offspring, both of whom were deformed in almost the same way. Again, that is statistically questionable. But when one pools the available evidence, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East referred—he demurred to the House because he did not wish to occupy too much of the time —there is a statistical overburden which is unquestionable, provided that one can gain access to the service and medical records of those males and females who were engaged in or exposed to the tests.

That is where I question not only this Government but previous Governments of all political persuasions. Not only has the provision of service and medical records been seriously hampered, but the records have been short of information. In addition, the service records have been carefully falsified. There are cases of entire ships' complements for which there is no record of their having been in the zone but whose members say that they took part in the preparation for or the clearing up of those operations.

Secrecy plays a major part in this matter. No one could argue tonight — the Minister least of all — thet those people do not deserve a fair deal. What we need in the Chamber tonight is the rare commodity of complete honesty among hon. Members of all parties. First, the service records of those people must be clearly outlined. We must obtain information about the medical treatment and examination that they received, and the locations of that medical treatment. We have evidence that many of them were shipped out to establishments run by other Governments. If that information is not provided, then, as the Minister said to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East, we have no means of checking the statistics. If we do not have a base from which to start, we cannot come to a reasonable conclusion.

Britain has legislation—the Crown Proceedings Act 1947—which precludes a member of the armed services from taking legislative action to seek reparation for negligence during his period of service to the Crown. That legislation was dreamed up at a time when we had no knowledge of such operations, and no idea that they might occur in future. In this discussion we are considering a legacy of something about which we could not have known. Will the Government consider amending the Crown Proceedings Act to take account of the almost anachronistic failure of the legislation to cater for the future not only of those who have given good service to the Crown but of their offspring and future generations? We are talking about the suffering, of which we were unaware 30 years ago, of youngsters who may not be allowed to have children and who may have deformities that are even worse than those of their parents or grandparents. We are talking about things about which a legislative body has never before been forced to consider.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East referred to the Royal Commission which is coming here on 3 January. I would have hoped that the survey being conducted by the National Radiological Protection Board would, after all this time, have had some evidence to present, which would illuminate the British aspects of these tests. Sadly, it would appear from my examination of the NRPB survey that the movement of staff has been so grotesquely rapid that the whole team has changed from top to bottom at least once, if not twice. It is unfortunate that many questions that will be asked will be body-swerved on the basis that we have insufficient evidence.

We have so much evidence that it is important that it be examined in depth. A Royal Commission should have been set up, and it would have been welcomed. We must examine the matter more definitely. Ultimately, the people who were in the front line will die out the longer this goes on. We have a responsibility not only to them but to the generations after them.

I beg the Minister to listen carefully to what we say on behalf of the people who gave us such allegiance and loyalty. Will he give a commitment on behalf of the Government—because we now know facts that we did not before—that, in the words of the Prime Minister, he will listen to what has been said on behalf of those who served our country so well.

Nuclear Weapons (Tests)

10.32 pm

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on securing this debate. I agree with some of what the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) said. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East said that he was disappointed that there are so few hon. Members to listen to the debate. As he will recall, I initiated two previous debates on this subject, in July 1983 and March 1984, one of which took place at 4.31 am, and the other at 3.49 am, when there were about half the number of hon. Members who are present tonight. Statistically, that is an improvement, and I hope that the Minister will bear that in mind.

I think that the Minister will accept that this issue will not go away, even though some would suggest that our Government will procrastinate and draw the matter out. The Australian Government cannot be accused of that, and, acting as a stalking horse against our Government, they have ensured that this matter will run and run. Our Government have become rather besotted by the ludicrous new doctrine of inherited culpability. The Government worry too much about the sins of their forefathers. No one is accusing them of having been involved in the events 30 years ago. An all-party group is deeply interested in this subject, and the Government will know that the group thinks not that the Government were involved in the terrible events of those days but that they have done insufficient to make information available, and have tried to cover up for the sins of those who went before them.

I should like to contrast the approaches of the Australian and British Governments in dealing with this matter. First, I shall examine the remedies that are open to aggrieved service men and their families. The hon. Member for Stockton, North rightly referred to section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947, with which the Minister will be familiar. When hon. Members have regularly suggested that that legislation should be amended to allow people in the position of these service men to sue the Government, the Ministry of Defence has always maintained that that would lead to a reduction in morale and discipline among our service men, and for that reason the Act could not be amended. I refute that idea. Although I accept that that legislation was introduced to cover the second world war and that in wartime it cannot be right that a Government should be expected to recompense the relatives of loved ones who are aggrieved because of injuries sustained, nevertheless, in peacetime different criteria apply.

It is ironic that in Australia service men who served cheek by jowl with our service men in those tests have had the right to take their Government to court, and in one case have gained redress in the courts, while our service men have been denied that privilege. that is ironic, especially in view of the dubious reason given, that that course would lead to some loss of morale or discipline among our men. It would therefore appear that the Australian Government have a far greater respect for the rights of their service men than we have for ours. I suggest that that fact points to the need for a bill of rights or at least the incorporation of the European Convention on Human Rights in our statute books. If that were done, any Government who acted in this way would be in breach of their obligations.

The second contrast between the way in which the British and Australian Governments have tackled this problem concerns the availability of information. As the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East said, the Australians have established a Royal Commission. It is ironic that we should have the same Queen but that different ground rules should apply. It is a paradox that the Australians should have established a Royal Commission but that what is good enough in Australia is not good enough here.

In Britain, secrecy is the order of the day, and that fact obviously points to the need in the dying moments of this year for freedom of information legislation. It is one of the tragedies of this year that we have not moved towards providing greater access to information for our citizens. Far too much of this country's business is done in a hole in a corner, and we are plagued far too much by the national obsession for and disease of secrecy, of keeping knowledge from people who have a right to know.

When the Minister intervened during the speech of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East and suggested that the hon. Gentleman should provide the statistics in this debate, that seemed to underline again the extraordinary fact that, because of the way in which the system works, the Opposition are denied access to the information that would have allowed them to answer such a question. The people are really asking only for the right to that information, so that they can come to the type of judgments which the Minister constantly tells them they should make. The Minister tells us that, statistically, what happens here is no worse than it would be for any other part of the population, and all the rest of it. We have heard those arguments repeated from the Dispatch Box.

Mr. Butler: I do not believe that that charge can be made in this case. The hon. Members for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) and for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) have studied this matter. The question I asked the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East involved how many people the hon. Gentleman thought were claiming that their present ill-health resulted from the tests. That information is not available to the Government, so it is not information that the Government can be accused of withholding.

Mr. Alton: When will that information be available? For 18 months, the Government have been giving us different figures. I suggested:

"The figures ranged from 13,500 to 20,000 people, and they were given in the space of only six months." — [Official Report, 12 March 1984; Vol. 56, c. 187.]

That was the answer given by the Prime Minister. Clearly, if the Government are not aware how many people will be surveyed and how many were involved in those tests, how can hon. Members expect to have any idea of what constitutes a reliable statistical sample or survey?

The third contrast that I should like to make between the way that the British and Australian Governments have handled the matter relates to the sense of urgency shown and the anger that people rightly feel about the issue. Since early October, the Australian Royal Commission has taken evidence from more than 100 veterans and scientists. As we have heard, it is to come to the United Kingdom in the new year to interview another 60 witnesses.

The Royal Commission was established after a Government report asserted that Australia had been kept in ignorance all along about the true nature of the British tests. Why, first having promised the full co-operation of Her Majesty's Government in the work of that commission, did the Government decline to send anyone to put Britain's case until two week's ago? Why did that change of mind come about? Although I welcome it, I should like to know why, having first said that we would co-operate in the Royal Commission's work, we failed to send anyone, and why it took so long to change our minds.

Why did the Government deliberately frustrate the attempts of the veterans to gain legal aid in Australia by withholding information which is locked away in British archives?

The chairman of the commission, Mr. Justice James McClelland, has rebuked Britain over what he calls

"a rather unsatisfactory state of affairs. . . that there is ultimately a right of British veto."

He says:

"It is most desirable that we should not conduct this commission with our hands tied behind our back."

Although I know that 8,500 files have been released, many people in Australia claim that others are still held back. Can the Minister do anything tonight to allay the fears of the chairman of the commission and to refute his damning indictment?

Two incidents that have been revealed over the past few weeks show the Government's obsession with secrecy. After one of the Maralinga blasts in 1957, officials discovered an aboriginal family who said that they had camped in the bomb crater for two days and drunk water collected there. The family were given showers and sent back to the desert. John Hutton, an Australian service man, has told the commission that 200 soldiers were assembled later and told by a British officer that if anyone let out news of the incident to the media, he would be tried for treason. The men were allegedly reminded that under the Official Secrets Acts they could be shot by a firing squad or gaoled for 30 years if they talked about it. I should welcome the Minister's comments about those allegations.

I should like to draw to the attention of the Minister the remarks of Paul Malone, who works for The Canberra Times in the press gallery in Parliament House in Australia. I sent this document to the Minister's predecessor, the Minister for Information Technology, on 21 September 1984. In that document, Mr. Malone says:

"An examination of the documents written at the time of the tests reveals that many of the published official reports on the subject do not tell the whole truth. In fact in many cases the official reports are misleading. This particularly applies in relation to aboriginal presence in the region at the time of the tests. I have submitted pages of questions to the British High Commission here and have only just received a reply. Most of my questions have not been answered. Although the Commission has had the questions in writing for over six weeks, the response I received today to most questions was simply 'referred to London'."

When the Minister replied to that letter he went to great pains to say that, while he refuted many of Mr. Malone's allegations, he did not want to pre-empt the findings of the commission. It is amazing that information which might damage the Ministry of Defence is initially withheld. It is then released, sometimes grudgingly, to the Australian Royal Commission. Yet members of the press in Australia and here and Members of Parliament are denied access to the same information.

On another issue in the letter, the Minister says:

"Although I sympathise with the unfortunate people who are referred to in the newspaper article"— in the Sunday People—

"the article is an example of mischievous reporting, which can only act to spread unnecessary concern among the many thousands of participants and their families involved in the tests."

Those articles referred to the genetic effects of the atomic tests on many of the children of service men who were involved in the tests, which were referred to by the hon. Member for Stockton, North.

I shall refer to three such cases this evening. The first is that of Ken Clarke of Wigan, Lancashire. He is 47 years of age. He was with the Royal Air Force on Christmas Island. He suffers from bronchitis but otherwise he is fairly fit. His son John, who is 25 years of age, has had problems with his knees since he was a teenager and has had two operations. His daughter, Janine, is 18 years of age. She has a disease affecting her hip joint and finds it difficult to walk. She says:

"The doctors do not even have a name for my condition."

Secondly, there is the case of Geoff Collins. He is aged 48 years and resides in Wallasey, Merseyside. He visited the Monte Bello islands during service as a Navy radio operator. His 20-year-old daughter has a badly deformed spine and shoulder blades and a congenital abscess of the middle ear, making her deaf. When she was born, doctors thought at first that she was a thalidomide victim, but her mother never took thalidomide. Geoff says:

"I have the nagging belief that my daughter has suffered because of the involvement with the tests."

The third case is that of Desmond Shaw, aged 50 years, of Liverpool, who was on Christmas Island. Five years after returning home he was struck down with an arthritic condition which his doctors were unable to diagnose accurately. He suffers still from this ailment. His daughter, Maria, was healthy at birth but at the age of one year she suddenly blacked out and has been mentally handicapped ever since. She is now 15 years of age and she attends a special school. Desmond's wife, Mary, says:

"No one knows what caused Maria's trouble. The doctors just shrug their shoulders and say, 'It is one of those things.'"

I have mentioned only three such cases, but the Sunday People has evidence that 57 children of British service men who were exposed to nuclear bomb tests have died, been hideously deformed or disabled or suffer crippling diseases. It makes the point in its article that there is no statistical evidence that these deaths, deformities, disablements or cripplings are greater per head of population than the deficiencies which occur in normal circumstances. However, there is a lingering doubt in the minds of many of the families involved. There is a belief among many of them that their children have suffered because of their parents' involvement in the Maralinga and Christmas Island tests. I should like to know from the Minister what he intends to do to ensure that a survey is conducted to determine what genetic effects there have been on the children of these service men.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East has referred to the Minister's letter of 6 December. Part of the letter reads:

"All the evidence I have indicates that proper precautions were taken to safeguard the health and safety of those involved in the UK's atmospheric nuclear test programmes. It is important to note that the standards in use at that time were comparable with those of today."

If the right hon. Gentleman reads all the evidence that hon. Members have sent him and the two previous debates on this matter, he will find a document which his Department produced in 1953. The document gives the lie to the suggestion that service men were properly clothed or that proper precautions were taken. One paragraph describes what the Army set out to do in the tests. It is a Ministry of Defence document which was top secret. It reads:

"The Army must discover the detailed effects of various types of explosion on equipment, stores and men with and without various types of protection."

So the men who were to be involved in the atomic explosions were to be exposed to the effects of radiation with and without protective clothing to discover what the effects would be on them. That gives the lie to the suggestion that adequate safety standards were set. It is rather reminiscent of all the bravado of the cold war years. It betrays an alarming ignorance of the effects of radiation in those early days.

The Minister says that it will be October 1986 before the survey by the National Radiological Board is completed. I believe that that is an unnecessarily long time to wait. Although I respect individual scientists who are working on the survey, I still believe that a body entirely independent of the Government should have undertaken the task. Service men and their families cannot understand why the survey is taking so long to complete. Perhaps the Minister will tell us what progress is being made.

In summary, I should like to make just five points. The survey should be expedited more quickly. Every assistance should be given to the Australian Royal Commission and our own should be established. All files and documents relating to that period should be released. The Crown Proceedings Act should be reviewed and amended to enable people to take the Ministry of Defence to court if they feel that they have suffered grievances as a result of those tests. Finally, a survey of the genetic effects of radiation on children of test blast victims must be urgently undertaken.

I am grateful for the debate, and to the Minister for being here to reply to the points that have been made.

10.50 pm

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Adam Butler): This is a most opportune time for the debate. I am well aware of the situation and have read the debates that have taken place over the past year or so, but the reason why I describe the debate as opportune is that the attention of all those who are interested in the subject, and possibly of those who may not have been well acquainted with it in the past, will be concentrated somewhat more in the coming months when the Australian Royal Commission comes to London and goes about its business in the first few weeks of next year. The debate is opportune because it allows me to say one or two things that I have already said in different ways and about which I have written to Members of Parliament, in an attempt to present a fair and reasonable factual background to an issue that, frankly, is difficult, complex and, understandably, often emotional.

One has only to listen to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) refer to the cases of Mr. Clarke and Mr. Collins and their families and others, upon which I shall not comment — the House will understand why—and to details given in the debate and on other occasions, to appreciate even more the particular strains that those families are under. I say with the fullest possible sympathy that one fully understands why several of those who participated in the tests—who may or may not have been exposed to radiation, but believed that they were—and who suffer from cancer and cancer-related diseases attribute the incidence of those diseases to the fact that they participated in the tests. It is entirely understandable. In each and every one of those cases one difficulty is to establish whether that was so, but the greater difficulty is to persuade those concerned that it was not so.

I should like to take up a point made by at least two of the three people who spoke in the debate about the knowledge that existed at the time. For instance, the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) said that we had not realised the great danger of radiation at that time. The hon. Member for Mossley Hill made a remark in similar vein. The fact is that when the first nuclear tests took place at Monte Bello in 1952, extensive knowledge of the effects of nuclear weapons was already in the possession of those responsible for the conduct of the tests. The preparations for the 1952 test and the recognition of the potential radiation hazards are clearly outlined in a report to the Chiefs of Staff meeting in September 1949. That was conveyed to the then Australian Prime Minister when his agreement for the tests was sought in 1951. Care and concern for the safety of the participants is apparent throughout the whole programme.

The effects of ionising radiation, far from having been discovered during the experimental period of the tests, had been known since the turn of the century. By the early 1950s when the tests started, permitted levels were internationally established at a point at which it was judged that the harm caused was acceptable in comparison with the other risks that we face every day of our working lives. The principle enshrined in modern radiological protection practice—as low as reasonably practicable—had not at that time been formulated in the precise terms that apply today, but it was a basic tenet that exposure to ionising radiation had to be kept to a minimum within permitted limits and consistent with the needs of the operation.

Against that background, I can say clearly that the limits set in the regulations that applied to the Hurricane operation in 1952 are comparable with those that apply today. Many of the distinguished scientists who helped to determine those limits for the United Kingdom test programme have since served on the International Commission for Radiological Protection and have therefore seen broadly the same standards developed in the early 1950s enshrined in the current commission's recommendations more than 30 years later.

Mr. Frank Cook: The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) referred to the following statement:

"The Army must discover the detailed effects of various types of explosion on equipment, stores and men, with and without various types of protection."

That is in a document marked "special circulation" and "top secret". It is dated 20 May 1953—four years after the date specified by the Minister.

Another top secret document——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not make another speech.

Mr. Cook: I am not making a speech. I promise you, Mr. Speaker, that I am asking a question.

There is another top secret document, dated 2 January 1953. The Australian vessel HMS Hawkesbury had been in that area——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That does not sound like a question to me.

Mr. Cook: This is my question, Mr. Speaker. If the knowledge of the threat of radiation existed in 1949, as the Minister claims, why would certain areas of the Monte Bello islands remain from the January date until April and possibly longer still extremely dangerous so that everything had to be excluded? If all this was already known five years earlier, why should there be top secret documents about it?

Mr. Butler: I find it difficult to see how the hon. Gentleman's intervention relates to what I was saying.

Mr. Cook: It is a matter of logic.

Mr. Butler: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to develop my argument, just as I allowed him to develop his. I shall some to the point raised by the hon. Member for Mossley Hill, which has been dealt with many times before, but it was not immediately relevant to the point that I was making.

I was answering the assertion of the hon. Member for Stockton, North that we were, as it were, ignorant of the effects of radiation and thus finding our way during the course of the tests and that only today have the kind of limits been established that we consider to be safe for people such as radiation workers. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that that was not the case. The knowledge went back a considerable number of years. On ionising radiation, it went back to the turn of the century. I believe that what I have said belies the claim that standards were lax at the time of the United Kingdom test and confirms that the international scientific view of the acceptability of the risks of exposure to ionising radiation has not altered despite the vastly greater body of data on its effects which has been collected and examined during the period since then. It is important to make that point first and foremost.

The next point that I must make is one that I emphasised in the note that I sent to all hon. Members. Frequently, when this matter is debated, one could form the impression that hundreds of people were exposed to massive doses of radiation that would not be acceptable today. I have described the limits in operation at the time, and the knowledge that existed, and have said that those limits were comparable with those of today.

Let us now consider the numbers who were exposed to radiation and the levels at which they were exposed. This part of my reply will inevitably be somewhat detailed. I hope that the House will bear with me while I try to set in context the levels of radiation to which people such as radiation workers may be exposed today compared with the levels of radiation to which those who participated in the tests were exposed.

I hope that the House will forgive me for reading this part of my speech. It may be helpful if the information is printed in Hansard and can be used as a record.

The current United Kingdom national limits for radiation workers are 30 milliSieverts per quarter, or an annual limit of 120 mSv, provided that the annual average dose from the age of 18 is less than 50 mSv. The international commission includes a single planned special exposure limit of 100 mSv provided that a limit of 250 mSv from such special exposures in the working life is not exceeded within the lifetime limit of 2,500 mSv. The current commission's recommendations set an annual average limit of 50 mSv.

As the House knows, about 20,000 people participated in the tests. Of those, 15,000 suffered no additional radiation exposure at all. There were some 6,000 recorded exposures associated with 5,000 individuals who experienced some radiation. Starting at the top of the scale, fewer than 30 experienced more than 70 mSv. In order not to take up too much time, I ask those who are interested to compare that figure with the figures that I have just given. There were fewer than 150 in the range between 20 and 70 mSv., and about 500 falling between 3·5 mSv. and 20 mSv. About 1,500 had measured exposures of less than 3·5 mSv. The remaining exposures, of which there were about 4,000, were not distinguishable from exposure to normal natural background radiation.

Participants aged about 60 will have received on average a dose from natural background radiation of about 150 mSv., or about 2·5 mSv. per annum. I understand that, within reasonable limits, a continuing dose of radiation at a low level, adding up to a certain figure, has approximately the same effect as a single high dose of that amount.

Even at the highest level, therefore, and for a very few people, the levels of radiation to which people were exposed were within the sort of levels that are acceptable today. For the vast majority, they were comparable with those that a normal person would receive during his life on this earth. The amount of radiation absorbed can vary by up to five times the average, depending on what part of the United Kingdom a person lives inland what type of house he lives in. The majority were exposed to limited levels. That must be important when we consider whether there was a risk.

We must also consider whether proper precautions were taken. I am aware as anyone else who has studied this subject of the anecdotal evidence about precautions not being followed properly. As far as I am aware, those claims have not been substantiated, or they have been based on a false understanding. I am persuaded by the evidence that I have seen, and from studying the matter as closely as I can, that precautions were adequate and observed. It is quite conceivable that, where there are human beings, errors can be made. I have no evidence of that, but it is therefore conceivable that some of the stories are based on fact. Even if there was some error, the amount of radiation to which those people would have been exposed would have been very small. The fewer than 30 people who were exposed to the higher levels were given specific tasks and knew that they would be exposed to high levels. If errors occurred, the chances of people being damaged are minimal.

How, then, do we attempt to prove whether I am right? That must be done in a statistical exercise. That is why the survey has been set up. It is unreasonable to charge the National Radiological Protection Board with any bias or with any lack of independence of mind when tackling its work. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) said that information would be supplied by the Ministry of Defence. That is necessary because it has the records, but the board has made it clear that it will validate all information given to it before undertaking its work. The Ministry does not and will not dictate how the board undertakes that work. I cannot think of a better body to do the work. It is highly competent and has a great deal of experience. We do no service to our search for the truth by suggesting that the board's work will be other than comprehensive and unbiased.

I was asked whether the board was tackling the problem with a sense of urgency. When I took on my new responsibilities and discovered that the board's report would not be available until the autumn of 1986, I reacted as would have anyone else. I made special inquiries to discover whether there was any way in which to accelerate its work. I was told that, if the exercise was to be done properly, it would take that time. The report is statistical and objective. That is its importance as compared with the work of the Royal Commission. In no way am I suggesting that the Royal Commission was not objective, but a statistical exercise is, by definition, objective.

There will be a need to demonstrate that the control group or groups have suffered a different health experience from the participants. If 300 service men have experienced cancer and similar diseases as a result of the tests, the statistical analysis will show a higher incidence of cancer among participants than the norm. That must be so statistically. As I have said previously, if that is so the Government will have to change their stance.

The important thing is that by carrying out this exercise, and not through listening to the evidence of individuals, we shall be able to establish that first important point. I do not propose to consider a Royal Commission until the findings of that board are known. Only if they show a difference in experience between the control group and participants will the Government reconsider their position to see what the next step should be.

Mr. Alton: If this is to be a survey of only 20,000 people—a relatively small number—why will it take until October 1986 for it to be completed?

Mr. Butler: The board will undoubtedly read this debate, and it will note the urgency that the House, like the Government, places on the need for early publication of its report. My Department has been told that the work is of such a nature—and this is a highly complex matter —as to take this length of time. No one would be gladder than I if it could report earlier.

The Government were criticised for taking a different line from the Australian Government. I refute absolutely that we are going about our work in the wrong way. It is, however, correct that the Australian Government have set up a commission which, in the relatively near future, will be taking evidence in London.

This is an Australian Royal Commission, set up primarily to inquire into safety precautions and the possible effects of the tests on the health of Australians. Naturally, when the Australian Prime Minister requested United Kingdom co-operation in providing relevant information to the commission, the Government's response was to assure full co-operation within the constraints imposed on them on the grounds of national security or international obligations.

Already, literally hundreds—possibly thousands—of documents have been made available. With the exception of classified material, all information which is being made available to the commission will be made available in the Public Records Office. Special arrangements have been made with the Royal Commission that any relevant material which must remain classified is available to it.

It is not the Government's normal policy to release official documentation before the 30-year time period prescribed by the Public Records Act 1958. The decision to do so in this case is a reflection of our willingness to co-operate fully with the Australian authorities. I therefore refute the suggestion that our co-operation has in any sense been lukewarm or half-hearted.

It is correct that in the early days we decided not to be represented by counsel in Australia. That is very different from giving evidence. We have now decided to be so represented. With the advent in London of the commission, I believe that counsel will be helpful. It is necessary that evidence, based as much on fact and recorded experience as possible, is put before the commission. The evidence that the Government give will generally be presented by those who took part in the tests —for example, by Scientists, who have a full record of their experience. That evidence will be laid before the commission to enable it not to seek to pass judgment on the British Government—that is not the purpose of the commission—but to enable it to establish the factual background to its investigations into the circumstances of the test and the possible implications for the health of Australians.

To illustrate the contact and co-operation that exists, the terms and conditions under which the commission will operate in the United Kingdom have been agreed between myself and Senator Evans, who is the new Australian Minister for Resources and Energy. We wish the commission well in its work.

I end with the assertion that I have made on previous occasions. I have confidence that the safety precautions in the tests were more than adequate to ensure that nobody should have suffered harm from the effects of ionising radiation from the United Kingdom test programme. As for the possibility of its effects on United Kingdom participants, we have set up the NRPB study. That will demonstrate whether their health has been adversely affected by their presence. I can assure the House that I have to retain, and that I do retain, an open mind on that matter against the reports of the board.

Regional Development

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): When the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry came before the House on 28 November to announce his revised regional areas and regional development aid policy, he dealt a very cruel blow to a part of my constituency which suffers from very high unemployment. I was not the only hon. Member who had cause for concern and sorrow on that occasion. Many hon. Members rose to criticise the map which had been drawn while other hon. Members rose to praise it, including a number of hon. Members with constituencies in the west midlands. I described it then as a slapdash map drawn by somebody sitting behind a desk in London. I stand by that criticism. It applies not only to my constituency but to others. There may be other hon. Members who wish to speak in order to underline that point in relation to other areas. However, one factor that made that map more slapdash than it needed to be was the use of travel-to-work areas as a building block or as a unit by which to define the areas in which regional aid was to be concentrated.

The objective of the policy was that regional aid should be concentrated on those areas which most needed it. That is a laudable objective which I share entirely but which I contend was not satisfied by the way the map was drawn in relation to my own and certain other areas. The travel-to-work areas were controversial and contentious. They had been drawn up only a few months previously, in the face of very intense argument. The local authorities in my constituency and I protested at the way in which those areas were being drawn and the consequences which would follow. We saw that the next step would be that the redefined travel-to-work area would be regarded as having an overall lower level of unemployment and therefore would not qualify for aid.

On the day of the announcement the Minister tried to defend those new travel-to-work areas. He indicated that statistically they were fine because they included 70 per cent. of the people living in the area who travelled to work in it. If, however, the whole country were taken as a single travel-to-work area, it would satisfy the statistical criteria. If half the country were take as a single travel-to-work area it would satisfy the statistical criteria. In my own constituency, an area of hundreds of square miles has been taken as a travel-to-work area and, by what was a very shabby trick, an attempt has been made to conceal the unemployment problem in one community. I shall return later to that point in more detail. That is the fundamental error.

The determination of regional boundaries need not have had such a devastating effect. It was open to Ministers not to use the travel-to-work area as the definition of an area. In Manchester, the Government used ward boundaries and, under the order, that could have been done in other parts of the country where the travel-to-work area was such an unsatisfactory guide. The fact that the Government could vary the pattern only in Manchester shows that they had not adopted a flexible approach to areas of the country that most needed it.

The Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who is to reply to the debate, knows the circumstances, because the local authorities and I corresponded with him during the summer and he kindly saw a deputation of councillors from all the political parties in my constituency. The hon. Gentleman listened carefully, before the announcement was made, to a strongly pressed case. Yet that absurd announcement, which will have drastic effects on the community of Amble in my constituency, was still made. The Government got it wrong. They should admit that, and try to do something to put it right.

What sort of area is regional aid designed to help? I suggest that it is the sort of area where one in three adults has no job, over 80 per cent. of council tenants receive housing benefit, over 45 per cent. of owner-occupiers receive rent rebate, fewer than 50 per cent. of families own a car, about 25 per cent. of the children get free school meals, there has been a substantial reduction in employment in the coal industry and where, to take some of the wider social criteria, only 18 per cent. of children stay on at school after 16—compared with 57 per cent. in other parts of the county of Northumberland that are within the development area and are treated as being in greater need than Amble.

The general unemployment and social situation in Amble has been made much worse. For example, 150 men have been put on the dole since the Government's announcement because of redundancies in opencast coal mining. It is estimated that there will be about 470 redundancies in that industry by 1992. There is a steady rundown in employment, which is the natural consequence of sites being worked out.

Earlier this week, I tabled a written question to the Secretary of State for Energy about the rundown in opencast coal mining. The reply illustrated how out of touch the Government are. I asked what discussions the right hon. Gentleman had had with representatives of opencast workers about the redundant mineworkers payments scheme. Opencast workers do not benefit from the scheme. I was amazed to read the reply of the Under-Secretary of State for Energy, who said:

"my right hon. Friend has pointed out that the prospects for opencast mining appear to be good and unlikely to give rise to large-scale redundancies consequent upon restructuring." — [Official Report, 17 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 26-27.]

That was a week or so after the announcement of 150 redundancies and at the beginning of a period in which we expect many more.

The largest employer in Amble is the building trade. Where will that be left by the Government's recent announcement that local councils cannot use money that they have saved for house building and improvement grants? That will be yet another blow to the biggest employer in Amble. The prospects of an upturn for that trade have been effectively destroyed by yesterday's announcement, which was so vigorously challenged by Conservative Members when the statement was made and in today's debate.

The Government have added further blows since the regional development announcement. Last week, they closed the Amble training workshop, which operates under the special programmes. Without warning, consultation or discussions, we learnt a week or 10 days ago that the Government had suddenly closed the workshop which gives youngsters, some of whom have difficulty in fitting into normal employment, a chance of training. The workshop was closed and the staff were made redundant. Within that same period, the hours of the jobcentre have been cut to a minimum. The jobcentre was to be closed in an area with very high unemployment. We have now got it open for two half days a week, but I remind hon. Members that unemployment is way above the national average in that area.

This year, 163 pupils left Coquet high school in Amble. Of those, 143 are still looking for jobs, including 80 on Government programmes. I do not think that it was ever envisaged that the Government programmes would have to take well over half the number of school leavers, or that so huge a proportion of them — nearly all of them — would be out of a job by this stage in the year. [Interruption.] As the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) is saying from a sedentary position, the nearest skillcentre, Killingworth, is also closing. It is not very near, but it is the nearest, and the only one that we have got.

Coquet high school's headmaster has made some despairing comments about the problem. He said:

"A considerable emphasis in this school is given to those activities which will equip young people with skills which employers will value, such as technological awareness. . . . To diminish opportunities further would intensify the frustration, bitterness and anger which is evident among many young people who already feel that society is treating them with a lack of concern verging on contempt."

That is not an unrealistic comment when 143 out of 163 school leavers have no job. On every count Amble has an overwhelming case. So why is it being given the cold shoulder? The Government's excuse is that the new travel-to-work area that they have drawn up does not have high enough unemployment to justify special aid. They have pushed Amble into a huge area covering hundreds of square miles in the hope of concealing its problems. Of course, I and the local authorities protested vigorously about that at the time. But the Government's trick has not worked, because unemployment is now higher in the Alnwick and Amble total travel-to-work area than it is in the neighbouring Ashington and Morpeth area, which gets the full development treatment.

Unemployment is now higher even in the whole travel-to-work area than in the development area. On the November figures there is 16·3 per cent. adult unemployment in the whole travel-to-work area, as against 16 per cent. in the neighbouring area, which qualified for full development aid. Indeed, that is leaving on one side the fact that within the Amble employment exchange area unemployment stands, I believe, at about 33 per cent, or higher.

Even in the whole Alnwick and Amble travel-to-work area, unemployment is much higher than in relatively prosperous communities, such as Ponteland, which is also in the development area. Those who are not from the north-east will not realise that in mentioning Ponteland and Darras Hall I am talking about Newcastle's most favoured and affluent suburb. It is a very attractive area, much favoured by executives for housing purposes. House prices are high and it is very popular. It simply does not have the problems of a place such as Amble, yet it gets the full benefit of development area status. There is no logic in that.

The real unemployment figure for the Amble employment exchange area is at least one in three, and that amply justifies giving that area a status that is even above that of development status now being offered by the Government. It deserves even more help than that. We are already feeling the effects of the Government's callous decision. One firm that was set up in an advance factory in Amble has now moved to the Tyneside area, where grants are available. The firm T. A. C. Display, which started in small premises in Amble and was helped by the council, took on an advance factory of 5,000 sq ft, took an option on another 5,000 sq ft factory to expand, but has now uprooted and gone to the development area where the grants are.

Other employers in Amble are worried about their position and wonder what their future will be. A very successful firm in the area, Phoenix Mountaineering Ltd, says:

"When we look around at the inducements offered by other places, it makes us wonder if we made the right decision to come to Amble in the first place."

Peter Cutts, a director of P. E. C. Furniture Ltd, says:

"If we were in the same position now as in 1974, we would probably never have come to Amble from Bedlington".

Bedlington is in the development area.

The managing director of L. Animation, another local firm, says:

"Amble is suffering particularly today and will never recover unless measures are introduced which will positively discriminate in its favour."

So many of the existing employers are worried.

How shall we persuade new employers to come to the area when down the road they can get substantially greater benefits in areas where unemployment is not as bad as it is in Amble?

An even more serious problem arises from the Government's decision. It is the exclusion of the area from EEC regional development aid. The firms and local authorities in my constituency are more worried about that than about the loss of limited assistance which will now flow to places in development areas under the Government's policies. They are worried that the European door is now being slammed on them.

That is in a situation where the local authorities have tried their best to mount projects to build up the infrastructure in the area seeking European and national aid. The local authorities in the area have undertaken a number of projects—a 48-acre industrial estate; a new electricity substation; a purpose-built workshop let to a successful manufacturer; the conversion of redundant lock-up garages to form five nursery units for small workshops, which was undertaken in partnership with the Development Commission; the reconstruction of the north and south breakwaters in the harbour; the construction of a major new distributor road to open up land for private sector housing; a running track and sports centre at the new high school; and the county has plans to improve roads into Amble. Such work will be frustrated in future if we have no access to the European aid and help which is available for such projects.

The local authority now wants to engage in other projects. One is for a marina, on which the local authority is working hard. Amble is increasingly popular as a sailing centre. It may be that we can get some of that project in before the axe falls and before the closing date. Local authority officers are working hard to do it, but, if they are not successful, that project, too, will fail to get the European aid that might be available. Road works are still essential to improve communications to the industrial sites in the area. Tourist projects could be undertaken in the area and EEC financial assistance could be obtained for firms.

Infrastructure work would help the fishing industry. Although we shall not lose access to FEOGA grants as a result of this decision, other works which could be of real help to the fishing industry and fish marketing in the area depend on European regional fund aid, which will no longer be available to us.

When the Government put forward their case, they come back again and again to the travel-to-work area issue. I had an oral question today, which was not reached and was therefore answered in written form by the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, asking him again why Amble had been excluded. He said:

"Amble is part of the Alnwick and Amble travel-to-work area. That area certainly has an unemployment rate which is above the national average but that is true of many areas which are not included in the new assisted areas map . . . On the overall criteria used for making comparisons with the country generally, the Alnwick and Amble travel-to-work area did not justify assisted area status."

That is no longer true, for the reason that I gave earlier. The travel-to-work area has a higher unemployment rate than the area within the development area. Even more significantly, the travel-to-work area conceals the reality that the level of unemployment in the Amble employment exchange area is so high by any calculation that it fully justifies the inclusion of that employment exchange area within a development area. I ask the Minister to accept that.

I want to make two proposals to the Government. The first is the simple, straightforward and only answer for a Government who got it wrong the first time. They should redraw the map and put the Amble employment exchange area into the development area where it should be. That solution relies on the method the Government used in the case of Manchester, not to rely on the travel-to-work area, and it is the obvious answer.

If the Government are not prepared to do that—I cannot understand why they should not—they should consider one other proposal to avoid the consequences of this appalling misjudgment. The Government could ensure that Amble remains eligible for European regional development aid by classifying the rural development area, of which it is part, as an assisted area for EC regional fund purposes. Rural development areas are established by the Development Commission, which is the governing body and gives a great deal of help to my constituency and other rural areas, mainly those with a small population. Therefore, they are Government assisted areas and should qualify for European regional development aid. If the Government were prepared to fight this battle and win the argument, they would bring the benefits of EC regional aid to rural assisted areas that they have omitted from their development areas. I emphasise that second possibility because it could be a powerful help in solving Amble's problems.

If the Government do nothing, they will be condemning one of our hardest hit areas to struggle against impossible odds, and bribing employers to go to far more prosperous areas. Amble is one of the hardest hit communities. The Government have done it a terrible disservice by their decision. It is not too late for them to put it right.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). We represent almost the two extremes in England, in that there are only two constituencies beyond mine and none beyond his. However, my argument is similar to his. I wish to argue about the review, which is based purely and simply on travel-to-work areas and which ignores the reality of areas.

According to the statistics for November 1984, my dearly beloved county of Cornwall has 21·2 per cent. male unemployment and 15·8 per cent. female unemployment. Cornwall would qualify as a travel-to-work area on the basic definition of 70 per cent. going to work within the area. Indeed, the figure must be about 98 per cent. If Cornwall had been one travel-to-work area, the entire county would have received development assistance. However, one third of it is omitted. There are the travel-to-work areas of St. Austell and Truro, both of which are in my constituency, and of Launceston, which is not but which is part of my county.

The reason for that is easy to see. If one examines the crude unemployment figures for those areas, one sees that the figures are 14·4 per cent. for St. Austell, 12·2 per cent. for Truro, and 13·9 per cent. for Launceston. I recognise that they are lower than in the rest of the county. These are small oases of prosperity in the middle of a county that suffers from endemic unemployment and a low wage structure.

The brief provided by the Library puts travel-to-work areas in order of levels of unemployment. It shows how bad the general position is in my county. We have the highest level of unemployment in Great Britain. In Newquay, unemployment is 29 per cent. In this sad league, Falmouth comes 13th, Helston 14th, Penzance and St. Ives 15th, and Redruth 35th. We have five entries in the worst 35 in the country, and there are 322 teams in that league of agony.

Liverpool comes 28th in the league. No hon. Member believes that Liverpool deserves anything other than all the financial assistance that any Government may feel inclined to give for regional development. Indeed, many hon. Members would argue that it needs even more than that. Although Cornwall has four entries above Liverpool, it matters not one iota. The little cases of prosperity within my great county, which is about 100 miles long, have been left out. The position is even worse than that. The crude unemployment figures in my county are totally meaningless.

The Minister may have had drawn to his attention a question that I asked in January this year. It was an unusual question, in that, instead of asking the Minister to list the number of women unemployed in named travel-to-work areas, I asked whether, relative to the most recent census, the Minister could list, for each county in Great Britain, the number of women aged between 25 and 54 who were in paid employment. One would have thought that the number of women employed would have related in some way to the number unemployed, but that is far from being so. The answer revealed that only 46·1 per cent. of women in my county are employed. That is the lowest for Great Britain; it is lower than Merseyside, the Western Isles, the west midlands, the north-east, the north-west and certainly the south-east. Yet the unemployment figures suggest that female unemployment in Cornwall is not significantly worse than that in the rest of Great Britain. The figures showed that 46 per cent. of women in Cornwall worked, compared with 56 per cent. in Merseyside, 58 per cent. in the west midlands, and more than 62 per cent. in London. The figures are meaningless, yet that is what the analysis has been based upon.

My second reason is the general lack of prosperity in the county. Those of us who know the area, and who were born and brought up there, are often shocked by the prosperity of the south-east. But it is difficult to produce figures to demonstrate that air of poverty. The only statistic that we can use is the new earnings survey, which states that, for men aged more than 21, the average wage in England is £168·10. In Cornwall, it is £138·80. Again, that is the lowest in Great Britain. It is lower than on Merseyside, in the west midlands, the east midlands, the lowlands of Scotland, Glasgow and Liverpool. That figure is not something new, as the Minister would know if he examined the figures. Sadly, that has been the position for a long time. Yet that little oasis in the middle of Cornwall, in which by Cornish standards there is some sign of prosperity, has been left out and will receive no assistance. The average wages in Warwickshire and Merseyside respectively are £157 and £161.

What will be the effects of the Government's decision? One case that I plead, although the area is not in my constituency—this is more a countywide matter than a constituency one—is the development area of United Downs, of which I am sure no Minister has heard. It is at the centre of what used to be the mining area of Cornwall. A few years ago, Carrick district council decided, adventurously, at considerable expense—the irony is that it received some assistance from the Government—to fill in the mine shafts and try to reclaim that industrial desert, which is all that it can be called. United Downs is just four miles from Camborne, five miles from Redruth, and six or seven miles from Falmouth, which are in the top 35 travel-to-work areas in Great Britain in terms of unemployment. But sadly for United Downs—such is the way these things work—it is not in the Camborne travel-to-work area, to which it is closer physically but in the Truro travel-to-work area. Therefore, it has been completely cut off from assistance.

Given the Government's enthusiasm for travel-to-work areas, is there some way in which United Downs can be transferred from the Truro travel-to-work area to Camborne or Redruth? I should repeat that, although United Downs is not in my constituency, I consider the matter to be so outrageous that I must draw it to the hon. Gentleman's attention. The hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Mudd)—this is not a party political point in my county—has tried to draw it to the Minister's attention, but I am using this opportunity to emphasise the lunacy of the decision. This is a blow to United Downs and to the Truro area as a whole. More than that, it is a blow to the St. Austell area. Truro is not an industrial town. The largest manufacturer there is Furniss biscuits. The biscuits are magnificent, should be tried by every hon. Member and make an extremely good Christmas present, should anybody want one. The last time that I checked, the firm employed fewer than 30 people, and as that is the biggest manufacturer in Truro, that shows that the loss of the status is not too important for that city.

However, for St. Austell, the loss is important because it is an industrial town. It is dominated by the china clay industry, which fortunately is extremely industrious and profitable. However, because of mechanisation and technology, the number of people that it employs is never likely to exceed the present number, and St. Austell recognises that. For a long time, it has been trying desperately to build an alternative industrial base.

Today, I had a letter inviting me to open a new factory site, which has come about as a result of the generous co-operation of local authorities and various Government agencies. Now, that factory site will receive no financial assistance. There is a feeling that the whole effort has been killed stone dead. How can somebody persuade a manufacturer to come to Cornwall, 300 miles from the centre of our commerce, when there are areas receiving the same assistance that are within seven, six or five miles, or even half a mile?

We realise that our Government's assistance is limited, so one of the chief worries, as my hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed said, is that we have lost access to Euro-money. The most important aspect of that for us is water money. For a while, it has been easier to get money from the European Community to help the water infrastructure in my county than it has been to get water from the reservoirs. I am sure that the Minister will recognise that to cut one third of my county off from the Euro-loans that have been giving it some hope for the rebuilding of its water and sewerage system is a sad blow.

The reality of what has happened—I can hardly believe it—is that the county with the fewest women in employment in Great Britain, with over 20 per cent. of its male population unemployed and with the lowest wage rate in Great Britain has lost development status for a third of its area. That is amazing and people in the county find it so. The more one studies this review, the more one feels that a group of fifth formers could have done a rather better job if they had spent a whole afternoon on it, using the available statistics in the Library, let alone what may be available to the Department. This is the most childlike response to the problem.

The Government cannot say that they did not know all the facts that I have set out, because the submission by the Cornwall county council includes them all. Therefore, there are two possibilities. One is that the submission simply was not read, studied, checked and thought through. The second is that all the figures were brought to the attention of the Minister, but then they were ignored, and it was decided that the only thing that counted was the travel-to-work area, and that the bare statistics available to the Government were all that mattered. I do not know which is the most charitable assumption to make—that the facts were not read or that that the Department chose to ignore the reality. However, there is enormous dissatisfaction in my county about what has happened.

I emphasise the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed. Is it possible for us to have access to European money through the rural designation? That would not solve all the problem, but it would help a large proportion of it. I look forward to detailed answers on those observations, if not now, then in correspondence.

I am sure that the Under-Secretary of State will not be surprised to hear that there is a wish for a delegation to come up from the west country to discuss these points with the hon. Gentleman face to face. The figures are known to the Under-Secretary of State, and he has received the county's submission. He has heard that my county was rejected. All he has to do is go to the files and open them at the right page, and he will be able to relate the rational, humane, sensible arguments that persuaded the Government to take this decision.

The Under-Secretary of State can give a detailed answer tonight, because the review took a year to complete, and the arguments and reasons must be available. I suspect that the best I can hope for is a letter arguing the points and the reception of a delegation from my county. We shall certainly look forward to that delegation. I look forward also to hearing the comments by the Under-Secretary of State.

11.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. David Trippier): I congratulate the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) on his continuing and uncanny luck in the ballots. On 7 December, the hon. Gentleman tabled a private Member's motion. That motion was drawn third, and, unfortunately, it did not reach a debate. Only 12 days later, he has repeated that remarkable feat.

Mr. Penhaligon: The Lord is on our side.

Mr. Trippier: In the spirit of charity, and as this is the season of good will, I am anxious to extend my congratulations to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed and to make it clear that his feat was remarkable.

I welcome the opportunity to explain to the House, and especially to the hon. Members for Berwick-upon-Tweed and for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon), the basis of the new assisted area map. I recognise from their speeches — because the hon. Gentlemen are vociferous on behalf of their constituents, we are accustomed to hearing such statements — that they are upset about the recent announcement. Obviously, it is impossible, when dealing with regional policy, to please everyone. Sometimes I wonder, because I have had such a close involvement in this matter, whether one makes as many enemies as friends.

This opportunity to explain the basis of the new assisted areas map is welcome, because misunderstanding is rife. Whether the misunderstanding is genuine or wilful is immaterial, as, in the confusion that abounds, many seem to have come to believe that the new map is biased — although which way it is thought to be biased is never made clear. Certainly the bias is not in favour of this Administration. Thirty-two travel-to-work areas which were formerly assisted areas are excluded from the new map. The exclusions affect 41 hon. Members, and, of those 32 are Conservative Members.

Leaving aside the question of bias, how much of the country has been affected? The travel-to-work areas which were previously assisted but which no longer justify preferential treatment over the rest of the country cover less than 3 per cent. of the working population. By contrast, travel-to-work areas covering more than 10 per cent. of the working population have been brought into the new map. In fact, there has been a major increase in the coverage of the assisted areas map — an increase made possible by the support available from the European regional development fund.

The assisted areas map sets the geographical limits of our regional industrial policy. As we said in our White Paper "Regional Industrial Development", published a year ago, the aim of regional industrial policy is the reduction of regional imbalances in employment opportunities on a stable long-term basis. In that White Paper we noted that relative annual average unemployment rates had previously been the dominant factor in previous drawings of the asssited areas map. We recognised that there would be merit — we made this clear in the White Paper — in taking a more measured account of other factors, such as industrial infrastructure, an overdependence on traditionl industry, peripherality, occupational structure and other available forms of assistance.

Despite the arguments of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, we did not declare that the policy would concentrate aid on areas suffering the highest levels of long-term unemployment. However, we invited views on the criteria to which we had referred in the White Paper, and received them in more than 300 of the submissions that were sent to my Department. The support for continuing to have unemployment as the main criterion was overwhelming. Those arguing that long-term unemployment was an appropriate additional factor amounted to 18 per cent. — fewer than those who argued in favour of industrial structure or peripherality.

Taking account of those submissions, and strictly in accordance with the aims of the policy, our decisions on the map were based solely on areas' relative need for current and future employment opportunities. The main criterion was relative annual average unemployment rates. Relative long-term unemployment was also taken into account, although it should be noted that this is highly correlated to current unemployment. The coefficient of correlation is 0·92 per cent.

In making our decisions on the map, we also took account of factors such as, first, the relative pressures for new job opportunities expected to result from the varying age structure of the population in different parts of the country; and we also recognised that this may be affected by changes in local economic activity rates; secondly, areas' differing industrial structure and how this may put present employment at risk; thirdly, the occupations and skills of the population as they reflect the quality of local employment opportunities and the pool of entrepreneurial talent,; and fourthly, handicaps to economic recovery, such as great distances from main markets and peripherality and the general trend of industry to move out of the densely populated inner cities.

All those factors are objective criteria, but their relative importance is essentially subjective. We considered in great depth the scope for using a synthetic index, but concluded that no single index was capable of reflecting adequately the relative needs of areas, especially as account also needed to be taken of the relative positions of neighbouring areas.

Within travel-to-work areas there can be wide variations. I take and am fully aware of the point made by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed. It may interest the hon. Gentleman to know that I took part in downgrading four towns in my constituency. That is courage. One town has unemployment far higher than the area that he has been describing.

I understand that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed questions the use of travel-to-work areas as the building blocks for the assisted areas map. The building blocks used by successive Governments have been travel-to-work areas. I can assure the hon. Member that it is not for convenence that we use travel-to-work areas — far from it. People do not observe administrative boundaries when looking for or travelling to work. Therefore, it would not be sensible, and certainly it would not be cost-effective, for regional industrial policy to be based on administrative boundaries.

Successive Governments have used travel-to-work areas as the building blocks for their assisted areas map. We consider them to be the best basis as they are the closest available approximations to self-contained labour markets covering the whole country. For areas that fall well short of being self-contained, the relationship between unemployment and job opportunities is greatly affected by the situation in adjoining areas—too greatly for such areas to be useful as the basis for a cost-effective regional industrial policy aimed at reducing the disparities in levels of unemployment to which I referred before.

Furthermore, TTWAs are the smallest units for which nationally comparable unemployment rates are available. These unemployment rates are calculated for an area by dividing the number of unemployed who live there by the sum of the employees who work there and the number of unemployed who live there. This rate could be misleading for areas with a substantial commuting inflow or outflow. For example, for an inner city with a substantial commuting inflow, the rate would be artifically deflated by the many non-residents working there. Numbers of unemployed are known for various other areas right down to wards, but the ratio of unemployed to total residents does not give nationally comparable figures when calculated for areas that do not take into account normal commuting patterns. Such ratios are useful as indicators of social conditions in an area and how these are changing.

Mr. Beith: Does the Minister know the current unemployment rate for the Amble employment exchange area?

Mr. Trippier: Yes. The hon. Gentleman has referred to it this evening. He referred to it also when he brought his delegation to see me. I emphasise once more that there is a town within my constituency where unemployment is far higher than in the Amble employment exchange area, and it is just as widespread geographically as the area in the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Travel-to-work areas have to cover a self-contained labour market area. The hon. Gentleman is known to be a fair man, and I am sure that he will accept that there will be critics of whatever assisted area map the Government produce and of whatever criteria we use. Those who fall below the line, as it were, will be dissatisfied and critical of any system, whereas those who are above the line, as the hon. Gentleman was with his constituency prior to the recent review, are well satisfied. As a result of the recent review, the coverage of the map throughout the United Kingdom is far greater than it was.

Regional industrial policy is about employment opportunities, and the unemployment data for the assisted areas map should be the best available measures of the local mismatch between labour supply and demand. In practice, it is not possible to divide the country into entirely separate labour market areas such that no one commutes across the boundaries of those areas. The Department's travel-to-work areas are the best approximation to such areas which cover the whole country.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed has referred to variations within travel-to-work areas. It would be surprising if they were homogenous. Our policy is based on the full recognition that any increase in jobs in a depressed area is likely to be taken up by residents of nearby prosperous areas. Regional industrial policy is not an appropriate instrument for tackling the problems of unemployment black spots. To be cost-effective, regional industrial policy needs to take account of the need for further employment opportunities across the area in which it is most likely that any new jobs will go to its residents.

The preparation of the new travel-to-work areas used 1981 census data so as to be as statistically valid as possible within England, Scotland and Wales. The basic criteria used were that at least three quarters of each area's residents should work in the area and that at least three quarters of the jobs in the area be taken by its residents, with slightly lower rates of self-containment being accepted for large areas.

The hon. Member has stated his belief — this followed the statement of my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry — that the travel-to-work areas were drawn up in a slapdash manner "by somebody sitting behind a desk in London". — [Official Report, 28 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 940.] Nothing could be further from the truth, and I shall explain why. The travel-to-work area boundaries were first drafted by the Centre for Urban and Regional Development Studies at Newcastle university, which may surprise the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed. Those sitting behind their desks in London then sought the advice of those with local knowledge, particularly on any recent local developments that could have led to changes in travel patterns since the census. I am sure that that point will be of great interest to the hon. Member for Truro.

The time available for comments was limited as we wanted the new travel-to-work area boundaries for the new map of assisted areas so that we could end as soon as possible the uncertainty that precedes change. However, I understand that many useful and detailed comments were received and that all the new information was assessed alongside the census data to see whether the changes were on a scale to warrant modification of the draft boundaries; and in several cases changes were made in the light of that new information.

I understand also that many suggestions were made for alternative areas, which were assessed against the self-containment criteria, and that changes were made to follow district boundaries more closely where that could be done without affecting the validity of the travel-to-work areas. I fully appreciate the concern of hon. Members whose constituencies are no longer included in the map of assisted areas.

Mr. Beith: Does the Minister recognise how far all that verbiage is from the reality of the travel-to-work area that we are talking about — Alnwick and Amble? It is 50 miles across, and there is no public transport across it. More people commute to jobs over the boundary immediately to the south of Amble between Amble and the development area than commute across that enormous travel-to-work area.

Mr. Trippier: I am afraid that that applies in many other areas that have been covered by the boundary drawn under the travel-to-work area map. The hon. Gentleman is rehearsing the points that he put fairly to me when he came to see me with the delegation. I emphasised then, and I repeat, that the responsibility for the new travel-to-work area map is in fact not that of the Department of Trade and Industry. The hon. Gentleman knows that full well. We were waiting for the map to come from the Department of Employment, which was responsible for drawing it up. I am only sorry that the map took so long, although the census was taken in 1981. None the less, we had already committed ourselves to working on the travel-to-work area map, and, as I have already mentioned, it says so in the White Paper that we published 12 months ago.

I fully understand the concern expressed by, the hon. Members for Truro and for Berwick-upon-Tweed. I can assure them that we looked carefully at all such areas' cases for assistance to see whether they merited continued preferential treatment over the rest of the country. But, even with the substantially wider coverage of the new map, we could not justify continuing to assist all the areas that have benefited in the past.

However, we have brought in generous transitional provisions to ease the downgrading, as the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed was kind enough to mention. In particular, all applications for regional selective assistance received before the change will be negotiated on the basis of the old map for a further four months. Also, the European Commission will continue to accept applications for the European regional development fund quota section until March next year. I understand exactly what the hon. Gentleman means when he says that his local authority's officers are working hard to make sure that their application is in time.

Mr. Penhaligon: The Minister has explained the situation, and it is interesting to hear about the decisions that have been made, but was attention paid to the fact that few women in Cornwall are in work, or did the Government examine purely the out-of-work figures? I think that I demonstrated beyond any doubt that the two sets of figures are by no means the same thing. The fact is that the Government have left out one third of the county with the fewest women in work anywhere in Britain.

Mr. Trippier: I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman laid great emphasis on that. I do not know whether this helps, but, even when we looked at various synthetic indexes to see whether any one of them might apply, we looked at male and female unemployment together. We did not separate them. If one started on that, I do not know where it would end.

We believe that it had been a mistake on the part of successive Governments in the past to look only at unemployment levels and, in the submissions that we received in response to the White Paper published a year ago, the vast majority of people agreed with us.

In conclusion, I am confident that the House will agree that, with the new structure of regional industrial incentives, the Government have set about achieving the stated objective of reducing imbalances in regional employment opportunities in the most sensible manner possible.

National Union of Mineworkers (Sequestration)

12.10 am

Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe (Leigh): The cardinal purpose of this debate is to obtain some positive answers from the Government, who so far have failed to answer clearly and definitively the questions raised by the Opposition.

The Government's infamous industrial relations legislation left a bitter taste in the mouths of many of us. The Government have sought to impose on the British trade union movement, and now exclusively on the miners, a rule of law which undermines the traditional openness and flexibility of industrial relations and negotiations with Government, industry and the trade union movement.

We are witnessing, and bitterly experiencing, probably the longest major strike in Britain this century. The miners' strike of 1984 is potentially the miners' strike of 1985, as the Government's indifference to the crisis in the coal industry in now apparent to everyone in the country —ordinary people as well as politicians.

The handling of the strike in legal terms is significant, in that the rule of law is being used against the legitimate views and actions of a trade union aspiring to fulfil the aims and objectives of its members as represented in its leadership. A paramount symptom is the Government's attempt to suppress the rights of that union and its members, with all the vigour that they can muster.

The law on sequestration and the apparently prejudiced interpretation of it by the courts is rapidly leading to the erosion of civil liberties. In the view of many of us, that will be the result of court decisions based on bad law.

In a democracy, it is imperative to strike a balance between the maintenance of public order and the legitimate right to express dissent. During the miners' strike, the law has been used to upset the traditional balance and to establish the right of the forces of law to go to extreme lengths. I am sure that during the debate my hon. Friends will give examples of civil conflict in the coal fields. There is an abundance—an encyclopaedia—of evidence that civil liberties have been trampled upon by certain actions taken in the name of the law. A climate of opinion has been created in which it is felt that such actions can be justified. Acting either on direct instructions or on some weird interpretation of the law, the police have taken that view in relation to the miners.

One does not need much imagination to see how the same attitude could be extended to other constitutional situations. At present, the miners happen to be regarded by the public as an unreasonable, dictatorial and unconstitutional force that is threatening civil law and moving towards civil disorder. People take that view because that is how the media and Government spokesmen have presented the situation. Public opinion is easily moulded by the media. It is very responsive to what the media present as normal. The presentation of certain selected items and issues by the media always has a receptive audience. That is called "normalisation".

The amount of media time given to Government spokesmen can easily influence people in the desired way. It can certainly be done; it is done. Regardless of the current dispute, we should be aware of the power of Government to manipulate public opinion through the media.

There is no point in democracy unless it can safeguard civil liberties. That is what is at issue now—not pit closures or the 5·2 per cent. The whole perspective has been changed by the Government, acting through the media. They have conditioned the minds of ordinary people to believe that there is now an aggressive force within the nation that chooses to ignore the whole spectrum of British law.

What is an economic pit? How is an economic pit to be defined? I am not talking in terms of pounds and pence, or in terms of the criterion of profits before people. Nor shall I talk about the NCB's accounting system. I worked for the NCB for 30 years, so I know about it. I worked as a unit engineer at the pits. Even there, we manipulated the figures. The figures were not distorted or untrue. As with the media, it was a matter of presentation. It is quite easy to do. The NCB does it when it fiddles the books.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): In the same way, the Secretary of State for the Environment has just cut the money for housing by £2 billion while saying that he is increasing the amount available.

Mr. Cunliffe: The yardstick is the same. We are told that there are uneconomic local government units.

It must be more expensive to make a miner redundant than to invest properly in the coal industry. If the Government and the NCB failed to close the 20 pits, the cost to the NCB in subsidies would be £275 million per annum. If they are closed, the Government will lose a maximum of £480 million a year in redundancy payments, supplementary benefit and lost tax revenue. That ignores the additional cost of job losses in industries that supply the mining industry. All the evidence about the economic aspects of the dispute is there to be examined.

Anyone who knows the industry knows that £130 million a year is spent on pensions for past employees and that there is a subsidence charge of £245 million a year. Those charges have nothing whatever to do with operating and production costs. The board has always made an operating profit. I had to make my returns from various collieries on that basis. Overhead costs and Government interest charges were always dealth with on the other side of the page. That was the right way. The Government must understand that, on that basis, even last year with the overtime ban which lasted six weeks the board still made a profit of £1 million.

The Central Electricity Generating Board pays 40 per cent. less for coal than for oil. Examination of how the NCB books are distorted shows how greatly coal is undervalued. At the stroke of an accountant's pen, the figures are made correct. If the NCB sold its coal to the electricity board 20 per cent. rather than 40 per cent. cheaper than oil, it would make a profit of £1·1 billion a year. That is the real perspective. It should also be borne in mind that it is twice as expensive to force a miner on to the dole as it is to keep him in work in a so-called uneconomic pit. Such facts are unchallengeable. Some of us know the system and have worked it. We know that what the board is presenting is fictitious, unreliable and biased. It is also predictable, because of Government interference.

We should also consider the reduction of spending capacity that will result from the redundancy of 20,000 miners. It is forecast, however, that we will need another 40,000 miners by the end of the century. I do not know what will happen to the mining stock between now and then. If anyone believes that it is possible to go out on the streets tomorrow and recruit miners and train them in 16 weeks, he believes nonsense. Miners are generated. They stay in families and go from generation to generation. If we destroy that basic intake from mining families and mining communities, we shall create a vacuum that will never be filled. Someone must reckon up that cost. I do not want to talk about training schemes, but they will be no substitute for the generation of miners that we have always known.

The cost of the dispute in lost production, in steel, in rail, in electricity, in tax payments and in policing costs is already close on £4 billion. If common sense does not prevail and if there is not an honourable settlement which is based on what we believe was a genuine attempt by the NUM to secure a future for mining families, I venture to suggest that it would be foolhardy and utter nonsense to ignore the economic facts that I have outlined. If we are not careful, these imaginary problems will remain for the rest of this year and throughout 1985.

I notice that not one energy Minister is present this evening. They again display their total indifference because of the closed-shop attitude of the board in negotiations. One of the Government's legal representatives—the Solicitor-General—will reply, and to him I say that, regardless of legal interpretation, it is not difficult to understand what bad law has done. The miners' case is as great and strong as ever, and it will be so in the future.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I wish to help the House and I do not want to restrict debate if I can help it, but I remind hon. Members that the subject we are discussing is Price Waterhouse and the sequestration of NUM assets. Hon. Members should relate their remarks to the topic before the House, and no doubt the Minister will reply accordingly.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): We have heard the impassioned voice of the coalfield, and as the grandson of a miner I fully understand the feeling in our mining communities as expressed in the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe).

The Attorney-General did neither his case nor himself justice when, under Opposition pressure, he made his statement to the House on 11 December this year. The House of Commons is entitled to an explanation. The Attorney-General is answerable to this House, and it was because he failed to give a proper explanation, and adequately to answer the questions put to him, that my hon. Friends have sought this debate.

I hope that, for the future, Law Officers will learn that the House will not be brushed on one side. If anything novel or extraordinary has to be done, it is much easier to come clean and to explain to the House at the earliest opportunity what the Government are doing.

Instead, the right hon. and learned Gentleman sought to attack me, and ignored every question that I put to him. I readily forgive him for not following every utterance I have made on television and radio and in the press, particularly as many of them emanated from Cardiff, but I have gone to the trouble of listening again to one of the tapes, when I said that whoever was in breach of the law —be he a picket or a policeman—must be answerable for that breach.

I quoted the words of Lord Atkin, and I did so even though I forgive the Attorney-General for not knowing everything I have said elsewhere. However, I do not forgive him readily for not recalling that I told the House:

"The rule of law is the same for everyone", and I quoted the memorable words of Lord Atkin who in the dark days of war in 1941 said:

"In this country, amid the clash of arms, the laws are not silent. They may be changed, but they speak the same language in war as in peace".

It is not incumbent on me or any of my hon. Friends to repeat like parrots every utterance that we make of our regard and respect for the role of law. I hope that the Solicitor-General will recognise that tonight.

In his attack upon me, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney-General missed the whole point of our concern. As I said on 11 December, there may be a hypothetical or a real need to protect the courts. We were concerned, first, about the basis for his actions. Secondly, assuming that the Attorney-General had the power, was it right for him to do it? Although there may have been advantages, was it not conceivable that the disadvantages of his actions outweighed the advantages? The Attorney-General did not throw any light on the basis for his actions. If our courts need to be protected, I believe that there must be a proper basis for their protection. Our concern relates to the basis for the actions of the Attorney-General.

The written answer which I received last Friday from the Attorney-General contained the first utterance that his actions were based upon the common law. The common law is based upon precedent. It cannot be made up. We should like to be told whether any precedents have been discovered since the exchange on 11 December for the actions which have been taken. Why are the Government so coy? Why did we have to wait until last Friday for the first reference by any Minister to the fact that the actions of the Attorney-General were based upon common law? No reference was made to this fact in any answer which the Attorney-General gave to the House.

Although there may, therefore, be a power to grant an indemnity under the common law, I was also told last Friday that, without statutory authority, the common law cannot be activated in order to pay out money under the indemnity. I should like to know how that will be provided. I come back to the original question: have the Government been able to discover throughout the long history of this country any precedents for this indemnity?

I should also like to know whether there was any real need for this action. The senior partner in Price Waterhouse said that the firm did not ask for the indemnity and that this indemnity was unsolicited. The Attorney-General has told the House that he made inquiries about what had happened and discovered that Price Waterhouse had asked the court whether there were any funds. Price Waterhouse were told that there were no funds, and they seemed to be content.

It has been repeated time after time that neither Mr. Justice Nicholls nor Price Waterhouse approached the Attorney-General. Therefore, what evidence was there —I hope the Solicitor-General will face up to this—that the orders of the court might, in the words of the Attorney-General, be frustrated? Perhaps we might be told the full extent of the property which Price Waterhouse have seized —not only the money in the bank but the houses and other property owned by the National Union of Mineworkers.

Many of my hon. Friends put down early-day motion 233 regretting the fact that the Attorney-General referred to Price Waterhouse as an "ordinary commercial firm who are liable to run out of money".

Price Waterhouse is the third largest accountancy firm in the United Kingdom, with an annual income from fees of over £60 million. They are discussing an amalgamation with Deloitte Haskins and Sells, the second largest accountancy firm in the United Kingdom, whose annual income from fees is also over £60 million. Price Waterhouse hardly comes into the category of an ordinary commercial firm which is likely to run out of money. I understand that Price Waterhouse are far from happy that the spotlight of the Attorney-General's comments has been turned on them at a crucial stage of the amalgamation negotiations. The Solicitor-General laughs, but I am sure that he if speaks to the senior partners of Price Waterhouse they will confirm what I have said.

Price Waterhouse do not act as public benefactors when they are appointed court sequestrators. They do it for money, on an ordinary commercial basis, and they are paid on a solicitor-client basis. They are not there because they love to act as sequestrators. There is other work that they could do to earn their £60 million a year. They enter into it with their eyes fully open and, on that basis, there was hardly any need for the Attorney-General to have come to their aid on the first inquiry about whether the court had any money.

The Attorney-General told the House on 11 December that Price Waterhouse went to the court and were told that there were no funds and that it seemed "so simple" to him —the order of the court should be enforced. He said:

"As guardian of the public interest, I was the only person who could do that,."—[Official Report, 11 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 929.]

We have to be satisfied whether, in issuing unsolicited and unprecedented indemnities, the Attorney-General has not jumped the gun. Has he not perhaps acted a little impetuously? He told the House that he relied on information coming partly from the registrar of the court, as a result of his inquiry, and partly from newspapers. That is a very odd approach for the Attorney-General to adopt when making a crucial and unprecedented decision.

Even more important constitutional matters than the action of the Attorney-General arise in this context. Will his action be a precedent for further involvement by him in a range of civil litigation? If there is a matrimonial case in which large funds have been moved out of the courts' jurisdiction—as they are, from time to time—will the Attorney-General come to the aid of the party—who is denied his rights when the order of the court is frustrated? The pleasures of having the Attorney-General's indemnity should apply to all; the law should be the same for everyone. Or is this a one-off exercise, applying only to litigation involving the NUM? Is that union being singled out for the use of the Attorney-General's new-found power of indemnity, or can everyone involved in civil litigation expect the same pleasures and privileges?

If there is to be a widespread repetition of the Attorney-General's action, presumably we can expect the Estimates to include a token provision of £1 to cover the possibility of future incursions by the Attorney-General into indemnity in civil litigation.

My final point relates to the Attorney-General's judgment in the matter. Given that this is current litigation in a highly contentious area and in a politically highly charged atmosphere, was it prudent of the Attorney-General to intervene at this stage? If there were clear and unambiguous evidence that the court's will would be frustrated, because, for example, this or any other firm was not willing to act as sequestrators, the position might be different. But, given the flimsy evidence before us and the Government's failure to present their case, the real danger is that the Attorney-General has been unnecessarily involved in civil litigation and has created a precedent for the future; we know not where it will stop.

That is what concerns me. I refer to the cherished concept of the independence of the Attorney-General's office and to the danger of tarnishing it. I value the independence of the judiciary. I set out my views about the dangers of tarnishing that in a recent article in The Times. In the same way, I value the Attorney-General's independence. With hindsight, was it wise or prudent of the Attorney-General to act? I am reminded of a war slogan "Was your journey really necessary?" In the same way, on the evidence before us, were the Attorney-General's actions really necessary?

Mr. Alan Rogers (Rhondda): This case is of great interest, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) has outlined the main legal issues involved. In particular, he referred to the question of the impartiality of our Law Officers. He posed them some very interesting questions, some of the answers to which may be set out in legal terms. But while those answers are important in that they will form part of the continuing struggle that we have to put up against the Government, we know what they are. After all, the Government are motivated not by any need or desire to maintain the law, but by blind hatred for the mining community.

The Conservative party does not like the mining community. It is determined to break the NUM, and it has taken this opportunity to do so in whatever way it can. It cannot win the economic argument or any other argument, so it has tried to use the law to bludgeon coal miners into returning to work. Thus, the Law Officers' actions are motivated not by the need to carry out the law impartially, but by blind dogma.

The coal mining community is participating in one of the most heroic actions that any group has participated in this century. I say "heroic", because those people are looking not for money to line their pockets—the sort of thing that Conservative Members would probably understand—or advantage or to improve their working conditions, but for protection of their communities and jobs. It is a pity that Conservative Members do not act as patriotically as them. I cannot see it as anything other than a heroic fight.

Perhaps I am slightly conditioned by my recollections, especially at this time of the year. As a young boy I used to walk with my father over the mountains from a pit village called Penybryn down past the coal owner's house to a small village in the next valley. We went to collect the Christmas poultry. There was a sense of unreality as one walked into that small village. The first thing that one noticed was that there were no men. There were a lot of women, but no men. The name of the village was Senghenydd. Those days were brought back to me quite graphically when I received a Christmas card from my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell). It says:

"Lest we forget. From Marion and Ray Powell."

On the inside is something written from a friend of mine called Les Gassor, the chairman of an NUM lodge. It is entitled "The price of coal", and says:

"71 years ago, on OCT 14th 1913, an explosion at the great UNIVERSAL COLLIERY, SENGHENYDD, claimed the lives of 440 men and boys."

That was every male in the village.

"The manager of the mine was found guilty of 8 charges of failure to carry out his statutory duties and he was fined £24·5½p per life. The COAL COMPANY was found innocent of any blame, but after pressure from the SOUTH WALES MINERS FEDN, the Inspector of Mines filed an appeal. In 1915 the Court of the King's bench allowed the appeal on one charge and sent the case back to the Magistrates Court for conviction. In February 1916, 3 years after the explosion, the same magistrates found the COMPANY GUILTY and fined them £10. Who looked after the widows and orphans left behind? The local community of course, just as they are now when struggle and strife have taken the place of grief and sorrow in our area. Those who criticise the lack of respect for the law shown by strikers in our fight to save jobs, should remember that we have never had justice in the whole history of our Trade Unions" and of our relationships with the law.

"The price of coal is one which has been paid heavily by our communities. A miner's life is a fight for existence every time he leaves home to start his shift in the pit and is more of a struggle now than ever when the Government wishes to cast him and his family on the scrap-heap for short-term, short-sighted 'economic' reasons."

That was written by Les Gassor, a striking miner, in 1984.

I remember that village. I remember my father going to work. I remember waiting and hoping that he would come home. I remember my brother, who now lives in Dorking and who was a pit overman, being badly crushed when he went to bring out a boy from the village who was trapped in the coal. Those people have an enormous sense of togetherness and community.

I am afraid that Conservative Members just do not understand the miners and the mining community. They do not understand that they are prepared to suffer nine months of continuous hardship, not for any selfish reasons, not to line their pockets, but simply to protect their homes and communities. They were the same miners who, in 1916 and 1917, rallied to the flag and laid down their lives by their thousands in the trenches of France, as evidenced by war memorials in every mining village in south Wales.

During the last war miners gave their all to provide the energy to keep this country going to push back the bounds of Fascism that is now coming back to Britain. They were miners who, in 1948, after the industry was nationalised, gave their all and produced reduced-price energy in order to revitalise and recharge this country so that it could recover from the war. If they had had the economic price of coal then, they would have built up so much capital that they would never have had to borrow a single penny. But they provided cheap energy for the country because they were taken into public ownership. Perhaps they saw themselves as public servants. The union also co-operated, foolishly in my view, because at the end of the day it has turned out that, although the present leader of the NUM warned miners many years ago of what would happen, his voice went unheeded. He is castigated now and subject to the utmost vilification, but if his views had been followed 10 years ago, we might not have been in this mess today.

The miners inherited a bankrupt industry in 1948. In 1919 the Sankey commission, which was set up because of the abuse of the coal industry by the coal owners during the first world war, said that our coal was so vital a resource that it was too precious to leave in the hands of private industry. Yet, it was more than 30 years before it was taken into public ownership.

I am only sad that the Government are not loyal to people who have given enormous service to the country. The Government are unpatriotic and will eventually sell everyone down the river for a quick buck. They will never understand the miners or the mining communities. That is why they will never beat them. They can bludgeon the miners back to work, sequestrate their union's funds and starve their children, but they will never beat them.

12.50 am

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): The debate is about Price Waterhouse. We must consider the sinister reasons why it has entered into the dispute. It gives me no pleasure to speak about the miners' strike and the sequestration of their union's funds. There should not have been a strike. The Government, for their own motives, brought the strike about, which brought Price Waterhouse on to the scene. There was no need for the strike, and therefore the responsibility must rest firmly on the shoulders of the Government.

When I was asked what the lads hoped to gain by striking, I said that they had everything to gain and nothing to lose because the strike was justified by the Government's entrenched long-term views about the coal industry. The Government have pursued and are pursuing short-term policies that are selling the nation down the river. Until such time as they consider the long-term needs of the country, we shall stumble from crisis to crisis.

I now turn to Mac the Knife. A great deal has been said about concessions that the Coal Board has made. The Coal Board has not moved one inch from day one of the strike. The introduction of Price Waterhouse into the dispute was therefore inevitable.

NACODS held a ballot. As a result of that, the Government said that the National Union of Mineworkers should accept what had been offered to NACODS. It was to receive its money and to be offered a talking shop when a pit was to be closed. The pit review and the colliery review closure procedure needs to be helped. That is at the heart of the strike. The Coal Board will decide to shut a pit, it will announce it to the union, and the union must then go through the charade of meeting the people who took the original decision to close the pit.

I do not know many instances where the board has back-pedalled. It may have changed its position slightly with regard to some development work, but apart from that it has not shifted. I have sat on the area consultative committee in Doncaster for many years. The lads said, rightly, that such local consultative committees are nothing but talking shops, because, at the end of the day, the Coal Board will make the decision, irrespective of how well the lads have presented their case. The Secretary of State for Energy announces to all who will listen that Scargill will not move from his position. What he should do is to tell Mac the Knife not only to shift his position but to get on the next boat to America.

The Government have not been honest about their long-term plans for the industry. If they are allowed to proceed on the course that they have taken, I envisage an industry with no more than 65,000 to 70,000 men producing 70 million tonnes of coal from a few super-pits. It is obvious that that policy will be pursued, because the Government are always saying that market forces should dominate our industries. If market forces are allowed to dominate, we must also take into account the balance of payments. Has the Chancellor of the Exchequer taken into account the amount that Price Waterhouse will spend in Europe on trying to return the NUM funds?

The Coal Board has announced the sacking of 450 men for vandalising pit property. I believe that the Secretary of State for Energy and the Government should resign, because they are causing more damage to the industry than are any lads back in the coalfields. We should consider the damage that the Government and Price Waterhouse are causing in our communities. The long-term plans about which the Government talk in relation to "Plan for Coal" are not worth a light unless they are geared to an energy policy. In 1978, there were posters on the billboards saying to the lads, "The industry needs you, and you will have a long and happy future with us."

It should not be for the Coal Board or the Government to decide whether a pit should close. We should have an independent panel to which both sides could present their cases. If the Government and the Coal Board are so convinced that what they say is correct, that panel will support them. When one takes into account all the policies, and how they affect the quality of life, there is obviously no case for pit closures.

Last Wednesday, the Attorney-General gave the worst performance of any Tory Minister—it was atrocious. One wonders what the connection is between the Attorney-General, the Government and Price Waterhouse. I do not doubt that when the historians are writing about this dispute, they will dig out something to show the link. I wonder whether it is the old boy's network, because at one stage Price Waterhouse used to be involved with the Government. It could be that the old boys are working together to add a little extra money to the millions that they already make.

Mr. Rogers: In time for Christmas.

Mr. Redmond: My hon. Friend is right.

The Attorney-General said that the Government were not creating a precedent that would pass on from one act of vandalism to another. I wonder whether he will have a word with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and advise him to take some VAT off the pop record that was made for Ethiopia. It is a pity that compassion and the crocodile tears that one sees on the Tory Benches on that matter do not come through in reality and in practice here. Miners who were made redundant before the strike began, and whose notice ended after the strike had started, have found that there is no compassion or understanding for them.

Great play has been made about the pit violence. I have not heard any condemnation from the Tory Benches of police violence; not even a question mark has been raised about what happens in our coalfields. In Toxteth there was a public inquiry, but in Armthorpe, a pit village where the police behaved like a set of hooligans, nothing whatsoever happened. There seems to be a sinister central control in this dispute. On the point about breaking the law, I wonder whether the Prime Minister will comply with the EEC ruling and pay the milk fines that are due from this country —or is she above that law?

Does the Solicitor-General agree that the hardships and humiliation that the suffragettes suffered to ensure that women got the vote were worth while? If they had not taken such action, this country might have been better off, because we would not have had this Prime Minister.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): This is an important debate, and, with great respect to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) who is a master of the understatement and of discretion, it is not a debate about minor indiscretions by the Attorney-General. It is not a debate in which we say to him, with hindsight, that he could have done differently. We are debating a cold attack on the law of Parliament and the constitution by the Attorney-General.

When I first saw the Supplementary Estimates in the Red Book concerning this so-called token provision for sequestration, I immediately said to myself, both as a barrister and a member of the Treasury Select Committee, that the provisions were illegal. My subsequent inquiries served to reveal the truth of that.

My first instinct was to ask: what is the authority for these provisions? I knew that there was no statutory authority because I had seen that problem before when I was on the Treasury Select Committee. I asked a journalist whether he could give me the Downing street briefing about what had happened. The journalist illegally provided me with that briefing. The briefing, dated Monday 10 December, was issued at 12.5 pm by Mr. Bernard Ingham, the Prime Minister's press secretary. The briefing stated:

"The legal powers were given under the common law powers of the Crown. The Crown has the same freedom as any other individual to give an indemnity . . . Since the Crown is dependent upon parliament to vote the necessary funds, it has been agreed between the Committee of Public Accounts and the Treasury that where a need to incur contingent commitments arises from a continuing policy requirement, powers should be conferred by statute. However, when giving an indemnity is a one-off exercise it is proper to rely on the Appropriations Act to provide the funds."

The Appropriations Act is a camouflage for illegality in this case.

I am sorry that the Attorney-General is ill and so is not present to hear the condign criticism that is justly made of him on this occasion. I shall advance four arguments. First, I know, from my position on the Treasury Select Committee, that no attempt should be made to extend common law powers into areas in which they do not properly belong, into unconvential areas and into areas where they would not be properly understood. That must be a definitional equation, because the purpose of common law powers is to be conventional and understood. In this case, the powers are not conventional and are not understood by hon. Members or individuals outside the House.

Secondly, for as long as anyone can remember, it has been the practice that any common law powers arrived at under the Crown prerogative should not be used in politically contentious cases. It is impossible to conceive of the use of the powers of the Crown prerogative in a more politically contentious matter, so their use stands squarely outside the conventinal use of such powers by the House.

Thirdly, questions have been asked about the precedents in this case. I have looked at all the precedents since time immemorial—or at least the year 1189—and there are no precedents in this case.

The fourth argument involves the analogy used by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). If, by some chance, the Chancellor lent me some money, I refused to pay him back, he then took legal action, I salted my money away abroad and sequestrators were sent in, no hon. Member or anyone outside the House in his right mind would suggest that the Attorney-General would have powers under the Crown prerogative to make token provision for sequestrators. That is the fundamental abuse of the civil law, to which my right hon. and learned Friend referred.

The Attorney-General has confused the use of his powers. He has powers to advise the Government but does not have powers to advise the Conservative party for the purposes of political advantage. That is what the right hon. and learned Gentleman has done in this case. The Attorney-General has advised the Conservative party on how to gain political advancement and, in the process, he has abused the law, parliamentary sovereignty and the Constitution.

What is worrying is that the Attorney-General did not act on a one-off basis; this is part of a pattern followed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. That is why it is all the more important for hon. Members to stand up and say, "No, we have had enough of this Attorney-General and the abuse of these powers."

We all remember sanctions busting in Rhodesia. I am one of about half a dozen people in this country who have seen the original files. I know about law breaking by politicians, civil servants and Sir Frank MacFadyen. I remember this Attorney-General coming here and saying that he supported the Director of Public Prosecutions in not prosecuting those people because some of them had retired and it would be difficult to obtain the evidence.

When I was at the Bar, no one ever came up to me and said, "Don't bother, Mr. Sedgemore. I understand that your client has retired," or "It will be difficult to get the evidence." That was a similar abuse of the law. We all remember that only last November, when The Observer published a series of articles about waste at the Ministry of Defence, the Attorney-General decided to take action against Mr. Williams and The Observer. What is worse, those of us who know remember the Attorney-General going to the Garrick club and saying that he would "get The Observer". He wanted "to get" The Observer because the Prime Minister was being attacked over Oman. That is a disgraceful, shameful abuse of the Attorney-General's power.

We cannot have the Attorney-General, once over sanctions busting, once over Mr. Williams and The Observer and once over the sequestration by Price Waterhouse, abusing the powers of the courts of this land. That is the Attorney-General. If he were here, the right thing for him to do would be to resign. The right thing for people such as me to do when we go outside the House is to report him to the Inns of Court and say, "We have had enough." I do not know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whether you remember reading E. P. Thompson's "Whigs and Hunters" in which he said:

"The laws of England were a nuisance, to be bent and manipulated by the ruling classes."

The person who has bent and manipulated the laws of England for too long in the House of Commons over the past six years is the Attorney-General.

What are we to say about Price Waterhouse? It is engaged in a merger with Deloitte Haskins and Sells, which will make it the biggest accountancy firm in the world. The message that must go out from the Conservative Benches and the Attorney-General is that Deloitte Haskins and Sells would probably be unwise to become involved in the kind of political dynamite into which Price Waterhouse is leading it. It will have nothing but trouble from Labour Members, and, if there is a future Labour Government, it will have nothing but trouble from them. It will have trouble from nationalised industries, local authorities, quangos and future Governments. The only decent thing to come out of this whole discreditable and despicable operation will be the ruin of that merger.

We all know that the managing director of Price Waterhouse earns £187,000 a year. It is monstrous that the Attorney-General should seek to indemnify that firm, with its turnover of £60 million per annum, and which pays its director £187,000.

The Attorney-General has debased and demeaned the laws of this country. I am not interested in listening to the Solicitor-General's answer. I do not want to be rude to him, but on occasions like this it would probably be better if we were to adjourn the debate so that the Attorney-General could answer for his misconduct and for the way in which he has debased the laws of this country, our Parliament and the constitution.

1.13 am

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): This matter may be the responsibility of the Law Officers and one can understand why the Solicitor-General is here, but, as my hon. Friends have already made clear, this debate also has a great deal to do with energy. I rather regret the fact that there are no energy Ministers on the Treasury Bench, because words have been and will be said which suggest that their presence would have been appropriate.

Even though the matter may primarily be one for the Solicitor-General, I regret that there is no one present on the Conservative Benches with any interest in energy, and that there is no Conservative Member to give support and sustenance to the Solicitor-General as he seeks to answer my hon. Friend's charges.

The Government may feel that they have been ingenious. It may be an ingenious adventure or initiative, but if the degree of ingenuity that has been employed in this rather sordid enterprise had been applied at any time during the past 10 long months of dispute, the nation might have been better served. It is almost 10 months since those employed at Cortonwood colliery were told that their colliery would cease to produce coal in five weeks. The Government may be free—I do not know—from the charge of manipulation in this adventure, but they have watched the media manipulating the facts for virtually the whole of the past 10 months and refrained from comment. The chairman, deputy chairman and secretary of the National Coal Board have made public comments to the effect that the board never proposed that Cortonwood colliery should close in just five weeks. Mr. MacGregor and his deputy, Mr. Cowan, along with the secretary to the board, Mr. Brandrath, in a letter to The Times, claim that it was merely proposed that Cortonwood should be subject to face colliery review procedures. They carefully ignored the fact that Cortonwood was down for cessation of production in five weeks, and the Government allowed them to do so. The Coal Board has deliberately and conveniently forgotten that, and over the ensuing months it has ignored the decision that it knew, and must have known, was made.

The Government have been ingenious in introducing this precedent. I only wish that they had shown ingenuity in ensuring that the truth in this bitter dispute was not allowed conveniently to be forgotten.

Another example of manipulation was when one of my hon. Friends became concerned about speeches made in the House by some of us who represent coalfield communities. He wrote to the chairman and expressed his concern about a case which he had heard presented in the Chamber. He observed that it was astonishing that Elsecar colliery should be closed in the latter part of 1983 and that over a hundred workers from that colliery should be moved to Cortonwood and given a guarantee of five years' work. Ministers are well aware that the reply was, in effect, a denial of a guarantee of five years' work. The deputy chairman wrote to the effect that, far from a guarantee of five years, everyone at Elsecar and Cortonwood knew that Cortonwood had a much shorter life than five years. He knew, as everyone in the board knew and as Treasury Ministers should have known, that the guarantee had been given.

We have had a great deal of ingenuity. There has been this ingenious precedent of paying a company which did not seek to be paid. On the other hand, there has been an absence of any ingenuity that might have brought this bitter dispute to an end. The dispute has continued for months longer than it need have done. There have been months of enormous hardship and embitterment. I do not know, but the dispute may continue for many more months.

If the Government had shown any sensitivity—they have already been accused of a complete lack of it—the strike would not have occurred. Instead of devoting effort to promoting peace, or to trying to assuage the bitterness, which will last for a long time, they have adopted a clever and almost undergraduate approach of providing money to a company which did not ask for it. That will create a dangerous and serious precedent.

I regret that no Department of Energy Ministers are on the Government Front Bench to give moral support to the Solicitor-General. I regret that they are not here to hearken to the calls for sanity that have been and will continue to be made. But if the hon. and learned Gentleman and his colleagues are to rely on this sort of adventurism, the nation will sooner or later wake up to the realities that face us.

Nearly 10 months have passed, at the end of which all we can see is this sort of adventure by the Attorney-General, supported by the Solicitor-General, and action that deserves the pen of a latter-day Gilbert and Sullivan. It may provide the material for someone to write a paperback to while away the tedium of a dull journey. It may have filled the headlines of the newspapers and provided people with comment about the jet-setting life of some City financiers. It does not actually help us one jot or tittle to solve the problem that has dominated the lives of many of us in the House for virtually 10 months. It is the condition of those whom we represent that should command attention from Government, not silly initiatives by people whose titles may almost have stemmed from Gilbert and Sullivan.

I trust that the Solicitor-General will remind his colleagues in government and energy Ministers that, while the Opposition recognise the severity and seriousness of the precedent that is involved, we are concerned about a much greater and deeper reality. It is that to which the Government's ingenuity should be addressed.

1.21 am

Mr. Michael Welsh (Doncaster, North): In the debate earlier today, a Minister would not allow money to be spent on house building. That was completely wrong, but it is what the Minister decided. In contrast, on 11 December, the Attorney-General was throwing money about like confetti. Is it not strange that only today a Minister objected to money being spent on providing houses for the needy, yet the Attorney-General had plenty of money to throw about to protect those who have plenty of money? It is a strange affair, but that is what happened.

I am sorry that the Attorney-General is ill. He should have been here. The Solicitor-General, who is here in his place, will appreciate that we hope that he gets well quickly——

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): There is nothing wrong with the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mr. Welsh: No — Opposition Members have compassion, and I hope that we always do. That is very important.

The Attorney-General said that Mr. Justice Nicholls ordered sequestration, and the sequestrators appointed by the court were named on 11 December as Price Waterhouse. That was due to a civil action brought to the courts — Taylor and Foulstone v. the NUM. That is important, because it is the issue that we are debating tonight.

The Attorney-General said that the Government would indemnify. I am not quite sure what that word means. I think that it means that if anybody loses any money, the Government will compensate him. As a layman, I think that that is what it means. The Government will indemnify Price Waterhouse against the costs that it incurs. I think that the Solicitor-General will agree with that. On 11 December there was no reference to Justice Davies. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that only the costs of Price Waterhouse will be indemnified. Nowhere can I find in the Attorney-General's statement any reference to Justice Davies. I think that the Solicitor-General will agree with that.

On 6 December Michael Arnold, senior involvements partner of City accountants Arthur Young McClelland Moores, was appointed as receiver. At no time did the Attorney-General say that the Government would look after that firm. They are only going to look after Price Waterhouse under the appointment of Justice Nicholls. Nothing from Justice Davies will be looked after at all, because that was not mentioned in the statement of 11 December. The appointments and statements of certain people will be covered, but nothing else. That is important, because what Justice Davies did will cost a lot more. Will the Solicitor-General confirm that the intention is to look after Justice Nicholls but not Justice Davies? If that is so, the costs—at present about £100,000—will have to be divided.

If that is not the position, there is a great gap which needs to be clarified in relation to the Attorney-General's statement, as I am sure the Solicitor-General will agree. I hope that the Solicitor-General will make a statement about that today. If his statement differs from the Attorney-General's statement, it will mean not that the House was misled on 11 December but that all the evidence—the whole truth, as it were—was not given with regard to the support to be given by the Government. I hope that the Solicitor-General will explain exactly what the Government intend to underwrite.

I cannot imagine why the Government decided to support Price Waterhouse—a firm so rich that it could afford to lend the Government money if they got into difficulties. It is strange indeed. I should have liked to ask the Attorney-General about that, but I accept that he is ill and that I therefore cannot do so. If there is a reason for supporting in this way the actions of a legal firm acting on behalf of the law of the land, it is strange indeed that the body against which action is being taken is the National Union of Mineworkers.

Action of such magnitude has never been taken against other unions. I agree that there are other issues on which action could be taken. Indeed, it has been done. The law of the land—not the state—was involved in 1972, in the case of Gold v. the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers and in 1973 in the case of Col-Mech Ltd. v. the AUEW. But in those cases the amount at issue was only the amount required by the law. This is the first time that the law of the land has ever attempted to take the entire funds of any institution, and the institution involved just happens to be the NUM.

There are special factors involved in this case, and the action taken has never been taken before. I question the position of the Attorney-General under the law of the land.

What is also vitally important is not what the Attorney-General has done, but what he has not done. With regard to certain issues involving law and order, the Attorney-General has sat back. The Solicitor-General may say that law and order is the Home Secretary's job, but it has been necessary for action to be taken by his Department. The hon. and learned Gentleman has not acted to protect certain issues, when he could have done so. There was the occasion when four policemen invaded the house of an 84-year-old woman in Stainforth in my constituency. That poor beautiful lady weighed about five stone. Nothing was done. The Attorney-General did not take action against any policeman or anyone else. That was a disgrace. The matter could have been taken further, but the lady did not wish it to be.

In the early days of the mining dispute, when there was no trouble, I was in Nottingham when a car was pulled open because the men inside would not wind the window down. The police smashed the windscreen. They could have hurt those poor miners. I telephoned the chief constable of Nottinghamshire. He was not available. I spoke to the deputy chief constable. I said, "You cannot condone this." He said, "I do." He condoned that violence.

[Mr. Welsh]

He condoned physical violence, and the Attorney-General was not interested. Yet he should be looking after the nation.

There are ways of complaining about such occurences. The Home Secretary says, "Take it up. Complain. Take them to court. The NUM has plenty of money." The NUM has no money now, so how could anyone sue it? It is embarrassing to hear the Home Secretary tell us to sue the police when the NUM's money has been taken.

I should like to ask the Solicitor-General a direct question. Did the Prime Minister have anything to do with that decision? That is all I am asking. I hope that I shall get an answer.

1.35 am

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): The sequestration of the NUM's funds by Price Waterhouse, the blank cheque that the Government have given to underwrite that company and the involvement of the Attorney-General's office in this dispute is a combination that has been brought about by fetching the law into industrial relations. The danger in this dispute is that the Government seriously think that, by Price Waterhouse sequestrating NUM funds, they can break the union. Even Tuesday's Financial Times wrote:

"Nalgo not to give sequestrators details of funds for miners . . . The Nalgo decision could itself place the union in contempt of court".

Where will it stop, this bringing of the law into industrial relations? The union's money does not belong to the general secretary. NUM money does not belong to Scargill; General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union money does not belong to Basnett, Transport and General Workers Union money does not belong to Moss Evans; and Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen money does not belong to Ray Buckton. The money belongs to the members who have contributed for many years.

I joined a union when I was 14 and have paid union contributions every year since, even when I served in the Armed Forces. There are many like me who have belonged to a union for many years. When the Government think that they are getting at a general secretary, they are in fact hitting all the members of a union.

If the law could solve industrial relations, the simplest thing would be for the Government to pass a law that required everyone to go to work from 7.30 am until 5 pm without a break. Indeed, why should they not pass a law saying that the miners must go back to work tomorrow morning—if the law can solve industrial relations? The law has the opposite effect. It has lengthened rather than shortened this dispute. Many people in Britain feel that there are two laws—one for some people and another for the rest. When the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food came back with milk quotas from Europe, dairy farmers were not particularly happy. When there was a milk race at Aberystwyth, dairy farmers got their tractors and Land Rovers out and barricaded the road to stop the milk race. One farmer was arrested. Yet hundreds of miners are arrested for obstruction when they merely step from the pavement to the road. Tha is why people think that there are two laws.

When the Prime Minister went to speak at a Tory meeting in Wales, someone among a group of farmers' wives who were demonstrating threw an egg and hit the Prime Minister. Nobody wants that to happen, but the point is that nobody was arrested. Yet hundreds of miners who stand outside mines shouting "$cabs!" are immediately arrested and put in gaol. That is why many people think that there are two laws and that the law is being brought into disrepute.

We have seen all this before. I remember the sequestrator coming to Hebburn urban district council, as a result of industrial relations legislation which was introduced by the 1970-74 Government formed by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), to take £50,000 of the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers' money which was invested in that council. It did not work then and it will not work this time, because a union's assets are under the caps of members of that union. They cannot be taken away.

Many people also feel strongly about the Social Security Act, which denies benefit to the dependants of strikers. A few months ago I asked the Prime Minister why the law should treat the dependants of the Yorkshire Ripper—who is in jail to protect society—better than the dependants of a Yorkshire miner who is on strike to defend his community. That is nonsense.

If a trade unionist went to work tomorrow and voted for a strike, £16 would be deducted from the benefit paid to his dependants, but if he went to work and shot the foreman, he would be put in jail and his dependants would be looked after. That is the nonsense of our trade union legislation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) hit the nail right on the head when he said that the issue is not about uneconomic pits. It is an attempt to break one of our strongest trade unions. Given the legislation which has been introduced by the Government since 1979—the Social Security Act, the Employment Acts of 1980 and 1982 and the trade union legislation which has recently received Royal Assent — it is easy to see what is happening.

Many years ago I read an article by Martin Niemoller on what happened in Germany between 1933 and 1945. He said:

"When they came for the Communists we were not Communists—so we did nothing.

When they came for the Jews we were not Jews—so we did nothing.

When they came for the Social Democrats we were not Social Democrats—so we did nothing.

When they came for the Trade Unionists we were not Trade Unionists—so we did nothing.

When they came for the liberals and intellectuals we were scared—so we did nothing.

When they came for the Churchmen we were frightened—so we did nothing.

When they came for us we looked for help—but we were alone!"

The same is happening to the trade union movement, and those words are as true now as they were when Martin Niemoller first wrote them. In the context of this dispute they would read:

"When they came for the steelworkers we were not steelworkers—so we did nothing.

When they came for the railwaymen we were not in ASLEF—so we did nothing.

When they came for the NGA we were not in the printing industry—so we did nothing.

When they took the union cards off the civil servants at GCHQ we were scared—so we did nothing.

When they came for the miners we were frightened—so we did nothing.

When they came for us we looked for help—but we were alone."

That is my message to the trade union movement, and I hope that it takes notice of it.

1.43 am

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Lest we forget why we are gathered here this evening, it might be worth recalling the incident that took place the other day in the Chamber, when the Attorney-General ventured upon what can only be described as a vicious attack on my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris). That was an occasion that we all recall, because nothing that my right hon. and learned Friend said in any way deserved the response that he received. It might be that the Attorney-General is not au fait with the practices of parliamentarians in this House, and that may be why he made that mistake.

I cannot match the passion of my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), who put his case emotionally and accurately on behalf of the people he represents in the valleys of south Wales.

I was born in Ty-coch, Swansea. As a child, I remember going up those valleys with my father. I remember sitting at the knee of my grandmother who explained to me what happened in south Wales in the 1920s. I have never suffered such experiences. I can savour them only through the experience of others, but they bear examination. They illustrate what may happen if the Government get their way. The Government wish to use the law of this land to destroy the National Union of Mineworkers. Let nobody outside the Chamber be in any doubt about their intention. If they do not understand the implications of the Government's intentions, they should read the history of the Labour movement and try to understand the implications of smashing a trade union. We can remove a union's assets and take away its worldly wealth, but we cannot remove its sole raison d'etre.

Last weekend a very beautiful photograph appeared in the Observer Review. It showed five women standing on a picket line in south Wales. Underneath was the heading:

"No surrender in the valleys."

The expressions on the faces of those women showed their sheer guts and determination never to be defeated. That is what the Government face. They cannot resolve the problem in the courts, through sequestration, or by destroying the NUM. The Government will have to face the wrath of the tens of thousands of people who will never forget what is happening today. We are talking not just about a few people, but about the families of those miners who are in the front line of this very tragic experience —perhaps as many as 250,000 people in the heart of Britain's industrial areas. They form the backbone of the industrial working class of this country. As my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda said, they will never forget.

There is an alternative to sequestration. During the last two or three weeks we have repeatedly drawn the attention of the Government to two recently published documents. One was published by five academic accountants, all of whom have experience of the accounts of the NCB. The second document was published by the London Business School.

The first document effectively challenges most of the commercial and financial assumptions of the National Coal Board about its closure programme. That case was answered at the Dispatch Box by the Prime Minister in response to a number of questions that were put to her by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher). Upon each occasion we went back to those who carried out the research and asked them to clarify the position. Subsequently they withdrew the original document which was to be published in the magazine Accountancy. Yesterday morning the revised version of their original document went into print in Accountancy Age. Most of my hon. Friends have a copy of that document. It answers all the criticisms made by the Prime Minister in the House and by the National Coal Board in discussions with the Government, the Prime Minister's private office and the magazine "Accountancy". Their reservations have been answered, and that document is relevant.

The London Business School document must be viewed in terms of its ability to provide a solution to the industrial action. The document says that if allowances are made for fluctuating potential profitability in pits — what the authors define as avoidable costs — about 160,000 people are currently employed in pits which are potentially profitable. That figure has been derived by applying the most stringent criterion of profitability; that is, that every pit must break even, not just the industry as a whole. The document states:

"Suppose the miners' fierce resistance to further closures, following a period of three years in which some 35,000 mining redundancies were peacably agreed, does reflect their fears that a further 100,000 jobs could disappear. Is a compromise possible whereby the National Union of Mineworkers is persuaded to accept the principle of closure on economic grounds in return for a guarantee that the principle will not be pursued to the point where the industry is completely decimated? If such a compromise is sought, then further discussions of the economics of the industry will be needed."

That document and the others are an alternative to sequestration. They are the olive branch which independent observers, watching from outside, who wish to see the dispute resolved are submitting as the basis on which further negotiations can take place. On the basis of conversations with persons who are close to the National Union of Mineworkers national executive, I believe that if the Government were to show, in even the minutest way, that those two documents could form the basis for a resumption of negotiations, the National Union of Mineworkers would tell the Government — privately, initially—that things could start to happen.

The dispute will have to end one day. The Government have alternatives. They can use the courts and sequestration to crush the union. They may remove its assets, but they will not crush the spirit of the miners. Whatever happens, the union will remain in spirit.

Alternatively, the Government can send even a tiny signal of an intention to examine documents that might form the basis of further negotiations. If they did that, people would wish to go to the negotiating table and we would see the end of the dispute.

If we proceed on the basis of what has happened so far —we have already spent, on a conservative estimate, £1·5 billion—a further £1 billion may run down the plug-hole in a matter of months. Is that what the British people want? Those two documents could form the basis of negotiation and bring the parties together. To talk in terms of there being no movement in the NUM's position would be highly irresponsible if the Government said that those documents could form the basis for negotiation. If the Government made that offer, I am sure that the NUM would equally wish to respond, and that people throughout the United Kingdom would say that it should do so.

There is a way out of the dispute. The Government need not go back to the courts. The courts are not needed. Flexibility is needed. Those two documents provide the basis for flexibility. The Minister should go to his colleagues and say, "Let us have a look at those documents that Labour Members have been on about for the past three weeks. Let us send signals out to the NUM and see whether what those Labour Members said in the debate the other night was empty rhetoric or really meant something." I know that what I have said is based on real conversations that have taken place.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Front Bench wishes to catch my eye at 2.45 am. Five hon. Members are still waiting to speak. If they limit themselves to nine minutes each, they should all be able to do so.

1.56 am

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I shall take note of the time, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I am glad to have this opportunity to speak about the sequestration, Price Waterhouse, and the unprecedented guarantees that the Government have given. They are unprecedented, but not unexpected. The Government are dogmatically determined to defeat and destroy the NUM. Hon. Members should make no mistake: the sole reason for sequestration and for giving that indemnity was to destroy the NUM and to end the dispute in that way. The Government will not win like that, because, as long as the miners are willing to withhold their labour, they cannot do so.

I represent a constituency that was founded on two industries: cotton, which has almost gone, and coal mining, which has completely disappeared. In Burnley coal was mined for 500 or 600 years, but our last coal mine at Hapton valley closed about two years ago. Many people still work at Agecroft and other pits, and travel to work every day. But there are retired miners and miners who took redundancy because they felt that they were too old to take the transfer when Hapton valley closed. They say that their only regret about this dispute is that it did not happen a few years ago, and that we did not fight to save the mines in Burnley and in many other areas. That is the tragedy. That is what should have been done.

The amazing thing is that, although the NCB has closed its operations in Burnley, within the past few months a private coal mine has opened to extract the coal that the board left behind. At tomorrow night's meeting of the planning committee in Burnley there will be yet another application to mine more coal from the pits left there.

Every industry fiddles the accounts and shows profits where it wants. Multinationals can even show profits in the countries that they want. Until last year I worked in an industry that manufactured television tubes. We were told that we were making them at a loss, but another part of the company that made the sets, was making a substantial profit out of those tubes.

My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) said that the NCB's objective is that every pit must make a profit. That is nonsense. We must judge the industry as a whole. Whether the industry is successful depends on how it meets the nation's energy needs. That cannot be judged solely in accounting terms. We should look at the national energy policy. If the Government were doing their job, they would use coal to extend the life of the natural gas that we have and start feeding substitute natural gas into the pipeline. They would also consider coal liquefication and extending the life of our oil reserves with substitutes. Those are the directions in which we should be working.

The Prime Minister often refers to Victorian values and seems to be proud of them. Let us remember the old industrial and pit towns of Britain in Victorian times. Is that what Britain wants to return to? The Prime Minister is trying to return the trade union movement to Victorian times. Britain may have been wealthy. We may have been powerful in Victorian times, but that power was achieved on the backs of ordinary working people. That surely cannot be acceptable in 1984 and 1985.

There is no doubt that the NCB provoked the dispute by not abiding by the agreed procedures at Cortonwood. Having invested a large amount of money and told the miners that they had a future, the NCB suddenly said that production would cease in five weeks' time. That would obviously be provocative and cause a dispute.

The police have turned people back on motorways because they believed that they might be going to picket and that there might be a dispute or some other unfortunate incident. If that were done on any Saturday, when coaches are travelling to different parts of the country with football supporters, in the belief that there may be a disturbance at a football match, it would not be acceptable. That is the path down which the Government are going. It is an infringement of civil rights and the development of a police state. We want to see that practice ended. Since the dispute began in the first week of March, the Government have not taken one positive action to try to resolve the dispute and get the miners back to work. I have never known another national dispute where the Government have not tried to intervene at some stage to try to bring both sides together in negotiations to resolve the dispute.

The Government have not intervened because they have one objective: they want to defeat the mineworkers and Arthur Scargill. That will not be allowed to happen because it is not Arthur Scargill's battle; it is the NUM's battle, and it has the support of many millions of people in Britain. It has the support of the Labour party and it will win. Ultimately the Government will have to recognise that there must be negotiations and that we must try to achieve a peaceful settlement and develop sensible energy use in Britain.

2.3 am

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I am grateful to you for calling me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Roughly one third of the pits in the Lancashire coalfield are in my constituency and just under one third of its miners. My miners have been on strike since the beginning of the dispute and they remain resolute in their determination to see the matter through to the end. I mention those matters in opening because when we begin to consider the matter, many questions, particularly with regard to the sequestration, require to be answered.

I made an application to ask a private notice question on Monday this week which was refused. It was very much in the terms of a question that I asked the Attorney-General, to which I received an answer. I seek not to be critical because it is not good manners to be critical of a person in his absence. I do not seek to be critical. However, on that occasion I received an answer that as a solicitor—I am no longer one—I would not have given.

My question was whether or not the precedent set in this matter would be extended. I received a professional attack in reply, as did my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris). I am used to the professional banter of the House, but that does not negate the question. On what precedent were all these matters based? We now hear that it is the common law of England. That is like saying to a farmer that there is a grain store over there. It means nothing. It does not answer the question.

The private notice question that I sought to put down on Monday was this. At the time of the Attorney-General's statement we were told that the sequestrators had about £8,000 in cash, which they could glean towards the payment of their fees. The sum was paltry and Price Waterhouse needed to be indemnified. However, it did not want it. That is on public record, so, that matter need not be pursued further.

The House was not told, what any competent lawyer already knew, that the National Union of Mineworkers owned many properties in which its existing officials and retired former officials were tenants. Those union assets are within the United Kingdom and are available to the sequestrators. During the weekend there were press reports about former members of the NUM being written to about the payment of their rent, including Lord Gormley. He was asked to pay his rent and he said that in future he would pay it to the sequestrators.

When the statement was made to the House, that fact was clearly known to the sequestrators. Was it known to the Attorney-General? The assets had a tangible and genuine value and were within the possession of the sequestrators in so far as an application for payment of rent had already been made. What then was the need for the indemnity? The assets were there.

I would not countenance or support the realisation of those assets, but the principle is established. The assets were available. The question of my right hon. and learned Friend to the Attorney-General and that which I put were exactly the same. Bearing in mind what normally happens in a sequestration, what was the purpose of the indemnity? The truth is that it was a purely political act, motivated not by the Attorney-General, but from another quarter, as was clearly demonstrated by the press statement. One more knife was being driven into the wound which has been unnecessarily created during the dispute.

It has been blatantly obvious from the word go that, had the normal rules and practices of industrial action been applied to the dispute, the matter would have been resolved a long time ago. Every time a solution has been sought—my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) has referred openly to this in the House—the Coal Board negotiators telephone, not the Coal Board, but Downing street. The dispute has been driven deeper and deeper by the Government's complete inability to negotiate or to behave in a way that sought negotiation.

We can all play politics. We can all say that we want resolution on our terms, but I say this to the Government: every day that passes, people in my constituency are paying the price for the intransigence of the Government and their unwillingness to make a move to resolve the dispute. Many thousands of my constituents, whether they be miners or miners' relatives or children, have suffered inordinately because of the Government's intransigence. It is unnecessary, and it has always been unnecessary, because this matter could have been resolved with good will round the table, provided that the government recognised one thing: that the miners have a deep and abiding loyalty not only to their colleagues but to the industry. The mining communities believe that their industry is worth while. They have a belief in its future that the Government have failed to recognise. The Government seem to have a simple motto: if it stays still long enough, sell it. The coal mining industry is not for sale. It must be developed in the interests of society.

Long after the Government have left office, there will be a coal mining industry, because people such as the constituents whom I am proud to serve will have fought again and again to maintain it. They believe in its future, they recognise its potential, and they will give their all to develop it. It might be a nice new year gesture if the Government showed some confidence and faith in the industry, and tried to do something to support its future rather than seeking to destroy it at every turn.

2.12 am

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe) on initiating a debate—I shall try not to stray from the subject—on Price Waterhouse and the sequestration of NUM assets. My hon. Friend, with his great knowledge of mining, expressed his view with sincerity of purpose. I know that his union and his mining friends appreciate his representation of them in the House. I was interested to hear my right hon. and learned Friend the member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) sum up succinctly the legal technicalities, and I hope that the Solicitor-General's reply will show why the Prime Minister was able to give direct instructions that the costs of the firm trying to sequestrate the assets of the NUM would be met by the Treasury.

Will the Government be able to answer some of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore)? If they are, as he suggests, infringing the laws of the country, is it not time that the House had an explanation of why, and who gives them the authority if they have it?

It is strange that in a similar case, affecting a different union, the Transport and General Workers Union, the Government have brought in William the Conqueror to rescue the Tory party and to assist the sequestration of funds from the TGWU. The Morning Star of Wednesday 12 December says that the High Court

"pulled an official White Rabbit out of the hat to extract £200,000 from the Transport and General Workers Union funds, without imposing sequestration."

The title of the court official discovered for this purpose is the Queen's Remembrancer, a title introduced by William the Conqueror. The Government are going back into the depths of history to find out different officers. Whenever I walk through the corridors of the Palace of Westminster, I am intrigued to find different people lurking around, but I have never found a Queen's Remembrancer. Can we have an explanation about this person. Who pays his salary? What does he get? According to the article in the Morning Star, the holder of this ancient office, is Mr. J. R. Bickford-Smith, a barrister and a master of the High Court, whose job is to remember and collect debts owed to the Crown.

The court's decision to avoid going through the procedure of sequestrating funds from Britain's biggest union, follows the undignified treatment of the receiver appointed to grab the miners' funds in Luxembourg. I ask for a reply from the Solicitor-General as to who the Queen's Remembrancer is, why he has been appointed, and why it was possible to appoint him before the Government brought in Price Waterhouse to sequestrate the funds of the NUM.

In the Welsh valleys, most of the striking miners have photocopies of the Economist's leaked version of the Ridley report. That shows clearly what the Tory party intends to do with the NUM and with the trade union movement, and what the Tory party in six years of office has accomplished. Things that were not in its manifesto are included in the Ridley report. This proves conclusively what we have said in the House over a number of years.

In March 1983, the then Secretary of State for Energy, the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), gave the House a statement to say that he was appointing Ian MacGregor as the chairman of the NCB. He said:

"Accordingly, a fee of £1·5 million will be paid to Lazard Freres in compensation for the loss of Mr. MacGregor's service. Two thirds of that fee will be refundable on a pro rata basis if Mr. MacGregor does not complete his full three-year term."—[Official Report, 28 March 1983; Vol. 40, c. 19.]

Who on earth on the Government Benches, with all their directorships, managing directorships and ownership of many companies would have appointed any person to that type of job at that salary? How long would Government Ministers have allowed that person to remain in office? Mr. MacGregor was appointed on 1 December 1983, and, for 10 of the 14 months he has been in office, he has had the industry on stop. What private company would have allowed that to happen? What private company would have appointed Mr. MacGregor?

Many of my hon. Friends who have participated in this debate tonight asked questions about Mr. MacGregor's appointment when his appointment was announced to the House, and they are still asking questions. Was Mr. MacGregor appointed for the primary purpose of ensuring that the NUM was crushed? I know that the Prime Minister, Ministers and many Tories are still smarting at the result of the NUM's action during the term of the previous Tory Government. I regret the fact that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, were not in the Chair when my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) described what is happening to the miners, their wives and children.

I shall be proud until my dying day that I was born the son of a miner in the Rhondda. Miners are the most compassionate race of people one could ever meet. I assure the House that in no way will the mining communities capitulate to threats from the Tory Government. For over half a century, the miners have endured suppression from the Tory Administration. As my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda stated, the miners will not capitulate to this Government, and the sooner the Government appreciate that fact and negotiate, the better.

Perhaps the Solicitor-General will read my speech on the motion to adjourn the House for the Christmas recess. I asked hon. Members to give two days of their holiday to discuss the miners' dispute. That might be the answer to the problem. If we are the legislators of this country, let us resolve this dispute. My right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) is the only Member who has tried to resolve this dispute. If the Government had taken the lead from my right hon. Friend, I am sure that the dispute would have been resolved long before now.

2.23 am

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): We are debating the intervention of Price Waterhouse which, before this case, was a firm of accountants unknown to the country at large, despite the fact that it controlled an empire worth £60 million a year. It is interesting to step back and to realise why the company became involved in the courts in the first place.

Price Waterhouse became involved because of the action of two scabs who took a case through the courts. They received funding from companies such as United Biscuits. On the secret advice—it later became public—of Mr. MacGregor and his runner, Mr. Hart, shuffling between Hobart house and 10 Downing street, those two individuals were advised to attack NUM funds. Along came Price Waterhouse. The debate correctly concentrates on the way in which Price Waterhouse attacks the NUM's assets.

Not just the NUM's assets are threatened by the work of Price Waterhouse. This week's Militant newspaper prints the letter from Price Waterhouse which has gone out to the general secretaries of every trade union. It demands of every trade union that they issue a report to Price Waterhouse stating the amount of each and every payment that they have made to the National Union of Mineworkers, and whether it was in cash and by way of a loan or gift. If payments were made by cheque, Price Waterhouse require sight or a copy of both sides of the cheques. It wants to know the person or persons to whom the payment was made, the purpose for which the money was used by the miners, whether it is intended to make any further payments with full particulars if they are. Price Waterhouse notes that it is authorised and commanded by the court to take into possession all the assets of the union and says that it intends to track down any money presently controlled by other trade unions which is destined for the NUM.

That is not just an attack on the NUM and its assets but a threat to the control of the funds of 10·5 million members of the Trade Union Congress and its affiliates.

All that Price Waterhouse obtained in the first instance was Lord Gormley's house and swimming pool, and about £8,000 in cash. The date upon which the decision was made to chase the rest of the union's money in Luxembourg is significant. It came at the end of the failure of another of the Coal Board's tactics, which was carried out on the Government's instructions. That was the so-called drift back to work.

The Secretary of State for Energy claimed as far back as July that 60,000 miners were at work. The NCB did not reach that figure until about the middle of November. We must recognise that today 90 per cent. of the miners in Scotland, 97 per cent. of the miners in Yorkshire and 99 per cent. of the miners in south Wales are on strike and have remained solid for nearly 10 months.

The carrot had failed. The bribes had failed. The sums of money that had been approved in the House at half-past one, two and three o'clock in the morning which gave lump sum social security payments to miners to give up the jobs which belong rightly to the next generation in the mining areas leaving school had failed. The Government then thought that they should try the stick, and attack the union through its funds.

The Government used the same speed, prompted by the same obsession of the Prime Minister's, as they had used to attack miners' benefits when they tried to starve them back to work. Only a week ago I asked the Leader of the House in business questions, and the Treasury Bench in questions to the Chancellor immediately before, about the Government's intention to attack single striking miners over the housing benefit that it had been found they were entitled to claim for 10 months if they were paying rent to relatives when living at home. When I asked whether the Government intended to introduce regulations they hummed and hawed. They would not commit themselves. They made the regulations on 17 December; they laid them before Parliament on 18 December; and they came into operation on 19 December. During my brief membership of the House I had understood that there was normally a 21-day waiting period between regulations being laid and coming into operation.

When it comes to attacking the miners, by Price Waterhouse or by laying regulations on the Table, the Government are obsessed almost to the point of insanity with tracking down money which rightly belongs to the NUM or its members. Matters are entirely different when it comes to tax evasion or tax avoidance. There we see plans to close Inland Revenue offices and reduce the number of staff who tackle those who salt money away in Jersey, Guernsey or the Isle of Man. Which nationally know firm of accountants was employed to track down Lord Vestey and his butchers when they paid only 10 quid in tax on £2·5 million profit, or whatever the precise figure was? Was Price Waterhouse brought in then? No. That is because he was a mate of the Tory party. It is a matter of class.

When workers and their money are involved, employ a £60 million firm of accountants to chase them, and give it all the resources it needs. When it is tax evasion and avoidance try to sweep it under the carpet and see whether the matter can be forgotten. That illustrates the political nature of tonight's discussion, and the class nature of the law in the way that it is being employed by the Tory Government at present.

The law is not neutral, not even in this hallowed Chamber where law is supposed to be made. We on the Labour Benches know that it is invented by those like the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The right hon. Gentleman invented it when he was Secretary of State for Employment and so did his predecessor. The law is administered by Tories like Lord Chief Justice Donaldson, who intervened in the battle of the National Graphical Association with Eddie Shah at Warrington. He tried to take the money of the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers in 1972. He was the head of the industrial relations court in 1971. We are told that when someone puts on a piece of white fur he becomes a neutral Lord Chief Justice. The present Lord Chief Justice is a former Croydon Tory councillor and a past president of the Conservative and Unionist Association at Cambridge university. I do not believe that his decisions are entirely impartial and fair once he dons a wig. Let us remember that he was consorting with Ministers as recently as 36 months ago and planning recently enacted anti-trade union legislation.

The law is funded by political interests. United Biscuits funded Taylor and Foulstone, which initiated the action against the NUM, and that company funds the Tory party. It is one of the largest contributors to the Tory party. When it comes to selecting a sequestrator, the Government do not have the nouse to pick someone who does not have a political background. They picked a bloke called Brewer the first time round, the vice-chairman of the Hallam Conservative Association. How political can one get? However, the Government saw fit to pick a sequestrator with that sort of political background.

Of course, the Government have had the support of the newspapers. Virtually all the editors have been knighted by the Government. The legislation that we are discussing, which is being followed through by Price Waterhouse, has a political history. It was political when it was invented, administered and enforced.

The Tory Government have failed to crack the solidarity of the majority of miners. They have wasted £4,500 million and more in trying to defeat the NUM. That sum would enable the Government to reduce the burden of every taxpayer by £4 a week or to pay about £25 a week to every person on the dole. That is an example of the uneconomic terms of the strike. Apparently it is more economic to invest that sort of money to try to break the NUM than to give a decent sum to those who are on the dole. The money that the Government have spent in furtherance of the dispute would have been sufficient to provide a new general hospital as well as six new comprehensive schools and 1,000 council houses in each of 45 cities of the size of Coventry. Instead, the Government have spent the money in trying to break the NUM. In addition to the money that they have already spent, they are funding Price Waterhouse in pursuance of a vindictive court action.

The Government have tried to convince the miners that they were working in an uneconomic industry with uneconomic pits. That argument has failed. It is ironic that one of the five professors of accountancy who have destroyed that argument is a Price Waterhouse man at Manchester university. The Government selected a firm of accountants and one of its members scabbed on them by saying that their economic argument was up the chute. There has been a report from Dr. Andrew Glyn to the effect that their economic argument is up the chute. The Government have included the interest payments that they have received from the National Coal Board. They have included also the compensation payments that have been made to those whose homes have been destroyed by subsidence, especially in the Mansfield area. They have included the pensions paid to retired miners.

Even if the Government close every pit in Britain, they would still have to pay compensation for subsidence, pensions to former miners and interest charges on loans that have been guaranteed. How can those obligations be a charge on the present generation of miners? How can they be a charge on Cortonwood, Betteshanger or any of the other pits that are under threat? They should be a charge upon the Government and they should be borne by them. They should not be used in an attempt to prove that the industry is uneconomic.

The Government have tried to starve the miners back to work by cutting benefits. Benefits have been reduced to a level that is lower than those that would be paid to the families of murderers. They have tried to bludgeon the miners back by the use of the police.

As there are one or two faces in the Chamber that are new to the two debates on the miners that we have had in the past 10 months, I shall say again — it is worth repeating—that four months ago my sister had a baby. My brother-in-law is a member of the NUM. He is an electrician at the Selby coalfield. I visited my family at Selby a couple of days before the baby was born and we watched the television news together. At 20 minutes to six o'clock on the BBC news there was a report of seven policemen in the south being sent to arrest post office robbers who were known to be armed with sawn-off shotguns.

At 5.45 pm on ITV there was an entirely different story in the headlines. There were 1,000 policemen in riot gear on horseback with dogs, truncheons and shields escorting one man—Brian Green—into the Gascoigne Wood area of the Selby coalfield. When it comes to law and order, in the eyes of the Tory Government, it is a bigger crime to stand on the picket line and defend one's job and one's community than to use a sawn-off shotgun. In that case, one out of the seven policemen was shot in the groin and the head. He was put on a life-support machine, and subsequently died, yet more policemen were used to get one scab into a coalfield than were sent to arrest people known to have sawn-off shotguns.

If the fight goes on and the Government succeed in taking away the miners' money for the use of Price Waterhouse, that will not destroy the mood and morale of the NUM and its members, who are defending their communities and their jobs. The argument has nothing to do with economic or uneconomic pits. In the language of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, this is a battle to neuter and castrate the trade union movement, with the NUM being the first in line. The Tory Government think that if they can crack the NUM, the others will despair and be demoralised, and can be beaten. It will not work. The miners will not be defeated. In my area of Warwickshire, and in Wales, Scotland, Yorkshire and other areas, the miners will not be defeated.

The system lorded over by the Government is not working. Some 5 million are on the dole, 6 million live in damp houses, 9·7 million cannot afford a holiday away from home without staying with relatives, and 15 million are on or below the officially defined poverty line. Those are the economic reasons why the Government want to attack the trade union movement. Only the trade unions stand in the way of the working class being further pauperised and the Government enriching their own supporters.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Nellist: No, because I am just about to finish.

That is the basis of the Government's decision to fund Price Waterhouse. If they can defeat the NUM, they think that they can carry that programme further. They are in for a shock. The miners will not be defeated.

2.37 am

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): At the beginning of the debate we were talking about Price Waterhouse having to go round the world trying to find the money. I said a few days ago, when the Attorney-General was not sick —I rather suspect that he is not today; he is dodging the column—that it was possible for Price Waterhouse to get the £200,000 without any problem, without travelling outside this country, because ever since the strike began those who have been working in Nottingham, south Derbyshire and Leicestershire have been paying their union contributions through the normal system to the NCB. The element of their contribution that would normally go as part of the imprest account to the NUM has not been sent, so the NCB has more than £200,000 of NUM money, national money, that it could have collected by a simple telephone call to two or three of the working areas, and that would have been the end of it.

If anybody has any doubts about what this business is all about, as many of my hon. Friends have said, it is about trying to cripple the NUM. The Government hope that if they can get away with that—which they will not—they can set upon the rest of the trade union movement, and trade unions will fall like a pack of dominoes. I shall tell the House what the sequestrators and the Government should be doing. It is time that they looked for the disappearing pound. It is 1·174 on today's exchanges against the dollar. It has dropped to the lowest point against all the currencies that are usually used for measuring the level of the pound.

Here we are, with a Government spending up to £5,000 million to try to crush the NUM, and the pound has reached its lowest ever level. In 1974, we defeated the Tory Government, who deliberately went to the country. The NUM did not force the election; the Tory Government decided on it. We defeated them then because the oil prices quadrupled. Would it not be ironic if, when we win this one, it is because the pound has fallen through the floor as oil prices have tumbled? As we watch the pound disappear, it will become clearer to the Government day by day that they will have to try to negotiate their way out of this mess. We have all heard about the Ridley plan. Everyone—even The Economist—knows what that was all about.

I will tell the House what I have learnt from this sequestration business, and I hope that the Labour Government will remember it in the future. If it is right to send Tory officials around the world as sequestrators looking for money that belongs to the working class, because it comes from working people's contributions, the Labour Government must be prepared to go after the Tory money that finishes up in foreign banks to avoid tax in Britain. It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good. There is always something that can be used. I warn the Solicitor-General that the time will come when we shall be following the money that the serried ranks of Tories put outside this country rather than pay their taxes in Britain to finance the Health Service and look after the old age pensioners.

Right from the start the Government, with their Fascist tendencies, set out to try to smash the unions, using the police force as the Prime Minister's private army and using the DHSS to starve little children. They have told the BBC that it will not get its licence fees unless it toes the Conservative line. "Speak for MacGregor or you won't get your increase", was the message to that element of the media which some people—I am not so stupid—believe to be impartial. Things are not very different with ITV. A film was commissioned from Ken Loach on the cultural side of the strike. There were people reciting poems, two or three folk singers and a small contribution from me in a speech about Wordsborough. But as soon as they saw the film the Government, with their army of people at ITV, banned it from Britain's screens because it told a story about the pits that they did not want people to hear.

The Government have been using all the echelons of the establishment to try to crush the miners. They have sent stipendiary magistrates to Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire because they were not satisfied with magistrates born and bred in the mining communities. They have used judges to get innumerable writs and injunctions through the courts, brought by working miners on the advice of people straight from the Prime Minister's press office. Few Opposition Members and very few miners will ever again doubt that the arm of the executive and the judiciary are closely combined to try to smash the unions.

A Lloyds bank circular dated 22 November, immediately after sequestration, reads as follows:

"Any Branch holding an account . . . or assets in the names of the following, should report the full details immediately by telephone to the Chief Inspector's Department".

The list that follows begins with John Burrows. He is not on the national executive. He is a Derbyshire miners' official; Kenneth Homer is a Yorkshire miners' official; Nell Elizabeth Hyett is a press officer and has never been elected to any position in the NUM; Henry Richardson is a Nottinghamshire miners' official; Samuel Thompson is a Yorkshire miners' official; and so it goes on.

Those are the lengths to which the Government will go to try to crush the NUM, but we have drawn up a list of ideas that unions can use to get round the restrictions imposed by the courts. We are telling all the trade union executives to ignore the threats from all those involved in the sequestration of NUM funds by continuing to make large donations to the miners' solidarity fund and by offering the NUM large long-term interest-free loans. I want that written in Hansard. They should levy all trade union members at a rate of between 10p and 50p a week. They should collectively hire and pay the wages of all the staff employed by the NUM in all the coalfield offices, for the duration of the strike.

If the other trade unions do that, they can get round the sequestration order and help to finance a continuation of the NUM's tremendous and honourable battle. The battle is not about wages; it is not about greed; it is not about materialism; it is about the right to work and to stop the march forward to the dole queue.

We are calling upon trade unions to dodge the sequestration order by hiring staff on a consultancy basis so that NUM members can give advice—"advice" in inverted commas—to union officials. We ask them to purchase The Miner so that we can continue to get the message across, and to use transport to take people to demonstrations

Those are some of the things that the trade unions can do. They can also step up industrial action. It may well be that, in the new pay round that is beginning, the Government will not be as lucky as they have been during the past 40 weeks. There will be unions that decide that it would not be a bad idea to take on the Government, because the Government could not handle two major disputes at the same time. The Government will not continue to be as lucky as they have been throughout the dispute in that respect.

We are determined to fight on. The Government may think that they have everybody taped. They may think that they have their Back Benchers taped, as indeed they had them taped earlier today. They may think that they can bully their way through to success after success. They may think that luck will be on their side all the time. They may think that they can use the judiciary and the police. But the Government's luck will not last for ever. There will be a reckoning day. As a result of the Government's bullying, and their attacks on the trade union movement, the Government will fall.

The point of this debate is to mobilise support throughout the country, and that is the point of the collections that we make in every Tory constituency in the land. We went to Finchley the other day, to Madam Dross's constituency, and collected money there. We are sending money to the miners from every part of the land. We shall continue to collect that money in order to finance the strike and to provide the umbilical cord between the NUM and the rest of the working class. We will not allow the Government to cripple the NUM and to smash the trade union movement.

2.43 am

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): I intervene briefly in this dispute to underline what my right hon. and hon. Friends have said in an important debate about a major industrial dispute. The debate arose on the Price Waterhouse situation. I have some evidence for saying that, after being appointed to do the job, Price Waterhouse realised what problems it was up against and what difficulties there would be in chasing the money. I do not believe that Price Waterhouse was influenced by the cost. I believe that the firm made it clear to the Government that the game was not worth the candle and that it was tiring of the situation. The Government realised that if Price Waterhouse withdrew as sequestrator, the matter would go back to the courts and another problem would be created. The Government therefore told Price Waterhouse that it must carry out the court's injunction and that they would indemnify the company for any costs that were incurred.

When he made his statement a few days ago, the Attorney-General talked about a cost of £50,000. The company's fees last year were in excess of £62 million. The Solicitor-General must explain why the Government should, quite unprecedentedly, intervene in a legal decision.

A Minister from the Department of Energy should have been present to hear the debate. My right hon. and hon. Friends have rightly linked the debate with the dispute. That is what it is all about and why Price Waterhouse has been involved. The dispute has now been going on for 10 months. It is a major dispute and, in my opinion, quite unnecessary. It has been created by the NCB's decision of 6 March to make proposals which, in the current financial year, would have meant the loss of 20,000 jobs and the closure of 20 pits. That is what is on the table. The NUM has no demands on the table. This is an argument about not wages or hours, but jobs. It is an argument about the preservation of jobs and of communities, but it does not stop with those 20,000 jobs and 20 pits.

Several reports have questioned the accountancy. We have had the reports of accountants, of the London Business School and of "Diverse Reports" on television recently, which made it clear that not 20,000 but 70,000 jobs and 70 pits are involved. That would represent a reduction of the industry from about 180,000 jobs to 100,000. If that reduction took place and the industry were concentrated solely where there are new pits and where there is new investment, the result would be death for the coalfields of south Wales, Lancashire, Kent, parts of Yorkshire, Scotland and the north-east. The new areas receive 81 per cent. of the investment. The remaining 19 per cent. goes to other areas.

In that regard, the question "What is an uneconomic pit?" is brought into the open. If we exclude pits that the NUM agrees should be excluded because they have been exhausted and pits out of which it is geologically impossible to get coal, what is an uneconomic pit? If the investment and the priority are given, the coal can be got and there is no such thing as an uneconomic pit.

Mr. Howarth: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Orme: I should like to develop my argument. I should have liked to exchange views with the hon. Gentleman, but I must finish in a couple of minutes.

I believe that there is a basis for a negotiated settlement of the dispute. Last Friday, the TUC put forward sensible and positive suggestions. It asked the Government to reconvene talks, which the NUM was prepared to attend, but the Government said no.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Orme: No, I will not.

In my opinion, the Government do not want a settlement of this dispute. They are deliberately allowing it to continue into next year. They want to see a victory over the NUM, but neither I nor my hon. Friends believe that they will achieve that victory. The sooner they realise that, the better for them and the country.

We are now going down a very dangerous road. That is why some of us have worked night and day to try to resolve this dispute on a basis which is honourable and acceptable to the NUM and to the other bodies involved. If the Government do not take heed of what I am saying, some of these problems will come home to roost in 1985.

The Government may think that they are winning, but they are not. Having gone into the coalfields, I know that the miners who are out will stay out. They will fight, and that fight will be increasingly understood by the people of the country. The Government should act now. If they do not, be it on their head if there is a continuation of the dispute well into 1985.

2.56 am

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): It is a matter of great regret to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General that on the clearest medical advice he is unable to be here tonight. On 11 December he returned for a day or two only from a period of absence due to sickness, and I regretted the slur cast upon him in the recent speech of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who suggested that by his absence the Attorney-General was dodging the column.

Mr. Skinner: The right hon. and learned Gentleman does not believe the miners, and the Attorney-General is not on supplementary benefit.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: However, in a spirit of realism, I did not find that suggestion any less fantastic or unrealistic than many others which graced the hon. Gentleman's speech.

I shall begin with a few comments about the writ and procedure of sequestration in the context of contempt of court—[Interruption.] I shall then describe briefly the special status—[Interruption.] I wonder whether Labour Members are really concerned about the matter we have been discussing. If so, I hope that they will listen, but I have some time left and I shall continue whatever the noise. I shall say a little about the special status and the function of the Attorney-General in matters that concern contempt of court. I shall briefly review the history of the action in which these proceedings against the NUM for contempt of court have culminated in the appointment of sequestrators by the High Court. I shall then recount in outline the matters which led to the Attorney-General's intervention, and describe the power under which it was taken. I shall also deal with the questions which have been asked, but given the shortness of time, if I omit some I shall endeavour to deal with them by correspondence.

From that I anticipate that it will be apparent for those with ears to hear that my right hon. and learned Friend acted with entire constitutional propriety, and that the attacks made upon him have been intemperate and unfounded.

Sequestration is a method by which a court enforces its judgments and orders by proceeding against the property of a person who is in contempt of court. It is a procedure of contempt of court. It can be employed by a court only where the person against whom it is employed is in contempt by disobedience of an order of the court. The purpose of sequestration is to enable the court to force a person in contempt of court to purge his contempt.

Mr. Ray Powell rose——

The Solicitor-General: I have sat for three hours listening to the debate. I have 12 minutes in which to answer. I propose to do so and to address myself to the real issues. I come now to the status and function of the Attorney-General in matters which concern contempt of court. Holders of his office have traditionally had a role in cases of contempt of court. It was described by Lord Diplock in a quite recent case in the House of Lords—the Attorney-General v. Times Newspapers in 1973. Lord Diplock commended the practice adopted since 1954 whereby the Attorney-General accepts the responsibility of receiving complaints of contempt of court from parties in litigation and of making an application in his official capacity for committal of the offender if he believes this course to be justified in the public interest. Lord Diplock used these words:

"He"—

meaning the Attorney-General—

"is the appropriate officer to represent the public interest in the administration of justice. In doing so he acts in constitutional theory on behalf of the Crown, as do Her Majesty's judges themselves, but he acts on behalf of the Crown as the fountain of justice and not in the exercise of its executive function".

I come next to the appointment of sequestrators. Sequestrators were appointed by Mr. Justice Nicholls in the case of Taylor. The reason was that the union had not paid a fine imposed upon it by the court. The court therefore, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, appointed the sequestrators to seize the assets of the union in order to oblige the union to pay its fines. The hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) asked why the Queen's Remembrancer procedure could not have been used. It was a method that could have been used but the court chose to use sequestrators. Either procedure was available. The court is not controlled by the Government. The court has a completely untrammelled and independent jurisdiction. Mr. Justice Nicholls fined the NUM £200,000 on 10 October for contempt of court. He ordered that if the fine was not paid within 14 days he would consider ordering sequestration. That is what Mr. Justice Nicholls did.

I turn to the circumstances that led to the giving of the indemnity. By 12 November only about £8,500 of NUM assets had been seized by the sequestrators. The hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) asked whether or not certain properties are owned by the NUM. To our knowledge there are two. There may be more; I know of no others. Those properties are owned or lived in by Mr. Daly and Lord Gormley. They were known at the time of the Attorney-General's statement to be the property of the NUM, but my right hon. and learned Friend's statement was perfectly accurate. He said that they set about taking possession of the assets and that they had been able to seize assets only to the value of about £8,500. The vast majority of the remaining assets of the union, amounting to many millions of pounds, had been transferred by the union to banks in various foreign countries.

In proceedings taken in Dublin the sequestrators obtained an interim injunction in their action to secure funds that had been lodged in Dublin. The Dublin High Court had given an interim injunction and the sequestrators had obtained the agreement of the Irish judge to accept a bond for £2,500 to be paid for out of the sequestrated assets. The sequestrators undertook to use their best endeavours to find such a bond, but they experienced difficulty in finding insurers who would provide a bond in the market. A bond was ultimately obtained, but only after the indemnity was offered by the Attorney-General.

At that point, the sequestrators approached the court that had appointed them, and I understand that they expressed some concern that they were being asked to provide a bond and might be exposed to personal liability. They learnt from the court that it had no funds of its own. Learning of that—I hope that the House has expressed a genuine interest in what happened, because it is on that basis that I am endeavouring to give an accurate account of what occurred—the Attorney-General spoke to the senior sequestrator, Mr. Larkin, and learnt that the sequestrators had set aside £50,000 of their own money to be spent before they would go back to the court. In the opinion of the Attorney-General, it was on the cards that if that money were spent and no money from which the sequestrators could be reimbursed had been seized, they would go back to the court to seek a discharge.

It was as a result of that discussion about the difficulties facing the sequestrators that the Attorney-General decided that it would be in the public interest to offer the indemnity to cover the sequestrators' reasonable and proper costs.

I have been asked about consultation, and the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Mr. Welsh) asked whether, as he put it, the Prime Minister had any part. The Attorney-General was obliged to consult Ministers to discover whether the contingent liabliliy might be imposed on the Treasury. Following that discussion and consultation, he offered the indemnity, in the circumstances that he has already described to the House.

I have been asked by what authority the Crown is entitled to give that indemnity. The answer is that it was given under the common law powers of the Crown, which has the same freedom as any individual in the realm to give an indemnity unless precluded by statute. There is no such statute——

Mr. Welsh: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. All I asked was whether the Prime Minister was involved. The Solicitor-General will not answer that question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Paul Dean): That is a matter for the Solicitor-General.

The Solicitor-General: I have been asked about the Crown——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: And the bond.

The Solicitor-General: I have already said that a bond was ultimately obtained for £2,500, which is what was sought by the Irish court. However, it was obtained only after the indemnity had been put forward.

I said that the Crown's power derives from the common law and there is no statute in this case precluding the issuing of an indemnity by the Crown. It is entitled to take that action. Before any money can be paid under the indemnity, the Crown must get statutory authority, which is why a Consolidation Fund Act would be required if the money had to be paid.

On behalf of the Attorney-General, I want to make it clear what the argument is. My right hon. and learned Friend has been subjected tonight, in his absence, to attacks that reflect on his honour. [Interruption.] I wish to to have an opportunity to reply to them — [Interruption.] I shall reply to them, whatever the noise. Whatever issues this matter gives rise to, they will not be illuminated by my being shouted at by Opposition Members.

Mr. Rogers: They are certainly not being illuminated by the Solicitor-General.

The Solicitor-General: Any Law Officer has to exercise his special jurisdiction as a guardian of the public interest and, indeed, his judicial jurisdiction in such a way as to exclude any consideration of party partisanship. That is fundamental to our arrangements. No Law Officer needs to have that pointed out. Any Law Officer knows that his decisions may be attacked as being improperly taken. I do not credit the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) with the common courtesy of having given my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General notice of what he was going to say.

Mr. Sedgemore: I expected him to be here for the debate.

The Solicitor-General: I do not credit the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch with having given him notice as the conventions——

Mr. Sedgemore: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the Solicitor-General to attack an hon. Member for not having given notice, when in the normal course of events the Attorney-General could be expected to reply to the debate? Cannot we have a modicum of common sense from the Solicitor-General?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. I remind hon. Members that the debate has less than one minute to go.

The Solicitor-General: The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch knows that he should have given notice, even if the Attorney-General was here. I say only that his allegations against my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General inspire in me a contempt very different in character from that with which we have been dealing.

Never before, to my knowledge, has there been a precedent for this—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"]—but never has there been a precedent when a fine imposed by a court has been defeated, defied and frustrated by moving the assets overseas. This was an unprecedented strategy and it demanded an unprecedented intervention in the exercise of an undoubted jurisdiction by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General. The attacks on the propriety of his actions and of the courts I reject utterly; and I reject them with profound scorn.

Mr. Nellist: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I take the hon. Gentleman's point of order, I must remind him that we are now in private Member's time. Any time now taken up will come off the time allotted to another hon. Member who has been fortunate in the ballot.

Mr. Nellist: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You have presided over much of a very serious and important debate on the funds of a national trade union and on the effects for its members. During that debate, and particularly during the concluding speech of the Solicitor-General, two Tory Members were in the Chamber: one was in a penguin suit and he passed out during the debate. That does not show any respect to the Chair, or to the seriousness of the debate. That hon. Gentleman was the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh).

Water Charges

3.12 am

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): I am pleased to have this chance to raise the question of how we charge for the supply of water. I appreciate that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment is in the Chamber, and I hope that he will be replying to the debate. He has a keen interest in the water industry and, of course, in the environment. I look forward with special pleasure to his contribution.

I shall concentrate on water authority charges that are levied on the domestic consumer in England. I want to dwell on how those charges are levied rather than on the absolute level. I believe that there is a widely-held feeling of injustice, and that that has become much more apparent since the separation of water rates from the general municipal rate—a process that began in 1974. I and many other hon. Members are well aware of the fact that our constituents are basically discontented about the method of assessing water charges by using the rateable value of the consumer's property. Many consumers believe that that method is inaccurate and discriminatory.

We understand that water charges are likely to rise in the next financial year by somewhere between 8 and 13 per cent. In my area, the Anglian water authority warns of a rise of about 13 per cent. Those increases will only accentuate the inequities of the present method of charging.

I do not want to concentrate in this debate on the reasons for the increase in water rates, except in passing to refer my hon. Friend the Minister to the report of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, on which I serve, which reported on 3 December. I draw my hon. Friend's attention to paragraphs 51 and 52 and simply read out the relevant sentences. In paragraph 51 the Committee says:

"We consider that it is unnecessarily disruptive to increase industry's rate of return over such a short period."

The Committee is referring to the fact that the targets for the water industry are to be increased from approximately 1 per cent. rate of return on the assets valued at replacement cost to something like 1·9 per cent. over a four-year period.

In paragraph 52 the Committee concluded:

"the time has come for a re-appraisal of the relative rates of return for all nationalised industries."

Those two recommendations are apposite to the water industry. I hope that we can return at some other suitable time to debate the way in which the water industry finances itself and the level of charges. But that is not my concern in this debate. My concern is how we charge for water, not what we charge.

The Water Act 1973 required the industry by April 1981 to ensure that its charging policy should be so organised and arranged that there should be no undue preference towards and no discrimination against any class of persons. That laudable aim has never been fulfilled.

By 1980 the National Water Council, which has now disappeared, in considering the basis of charging for water, baulked at the introduction of metering. It said:

"Neither the economic benefits nor the benefit to consumers justify a commitment to universal metering at present."

How it could have reached that firm conclusion without evidence and extensive trials I do not know, but that was the conclusion then.

By the time we came to the 1983 general election it had become clear that there would be no wholesale reform of the rating system. Therefore, the pressure on the water industry to come up with an alternative method of charging had disappeared.

Since 1981 the Government have supported the earlier recommendation of the National Water Council, that the best way to proceed was optional, not universal, metering. Optional metering is unjust because the choice of installing meters is only really available to the comparatively rich, and certainly the careful and diligent. The present policy of optional metering does not answer the basic charge of inequity in the system.

I welcome the decision recently announced by the Government to establish a steering group, headed by the chairman of the Thames water authority, which is to report early in 1985 on the possible extension of domestic universal metering. Attitudes may be ready for change, and I welcome that.

It may be helpful to comment briefly on the present tariff and to note that the water industry has introduced standing charges and increased those standing charges as part of the total water bill in recent years. Essentially, the argument is that by introducing standing charges—fixed amounts—which the customer has to pay in addition to an assessment on the rateable value of his house, the inequity is to some extent modified. That may be true, but it is not a satisfactory answer to the basic charge of the inequity of the present system.

One might believe that people, being encouraged by the water authorities and the Government to opt to install meters, would do so with great alacrity and enthusiasm. That is not the case. Figures show that less than 1 per cent. of domestic households are metered.

Why is there such a lack of enthusiasm? There are two reasons. The first is the lack of promotion by the water authorities. The second, and probably more important, reason is the relatively high cost of installing a meter. At present, the installation and associated costs must be paid by the consumer up front, and those charges can be significant.

The case for universal metering for domestic consumers rests on three arguments. The first is equity. To charge by the rateable value method is grossly unfair, as I shall illustrate. Two families may live in similar houses next door to each other. A retired couple may live in one and a large family in the other. The large family may own two motor cars, if both husband and wife are working, and there may be a line of nappies out each day. I do not make a judgment on the relative social importance of both families, but their water charges are likely to be the same, although it is clear which family consumes most water. The method of charging is, therefore, unfair.

Secondly, universal metering would provide a better control of leakage. Experts in the industry estimate that water authorities lose about 25 per cent. of the total water supply before it is consumed in the household. The Government fully accept that figure. Leakage often goes beyond the curtilage of the household and the tap. That is a large percentage. With universal domestic metering, the chances of identifying and controlling leakage would be enhanced, but it would take time. Until we have electronic remote reading, it is unlikely that the householder will be able to detect leakage promptly and that the water authority will be able to put the pipes in good working order as quickly as it would otherwise do.

Thirdly, universal metering would have the value of introducing the price mechanism. The water industy should be regarded in the same way as the electricity and gas industries. The price mechanism should be available to match supply and demand. If we had universal metering, some of the investment decisions made in past years, including the Kielder project in Northumberland, might not have been made. The water authorities would have had better economic information against which to measure likely future demand.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) says that the Kielder system is good. If he studies the use of the reservoir in recent years, he will agree, as my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing said, either that over-provision was made for Kielder or that the reservoir was built too early. I make no specific comment. I merely point out that, with the availability of price mechanism in the water industry, investment decisions could be more carefully taken.

The Government said that this year about £230 million is to be spent on reservoir construction. How is that large sum to be spent without the necessary information that other utilities have about the interplay between supply and demand provided by price mechanism? As financial pressures on the consumer mount, with higher water rates next year and perhaps in future years, the only equitable tariff structure would be one using universal meter.

I shall briefly mention the three principal arguments used against universal metering. The first is that it is regressive. However, social inequalities should be corrected by the welfare state, not by cross-subsidisation by the utility.

The second argument relates to public health. It is said that, with universal metering, some consumers would make false economies — reduce their consumption of water excessively and so endanger their health. There may be something in that argument. If we have a programme of universal metering, it must be introduced gradually and with a careful review of its public health impact.

The final argument against universal metering is that it is inordinately expensive. The present costs of optional metering are not directly relevant to an assessment of whether the nation should embrace universal metering and whether the Government should encourage it, largely because the economies of scale in a programme of universal metering would be such that present estimates of the cost of installing a meter to the consumer who has an option would not be relevant. The announcement of a universal metering programme would so stimulate the research into and development of new meters and methods of installation that costs would be reduced in that direction. The installation of meters could be privatised with benefit, as was the case with conversions to North sea gas. Private contractors could be charged with the responsibility for introducing meters on an area-by-area basis, and consumers could be asked to pay the cost, through the water authorities, during a 10 or 20-year period, rather than to pay the cost up-front, as is the case at present.

The reading of meters is expensive because it is carried out by inspectors on a meter-by-meter basis. If we have universal metering, there should be joint reading of gas, electricity and water meters, and eventually the introduction of electronic remote meter reading, which would revolutionise the way in which the customer and the utilities could mutually control the supply of water, gas and electricity.

To sum up the economic case, I believe that when the National Water Council, in 1980, estimated that a saving of about 20 per cent. in domestic usage would be needed to justify universal metering, it was being too pessimistic. It said that the cost to the nation, and the cost to be borne by the consumer, could be justified only if consumption were reduced by 20 per cent. I believe that, because of the economies of scale argument that I have deployed and because of new techniques and meter designs, that figure is far too high. I would put it closer to 10 per cent. All the experience in Britain and other countries is that universal metering causes a reduction of at least 10 per cent. in consumption. Hence, the costs of metering could be paid easily.

I encourage the Government to consider a rolling programme of compulsory universal metering, to be paid for by the consumer over a long period, with the installation of new meters being performed by private plumbing contractors under the supervision and control of the water authorities. Initially the meters should be read jointly with the other utilities, but, in the long run, we should encourage the introduction of electronic remote meter reading, as that would enable both the consumer and the utility to control better the supply of this valuable and scarce resource. The time is now ripe for a new approach.

3.30 am

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I welcome the opportunity to contribute to this debate. I apologise to the House and to my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) for the fact that I missed the first few moments of his speech.

Water charges concern us all. I have one particular problem, to which I should like to draw the attention of the House. My hon. Friend touched briefly on reservoir building programmes and how they can affect water charges, and as I come from the west country, that theme strikes a particular chord with me. The House will be aware of the problems that there have been in that area. I shall not detain the House by cataloguing the various miseries that we in the west have undergone. To draw the strands together, I remind the House that my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction was in the west country this summer, standing in the middle of a reservoir, which was completely devoid of water, and which looked like a lunar landscape. The irony was that as he stood there, he had an umbrella over his head because it was raining.

The privations that we have undergone in terms of water shortages probably exceed, or at least equal, anything that any other part of the country has undergone. However, the end to these problems is in sight, because we are now to have our third strategic reservoir. When the Roadford reservoir is finally built, it will be approximately 15 years after the South-West water authority first asked that it should be provided. It will be 25 years after the predecessor authority identified the need for that reservoir. Although the end is in sight, it has not yet come, and when it does, it will not be a moment too soon.

The subject of this reservoir is directly referrable to water charges, through an unusual way. One of the consequences that loss of regional status will have for the south-west of England will be on the way that the reservoir is funded. In turn, that will have an effect on water charges. Already, the South-West water authority is contemplating increasing water charges by at least twice the rate of inflation, and possibly by three times the rate of inflation. Therefore, anything that increases that process has a bearing on the water charges in the west country.

I am sure that I would be ruled out of order at once if I tried to twist the debate round, and made it a debate about the loss of regional aid in the west country, so I shall not do that. However, the direct effects that that has on Roadford are that whereas the South-West water authority could have expected at least £17 million in grant towards the project, it will now receive about £8 million, which is a loss £9 million. It has been receiving grants of £3 million a year for various projects, and that will go as well. There is some doubt about whether the authority will still be able to go to the European Investment Bank, from which it has already borrowed £35 million on rather advantageous terms and with which it is negotiating to obtain more.

One way in which that problem could be redressed would be if the water authority's capital programme were increased. I am aware, and I am grateful for it, that there has been a relaxation already, and that the Minister has said that the water authority can increase its capital programme by about £2 million. Even £2 million a year over the next three years will be more than accounted for by what is necessary to be able to implement the Control of Pollution Act 1974, an Act that was passed in times that were less frugal than ours. Although that makes some contribution, it does not begin to reduce the problems about Roadford that face us.

The people of the west country are in a unique position when considering the problems they have faced because of water shortages. Water is a regional resource, funded on a regional basis. That is the policy, and so be it. Many of the problems of the west country stem from the massive influx of tourism and the demand for water resources generally. It is at least arguable that we must examine the problem faced by the South-West water authority. We must do so, if not on a national basis, then on something approaching a national basis. I should like to believe that it may be possible to do something on a national basis to help the south-west to alleviate its problems with the Roadford reservoir.

In asking for an increase in the capital programme or for some other gesture by central Government to provide an exceptional course of action, I am saying that the west country is faced with an exceptional problem. People will be unhappy if they see, this late in the day, that the withdrawal of regional aid will mean that the long-awaited reservoir may impose, even now, an even greater burden in terms of water charges.

Obviously, regional aid and the effect on the various regions if it were withdrawn has been carefully considered by Government. I wonder whether anyone realised, at the time the measure was applied to the west country, its effect on the building of our third reservoir. Perhaps all too often people expect Government to be able to anticipate everything. I suspect that in this case the effect was not realised. An exceptional problem will probably now call for an exceptional remedy.

3.36 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): I am grateful to my hon. Friends the Members for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) and for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) for raising an important subject in a national and a parochial sense. The remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge will be noted. He comes from a region of the United Kingdom which has been perhaps most adversely affected by the lack of water supplies for a long time. I believe that my hon. Friend knows that I am a part-time resident of the south-west and am well aware of the great difficulties suffered by people in the region. I pay tribute to the water authority, especially to its chairman, Mr. Len Hill. I am also well aware of the privations suffered by the people. We understand fully what those people have had to put up with. I commend them for their tremendous efforts in overcoming the difficulties in the summer months. I hope that, by the end of this decade, the provision of additional facilities will guarantee that tourists who flood into that region will no longer cause the imbalance that occurred during the past two or three decades.

The point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering about the price mechanism and people's attitude when there is a widely held feeling of injustice is absolutely right. The problem faced by the centre and by the water authorities in presenting their case is to explain how charges are levied and how they have built up so swiftly during the past 10 years.

I do not want to be drawn into the problems of the Kielder dam. That case was based mainly on industrial demand growth forecasts. Such demand is already metered. Those of us who are concerned about overprovision in some regions must bear in mind the fact that reservoirs have a great deal to offer other than the major provision of water. They can provide a great diversification of interests for many people. That will be one of the attractive features that will assist the south-west of England. I can understand the anxieties of conservationists, but I believe that they must look wider to ascertain what greater diversification can mean.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): My wife and I visited the area in the summer, and we were most impressed by what the people had done there.

Mr. Macfarlane: Those of us who have visited the area are well aware of what the hon. Gentleman has just said. There is a greater range of diversification.

I greatly welcome the opportunity to respond to the most interesting speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering. He opened this debate by raising the question of metered charging for water. That is an important question and it is very timely for hon. Members to be giving it their attention. As my hon. Friend said, my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction has announced a new study of metering, under the leadership of Roy Watts, the chairman of Thames water. A first report is expected early next year. My Department will treat that with great urgency.

My hon. Friend referred to the disappointing outcome of previous studies under the auspicies of the former National Water Council. I share something of his sense of disappointment, but I think that it is important not to underestimate the significance of the fact that the option of a meter, and hence of a volume-related charge, is now available to every consumer who cares to take advantage of it. The main reason for not going further up to now has been the dauntingly high cost of universal metering, which he mentioned. The meters are not expensive — perhaps £10 to £15 — but installation can cost significantly more, and those figures, when applied to some 18 million households, lead one to very large sums of money. Private contractors normally install meters and that is something of which we take note. Whoever picks up the bill, it is obviously right to ensure that outlays of that order are well justified.

However, there have been developments which could favour greater use of metering in the future — for example, better technology, with the possibility of remote reading; the opportunity to take a new look at the savings that might result, whether from reduced leakage or postponement of major investments; and the authorities' positive interest in achieving a more businesslike relationship with their customers. I look forward to the results of the study now being undertaken by Roy Watts, and I assure hon. Members that I and my colleagues in the Department will keep the House informed of progress. We treat the review seriously and with urgency.

The subject of water charges is well chosen, for it is one which arouses much anxiety. It has aroused much press speculation which has been wrongly directed in recent months.

I am glad to have this opportunity to help my hon. Friends understand better what the Government have decided for water investment and water charges. I hope that what I say will prove a useful antidote to some of the more alarmist rumours that are being circulated. There have been some rather one-sided publicity campaigns.

One water authority has indeed gone so far as to offer hon. Members floating lectures on current cost accounting, with floating refreshments, on our very doorstep. That makes it all the more necessary to give Members a balanced account of the position.

Desirable objectives for the water industry include, first, higher investment to deal with problems and to raise standards, which have been lacking for several decades; secondly, greater efficiency to keep costs as low as possible; thirdly, a reasonable rate of return on the assets employed in the industry; fourthly, moderate charges increases; and, fifthly, a reduction in borrowing requirements, which count as public expenditure.

The problem is to arrive at a proper balance between those objectives. Higher investment has to be financed; and a low rate of return may help to keep charges down, but it can only add to the financing problem.

In recent years we have given priority to efficiency improvement. I am pleased to say that the response of the industry has been good. The performance aims agreed for 1983-84, which were to get real operating costs below their 1979-80 level, were bettered by about £10 million. New performance aims to bring further real cost reductions over the three years to 1986-87 have been agreed. Manpower in the water authorities is now 15 per cent. below 1979 levels. The new smaller boards which took office in October last year have brought a new dimension and a more businesslike approach to the management of the authorities. Hon. Members will appreciate the importance of good management when I remind them of the size of this industry: turnover about £2 billion; net assets about £30 billion; annual investment over £700 million. I commend what the authorities have recently achieved and look forward with confidence to further progress in the future.

It was a previous Government who, between 1974 and 1979, reduced water services investment by half. However, since 1982, water investment has been on a rising trend because the reduction in inflation — particularly the steadiness of contract prices for construction work—has enabled the water authorities to do more work within the cash limit. In 1983-84 water investment in England was planned to be £672 million, but the outturn was £711 million. This year the planned figure is £686 million, but again the indications are that a higher level will be achieved.

I am sure that hon. Members need no reminding of the importance of the investment programmes of the water authorities. I think that this goes to the heart of some of the problems in post-war Britain. Although water resources schemes amount to less than 5 per cent. of water investment, this includes projects like the Roadford reservoir in the south-west, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge referred, where the drought this summer stretched resources to the limit.

In water supply and distribution, we are fortunate in having 99 per cent. of the population receiving a piped supply of potable water. But the conditions of the mains in some areas gives cause for concern and there are quality problems — discoloration, rising nitrate concentrations and plumbo solvency, for example — which require attention and expenditure.

Worries about crumbling sewers have attracted much attention, but these problems can be overstated. I remind hon. Members that nearly half of our sewers are of post-world war 2 vintage and that the failure rate nationally is only about 16 events per 1,000 km per year, of which three quarters affect pipes of less than 9 in. diameter. Nevertheless, there are undoubted problems of deterioration in some regions, notably the north-west and Yorkshire. In other regions, new development has increased the load to be carried by the sewers beyond the design capacity so that foul flooding can occur when there is heavy rainfall.

The right approach to these problems is to press on with survey programmes in critical areas, which the authorities have been doing for some years. This year has seen the publication of the Water Research Centre's sewerage rehabilitation manual, which will help to put that work on a more systematic basis. Often the survey results are reassuring rather than the reverse, but, where problems are identified, the authorities provide in their investment plans for necessary remedial work.

Sewage treatment and disposal is the other main investment requirement. River quality improvement and upgrading of estuaries depend to a large extent on further improvements in sewage treatment works. Similarly, improvement in coastal waters may require long sea outfalls. Hon. Members will have noted the Government's recent response to the 10th report of the Royal Commission on environmental pollution, published as pollution paper No. 22. That says:

"The Government have told water authorities that . . . they intend that there should be a significant increase in their investment thus reversing the previous trend. An important purpose is to provide for a faster rate of improvement in the aquatic environment generally, including estuarine and coastal waters on a priority basis."

This is one part of a larger change in our policy. The Government have reviewed their stragegy for water services investment and their financing. Their decisions are reflected in the external financing cash limit for 1985-86, which was announced in the Autumn Statement. The Government now wish to see an increase in investment in the water industry so as to make more progress with the maintenance and renewal of sewers and water mains and to secure further improvements in the quality of rivers, estuaries and coastal waters. We want to see the rate of return on water authority assets at a higher rate than the present average of about 1 per cent., and a reduction in water authorities' borrowing. For the English authorities, the increase in investment in 1985-86 is expected to be about £80 million to £769 million—both figures excluding land drainage. Future years' figures are provisional but should be about £820 million in 1986-87 and £870 million in 1987-88.

Financial targets will be set to raise the average rate of return achieved by the water authorities from its present average of about 1 per cent. to about 1·4 per cent. next year, 1·7 per cent. in 1986-87 and 1·9 per cent. in 1987-88. That will be done by setting targets for individual authorities so as to secure a 5 per cent. return on new investment from 1 April 1985 while raising the rate of return on assets existing at that date to about 1·75 per cent. by 1987-88. The targets will differ from authority to authority because of differences in the rate of return presently being earned and because of differences in investment levels, but the policy will be applied to all authorities.

The effect of these policies will be to enable the English water authorities' new net borrowing, excluding Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food grants for land drainage, to be reduced from £237 million this year to £169 million in 1985-86, with further reductions in later years. The position will again vary from authority to authority, with some still borrowing in 1987-88 and others repaying debt, as Thames water is doing already. The higher financial targets will inevitably mean charges rising above the general rate of inflation. The figures that my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering quoted in his opening remarks, when he said that there were variations between 8 per cent. and 13 per cent., are about right.

It is the cash generated by higher charges that enables higher investment to be funded and borrowing to be reduced. It is difficult to forecast precisely the increases that will be necessary, because they depend on real operating costs in each authority, including savings due to efficency improvements and cost inflation, as well as on the financial targets set by the Government. But the precise effect will become evident only as authorities set their budgets in about February each year. Our present best estimate is that the average increase may be about 5 per cent. above general inflation in 1985-86 and rather less in 1986-87 and 1987-88. There will be differences between regions, with relatively low increases in areas where efficiency savings are large — for example, in the Thames water authority area — or where investment is not increasing, as in the Northumbrian area.

Before concluding, I should like to say that I do not see how rates of return of between 1 and 2 per cent., as has been said in some quarters, can constitute "monopoly exploitation" or "back-door taxation". They clearly do not. We have absolutely no intention of privatising the water industry. The Government have no plans to urge that upon the water authorities. There has been some press speculation about it in the past, but there is no intention to do so.

The average household bill this year is about £78, or 21p per day, so, if next year's increase is 10 per cent., it is an extra 2p a day. I do not believe that those are large sums when one considers the services provided—not just water supply, but sewerage, sewage treatment, facilities for water recreation and sea defence—and the enormous infrastructure of assets that has to be maintained, renovated or extended to keep those services at a high standard.

Several points were raised by both my hon. Friends. In the interest of time, I hope that they will allow me to write to them when I shall take up those points. These are serious and important issues. However, I believe that the targets that we have now set throughout the rest of the decade will ensure that there is a strategy for the water industry, and that can only be good for the consumer and the United Kingdom.

Miss Hilda Murrell (Murder)

3.51 am

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): There are several subjects that I care about, such as the financing of the BBC, teachers' pay, service and conditions, Scotland and Ethiopia. So, I shall be rapid and succinct on this subject.

I did not know the late Miss Hilda Murrell personally—though as a gardener, and sometime beekeeper, I am, of course, familiar with the beautiful rose to which she gave her name. On 24 March of this year, her body was found in a wood just outside Shrewsbury. She was in her 79th year, and had been dead for some time. On 5 December, 1984, the inquest was held in Shrewsbury. A verdict of unlawful killing was brought in, and the coroner thanked all those involved. End of the matter? Just another statistic among unsolved murders? Well, no, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The police are quoted as saying that the facts are still being held back, on the grounds that it is necessary to keep them out of the press, as the murderer has not been caught. The police version of some wandering "nutter"-type burglar breaking in, and then attacking the lady when she came home unexpectedly, does not tally in any way with what was obviously a sophisticated break-in, with a purpose that was not conventional burglary.

My interest in the case of the late Miss Murrell was aroused in mid-November when I was told, anonymously, that I ought to read carefully an article in the New Statesman, of 9 November, 1984, entitled the "Death of Miss Murrell", by Judith Cook. Knowing that Hugh Stephenson, editor of the New Statesman, would not have given the article such prominence without reason—I am a New Statesman subscriber — and knowing that anything under the by-line of Judith Cook is worth my attention, I did so. I do not doubt that those who brief the Minister have shown him Judith Cook's article.

Approaching one of my now numerous sources on the Belgrano, who has proved careful, accurate and serious, I learnt that Miss Murrell's nephew, Rob Green, mentioned in the article by name, had indeed occupied a key position in naval intelligence during the Falklands campaign. I was informed that Commander Green was in a position to know about the receipt and despatch of signals to and from HMS Conqueror, and intercepted signals from the Belgrano to the Argentine mainland and back, from both British and American sources.

However, at the outset I say candidly to the Minister that Rob Green has not approached me, that through an intermediary I have let him know that, if he wanted to talk to me, he would be welcome, and that to the best of my rather extensive knowledge, he has behaved absolutely properly as a naval officer loyal to the Navy in not talking about information gleaned when in the Navy.

The following questions flow from Judith Cook's article of 9 November and from other discussions that I have had.

Why did the police tell the press that Hilda Murrell's house had been ransacked when it later became clear that it had not been ransacked?

Whoever had been in the house had clearly been looking for something in a methodical manner. Some drawers and cupboards were open but not dissaranged.

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

In an odd way, it is like the Belgrano affair—small inconsistencies seem to be part of larger inconsistencies and small lies part of larger lies.

Miss Murrell's house had been carefully searched and her papers gone through, but in an orderly manner. Her telephone had been cut off in such a way that, although it was dead from inside the house, anyone calling would seem to hear it ringing out. The police agree that that is a sophisticated way of doing things — not exactly the actions of a common burglar looking for loose money and taking a chance. Moreover, not only had the telephone at Miss Murrell's home at Ravenscroft, Shrewsbury, been tampered with — the phone at her cottage over the border in Wales had been disconnected.

Later the police said that the 78-year-old lady had been sexually assaulted. Why did they say thay when it turned out on their own evidence to be untrue? What is the purpose of that kind of inaccuracy other than to sweep uncomfortable suspicions under the carpet?

The farmer who discovered Miss Murrell's car slewed on to a verge reported it to the police and I understand that the local policeman reported it to the Shrewsbury police. Two days later the self-same car was still there. The farmer again reported it to the policeman, who reported it to the Shrewsbury police.

What did the Shrewsbury police do about the second report? If they were short-staffed because too many were away dealing with miners' picket lines, the House ought to be told. I understand that, even on Friday 23 March, the Shrewsbury police failed to follow up the report. They then said that the wrong registration number had been fed into the Swansea computer. Is that true?

Does a police force which, I am told, has a good reputation for efficiency normally act like that or was it told on high authority to act in such an uncharacteristically incompetent and slapdash way? Why did the police behave out of character? Ministers should tell us. I am told by more than one of the people interviewed by the police that they instinctively felt that the police officers knew jolly well that their time was being wasted and that they were having to go through the motions of a large-scale investigation for cosmetic reasons.

On Saturday 24 March, having at last identified the car as Miss Murrell's, police began to search the field and the copse near the car with a gamekeeper's wife. It was this lady who found Miss Murrell's body, noting that the time put down for its discovery was correctly 10.30 am. Yet I understand that the police told Rob Green, Miss Murrell's nephew, that his aunt's body was found much later and that they then changed their story and said that it was found at 7 am. Did the police give those two stories and, if so, why? Members of Miss Murrell's family see a series of police errors and the contradictory information that the police had given them was not cleared up at the inquest on 5 December.

The West Mercia police say that they forced an entry into Miss Murrell's house at 6 am on Saturday 24 March. Yet several credible witnesses say that they saw men in police uniform at the house on Friday night. How could that be? Were two police forces involved? At what time were the West Mercia police joined, if at all, by the Suffolk police responsible for Sizewell security? More particularly, why was the special branch involved at that stage? Why was it necessary to force an entry into Miss Murrell's house or to claim to have done so when I am told that the back door was unlocked? The curtains had been drawn and the light left on since the Wednesday of Miss Murrell's death.

I am told that members of the public who have come forward with different bits of information have been made to feel excessively foolish. Equally, I am told that this is quite uncharacteristic of the West Mercia police, who are usually models of courtesy, welcoming information from the public. Why should the police act out of character? Is it because not one but two sets of police were involved, neither of which appeared to know what the other was doing?

I can easily understand the work of the local police under Chief Detective Superintendent David Cole, brought in from Worcester, whose manners appear to have been exemplary and whose kindness and good sense were a credit to the police of this country. However the local police have, I gather, now agreed that the special branch was involved, and I understand that my praise for the local police does not in all cases apply to the special branch.

Will the Minister explain what special branch was doing so early in the case of the murder of a 78-year-old ex-rose-grower, if it really was a simple burglary?

Why have the family not been given a copy of the post-mortem report? A man who was capable, two years before, of organising crucial aspects of the British battle fleet in the south Atlantic, and who earned a special citation from the Commander-in-Chief of the fleet, is capable of reading a post-mortem report.

Rob Green says:

"They had said that they would answer questions about it, but you can imagine our difficulties as, since we had no idea what was on it, we did not know what to ask."

When he identified the body, Commander Green saw a mark of a blow under Miss Murrell's eye. There also appear to have been stab wounds, but insufficient to kill her. Did she, as the police say, die of hypothermia? Or was she killed by a person or persons? What does the Minister now say?

Why was a second autopsy carried out, and her family refused this too? Why was the body returned in a zinc-lined coffin in August? I can understand the police advice not to look inside, by that time, but why had so much time passed? Naturally, the body was then cremated.

Why was the Gower autopsy not published? The coroner, Colonel Crawford Clarke, has said that a second autopsy had to be held because the body was deteriorating, and that there had to be a second autopsy in case an assailant was charged. However, a body can be kept on ice.

The late Helen Smith, flown back from sweltering Jeddah, was kept for much longer. Is it normal practice to keep a body, and suddenly demand an autopsy at short notice in case an unnamed assailant is charged?

When it came, I am told that the cremation was carried out in a heck of an indecent hurry. What is the explanation? Is it not the case that the proper forensic procedures seem to have been blocked? Why? And why were the family not told that they could have an independent autopsy? Suspicions can only be laid to rest by answers.

The owner of the land on which the body was found, Mr. Scott, has stated emphatically both to the police and to the family of Miss Murrell that he was walking in the copse on the Thursday afternoon after the murder. He had been carefully examining his property, as it was used as a game reserve. As a countryman, he said that he would have noticed the body of a rabbit, let alone a person. Did Mr. Scott lie? People who know him doubt it very much. He has no motive, and his neighbours say that he is not that kind of man. If he is correct, Miss Murrell's body must have been moved after her death. Why cannot the family and others have the accurate details of the autopsy, to let them know? I am told that a local poacher has now come forward to corroborate Mr. Scott's statement that there was no body in that copse on the Thursday afternoon.

There is also the evidence of my friend, Mr. Gerard Morgan Grenville, whom I have known for nearly 40 years. Mrs. Morgan Grenville tells me how Hilda Murrell rang them up in a great state at the end of February, and how she fetched her husband. Mr. Morgan Grenville, with whom I have had a good deal to do and who is a deeply serious man, says that her parting words on the telephone were:

"If they don't get me first, I want the world to know that one old woman has seen through their lies".

One is reminded of Scudder, the diarist in John Buchan's "The Thirty-Nine Steps'. Mr. Morgan Grenville had never heard Miss Murrell speak in that way before. Why should an old lady be prompted to say that? There has been speculation that her death was connected with a paper that she had written on the problems of nuclear waste and reactor choice, which she hoped would be read at the Sizewell B inquiry. Arthur Osman, writing in The Observer on 2 December, began his article:

"Silkwood parallels in English woman's death . . .

Was anti-nuclear power campaigner Hilda Murrell murdered because she was becoming too much of a nuisance to the industry?"

Since, more than 22 years ago, as a new Member of Parliament who was technologically minded and on the Public Accounts Committee, I was befriended by the late Sir Christopher Hinton, who later became Lord Hinton of Bankside OM—he was a great man and a great engineer and chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board —I have had dealings with many in the top echelons of the CEGB and and the Scottish generating boards. I cannot believe for one mini-second that Sir Walter Marshall, any of his colleagues, my friend Con Allday and others from the nuclear industry, would dream of authorising minions to search the house of a 78-year-old rose grower who had elegantly expressed, but unoriginal, views on reactor choice and nuclear waste disposal.

Besides, I have been to the great Peter Pears Benjamin Britten hall where the Sizewell inquiry is being held. I listened to evidence on day 178 and talked afterwards to Sir Frank Layfield. Those people will not fuss about Hilda Murrell and her evidence, for heaven's sake.

However, Commander Green says publicly:

"I am led to one solution only—that the break-in was to look for information, rather than valuables."

He said:

"I have a series of questions I want to ask about the police handling of the case, particularly their view of the proposition that the intruder—because he has no authority to kill her—had no alternative but to abduct her. Later that night he may have returned, put on the lights and drew curtains to make it look like an attempted burglary. He also left evidence to suggest a sex angle."

The inquest raised more real questions than it answered.

All of these inconsistencies point away from a random murder, and therefore away from the official explanation.

This background leads me to give credence to another version of events which has come my way as a receptacle of information about the circumstances surrounding the sinking of the Belgrano.

First, I must candidly tell the Minister that in my previous 22 years in the House, I should have gone privately to the Home Secretary, regardless of party. I should have gone to "Rab" Butler, Henry Brooke, Frank Soskice, the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins), my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), Reggie Maudling, Robert Carr, my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) or Willie Whitelaw. I have known them all and had dealings with them all. However, to some Ministers in the present Government, to whom I have been the subject of ridicule and deception, I am not prepared to go. I say in the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) that least of all am I prepared to go to the present Home Secretary, who makes the types of speech about the miners that bring disgrace to the great office that he holds. I am not simply prepared to go to the present Home Secretary.

The story that I am told is as follows. In the early spring, the Prime Minister and Ministers close to her were getting very nervy about incessant questioning on the Belgrano in general and about signals, intercepted signals, and GCHQ at Cheltenham, which would call into question their truthfulness to the House, in particular. This was pre-Ponting. There were a number of suspicions about people dating from 19 and 20 December 1983, when I tabled questions to the Prime Minister about GCHQ Cheltenham, which are recorded in the Order Paper and Hansard.

Because Commander Robert Green was known to be unhappy about certain aspects of the Falklands war and was known to have wanted to leave the Navy, he came under a cloud of suspicion, wrongly, to the best of my knowledge, but certainly under a cloud of suspicion. It was thought that he might have copies of documents and raw signals that incriminated the Prime Minister, some of the originals of which had been destroyed on instructions from a very high level by the intelligence services.

Just as those of us who have had certain documents have taken the precaution of keeping them in friends' or relatives' houses while we have them, so it was thought that some of Rob Green's supposed records might be in the home of the aunt to whom he was close.

I suppose—I say this in the presence of the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), who I hope will have the opportunity of contributing to the debate—that one cannot complain that the suspicion fell on Rob Green, as he was one of the officers at the very heart of the Falklands operation. He was one of the very few to have left the service, although I understand that he had decided to go before the Falklands crisis blew up.

I am also given to understand—and I am happy to accept it—that there was no premeditated intention of doing away with Miss Murrell—only a search of her house when she was out. Alas, on Wednesday 21 March she returned unexpectedly to change. The intruders either arrived while she was dressing or were disturbed by her. Being a lady of courage and spunk, often found in that generation of women, Miss Murrell fought them. They too had to fight. They injured her and panicked.

I am informed that the intruders were not after money or nuclear information but were checking the house to see if there were any Belgrano-related documents of Commander Green in the home of his aunt. Things went disastrously wrong. They had no intention of injuring, let alone killing, a 78-year-old ex-rose grower. Yet, being the lady she was and in her home, Hilda Murrell fought and was severely injured. She was then killed or left to die from hypothermia, and the cover-up had to begin, because I am informed that the searchers were men of the British intelligence.

If Ministers cannot solemnly deny my belief about the participation of intelligence, on whose ministerial authority, if any, did the search of Miss Murrell's home take place? Was there clearance, or was this the intelligence services "doing their own thing"? Did they do it on political orders, and if so, on whose orders? Some of us have had increasing misgivings about the role of the intelligence services in this country—again I say this in the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover —in connection with the miners' strike.

It is high time that there was a Select Committee of Privy Councillors to keep an eye on our intelligence services. Such a Select Committee would be a more appropriate forum than a Consolidated Fund debate, but until that happens, and given my opinion of present senior Ministers—un-British in their behaviour compared with Ministers of previous Governments — I have no alternative but to ask these questions under the cloak of parliamentary privilege, none of the situations for which the privileges of the House of Commons exist.

I ought to add that Commander Rob Green was, I am told, the person who physically sent the signal to Conqueror that sank the Belgrano. I understand from his friends that he was also responsible for passing signals from Endurance which had shown beyond any reasonable doubt that an invasion of the Falklands was likely to happen.

Rob Green considered the Falklands to be an unnecessary war, and the Belgrano sinking appalled him —albeit he judged it to be an unfortunate necessity—as it did some other senior officers of the senior service. He took early retirement after 20 years in the Navy and left. From this Prime Minister and her colleagues he would come under suspicion. It is from the head of our security services that Parliament should be demanding an explanation, because of one thing I am certain—that there are persons in Westminster and Whitehall who know a great deal more about the violent death of Miss Hilda Murrell than they have so far been prepared to divulge.

4.15 am

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): All hon. Members will have listened with a great deal of concern and a degree of admiration to the speech of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). He is well known in the House and performs a great service by introducing deeply and carefully researched questions of this kind. He brings them forward with a great deal of courage and conviction.

Commander Bob Green is a member of the Liberal association in my constituency. I have known him for some time. The details brought forward in the speech of the hon. Member for Linlithgow were totally unknown to me until last night he did me the courtesy of allowing me to read his speech. One does not necessarily have to agree with the conclusions that the hon. Member has reached to recognise fully the serious nature of the questions he has rightly put and which need to be answered.

First let me deal with some of the facts. I have not carried out detailed research into the facts put forward by the hon. Member. However, I have the highest respect for Commander Bob Green. I asked the hon. Member if I could ring Commander Green and read his speech to him. The hon. Member allowed me to do so. Therefore, I rang Commander Green and read to him the speech of the hon. Member. I have his authority to say that he confirms and corroborates all that the hon. Member has said. The details and facts are precisely as Commander Green sees them. Where the hon. Member has referred to Commander Green, Commander Green assures me that he agrees with the hon. Member's references.

It is also fair and proper to make the point that Commander Green has in no way collaborated with the hon. Member for Linlithgow in drawing up his speech. What the hon. Member has done is entirely on his own behalf. Commander Green has had no contact whatsoever with the hon. Member. Therefore, the comments that the hon. Member was kind enough to make about the part played by Commander Green are entirely substantiated. The facts that the hon. Member has given and the conclusions he has drawn accord precisely with those of Commander Green. In no way can it be said that the hon. Member for Linlithgow has taken the name of Commander Green in vain.

I turn from the facts of the matter to the conclusions that the hon. Member has reached. They are the hon. Member's own conclusions. However, I fully understand, as will those who tomorrow read this text with some interest, how the conclusions the hon. Member has drawn are capable of being supported by the questions that he has asked. In that sense, his conclusions and questions are far too serious to be dismissed lightly. I have observed on many occasions in the past, even when the hon. Member for Linlithgow has asked questions with which I do not agree, that from time to time the Government have used, as the hon. Member mentioned in his speech, a degree of ridicule in order to dismiss them. That would be wholly inappropriate on this occasion and I am certain that the Minister will not attempt to do so. These are very important questions of fact and detail. I very much hope that the Minister will answer them. If he is unable to answer all of these questions now, no doubt he will give answers in detail my means of letter.

In the absence of detailed answers to the detailed questions which the hon. Member for Linlithgow has put, I believe that there is only one way forward: a full inquiry in front of a High Court judge. I hope that other hon. Members will support that kind of inquiry. We do not call at this stage for such an inquiry. We merely say that if the Minister is unable or unwilling to answer questions of fact in detail, that is the only proper way forward.

I hope that the Minister will recognise that the conclusions drawn by the hon. Member for Linlithgow are deep and serious. Most of the evidence suggests that they are possibilities. I hope that the Minister will be able to dismiss them unequivocally. The hon. Member used the word "solemn". It is an unhappy fact that a number of the Government's actions, including those following the Belgrano incident, have done much to raise suspicions among those of us who would like to support the Government in the difficult decisions that they had to take in time of war. The hon. Gentleman and I may part company over the Belgrano issue, because Governments often have to take extremely difficult decisions in time of war and they are entitled to the support of the democratic process, expressed through the House — even if the decisions prove in the cold light of day to have been wrong. The one case in which the Government would not be entitled to the support of the House and the country would be if they had acted with the specific intention of saving or assisting their political operations afterwards. We would almost have to get inside the minds of Ministers to discover whether that had happened.

However, the Government's campaign of misinformation on occasions and inadequate answers to questions has kept the Belgrano issue alive and caused suspicion and concern among those of us who would like to be able to support them. We would not like to have such suspicions of any British Government. I hope that the Minister will deal unequivocally with the conclusions drawn by the hon. Member for Linlithgow, so that the matter is not allowed to rumble on. The Minister has a duty to do that.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow touched on the broader issue of the intelligence services. My party and I have always pressed the need for a Select Committee of Privy Councillors to deal with intelligence matters. The intelligence services are not sufficiently accountable to the House. The mechanism for such accountability needs to be chosen carefully. For reasons that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, my party has always believed that there should be a Select Committee of Privy Councillors. It would have been much better if the hon. Member for Linlithgow had been able to take his case to such a Committee in private, rather than being forced to raise the matter on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Dalyell: With the first so-called Ponting information, I went to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. I would have preferred to go to a Select Committee of Privy Councillors or a Select Committee dealing specifically with intelligence. It has never been any part of my case to criticise service men or to denigrate the services. No criticism of anyone involved in the task force has ever escaped my lips; the only exception is Lord Lewin, but I criticised him in his capacity as a member of the War Cabinet and not as an admiral.

Mr. Ashdown: I am grateful to the hon. Member for making that clear, because he is significantly misunderstood on that matter. I support him. Many former service colleagues of mine who were involved in the incident at various levels believe that the hon. Gentleman is doing a considerable service.

It would have been more appropriate if the hon. Gentleman's case had been dealt with by a Select Committee of Privy Councillors instead of on the Floor of the House. Such a Select Committee would be the best mechanism for ensuring the accountability of the intelligence services to the democratic process.

I come to another central issue. It is important and necessary to have that accountability because, if the intelligence services are to operate at all effectively or properly, they must operate under appropriate political control. Indeed, I would go further and say that the intelligence services can do their job effectively only if they are closely connected with the whole political system, are very much under political control and are able to influence the political system in an appropriate and proper fashion.

At the very heart of this issue lies the system that we now refer to as "clearance". The intelligence services have to receive clearances at various appropriate levels, including at the very highest level—that of the Prime Minister—before taking any action. I have no doubt that action such as that mentioned by the hon. Member for Linlithgow would, under normal circumstances, have had to be approved at the very highest level.

If what the hon. Member says is true, it is inconceivable that it could have occurred in normal circumstances other than with agreement at the very highest level. But if that did not happen, there must have been a significant breakdown in the way that our intelligence services are controlled. One must reach one or other of those conclusions if the hon. Gentleman's thesis is supportable. Either a politician at a very high level was involved in taking the decision to allow such action to go ahead, or there must have been a very serious breakdown in the democratic and political accountability and control of our intelligence services.

Those are the only two conclusions. Naturally, we shall have to wait and see whether the hon. Gentleman's overall theory is supportable, but, if it is, those conclusions inevitably follow. There are many people, including me, who, because of friends and contacts, have reason to worry that the traditional and appropriate control of this country's intelligence services has become much looser than appropriate and much less regulated than is necessary within a democracy.

Whatever the case with regard to the intelligence services and the conclusions drawn by the hon. Member for Linlithgow, the facts that he has presented are very serious and important. I hope that the Minister will now be able to answer our very serious concerns, and that he will make an unequivocal statement about the overall conclusion that has been reached.

Finally, I thank the hon. Member for Linlithgow for raising this important subject and for giving us the opportunity to hold this extremely serious debate.

4.27 am

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): The House owes my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) a debt not only for raising this issue, but for the way in which he has pursued the Belgrano affair by — as the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) implied — directing himself not at the service men involved but at the operation that controlled the naval movements at the time.

My hon. Friend has given us the sort of story that would tax the ingenuity of a novelist. However, it is precisely at such times that we should remember that truth can be stranger than fiction. I hope that the Minister will not attempt to dismiss it as some form of creative literature or to put it down to a colourful imagination. My hon. Friend has put very real questions to the Minister and they deserve answers.

Like my hon. Friend, I realise that those questions cannot be answered easily or quickly. No one, perhaps, expects the Minister to give full and detailed answers now. But we, and others outside the House, expect him to put before the country in due course a satisfactory explanation of events, or to set up an inquiry to ensure that events are looked into in more depth. We may then be reassured that the implications developed by the hon. Member for Yeovil have no foundation. Obviously, we should prefer a more conventional explanation, but we cannot assume that there is one until those questions have been answered.

It is important to remember that my hon. Friend has pursued this matter and the related matter of the Belgrano in a way that has not only respected the integrity of those involved in the military operation, but revealed the extraordinary accuracy of his research. He has, literally on a one-man operation, been able to demonstrate that the Government's arguments have not held together over a period of time. They have had to change their story from time to time, and it must be to my hon. Friend's credit that his research has brought that to light.

Not only is my hon. Friend's research accurate, but so are the sources of his information. I know those to be extremely good sources of information. The Minister and many others must be deeply disturbed by the quality of the information that is always available to my hon. Friend. He uses that information to deploy his case well.

I hope that if the Minister cannot give us answers today, he will be able to reassure the House that he will ensure that those answers are provided at some stage and in some context.

There is the wider issue of the control of the security forces. It has long been the view of the Labour party, and certainly of myself, that the security forces should be under much greater political control, answerable to the House in a more direct and effective manner than they have been in the past. Anyone who has been connected with Northern Ireland will know the importance of that. The security forces have grown in number and sophistication in recent years, and to rely on the control of either the Home Secretary or the Prime Minister, answerable to the House, must be grossly inadequate in any democracy.

A suggestion has been put forward for a Committee of Privy Councillors. I always want to question whether a committee need necessarily be composed of Privy Councillors. There are other ways of dealing with the matter. We shall never give hon. Members sufficient weight and authority unless we are prepared to recognise that each can act responsibly and properly on such a Committee.

I am prepared to move on the nature and type of democratic control of the security forces. We cannot go on much longer with the present system of control. It brings the country into disrepute and leaves unanswered questions such as those asked by my hon. Friend. It must be fundamentally dangerous for any democracy to be left with the feeling that adequate answers are not forthcoming. If the public feel that there are cover-ups, that people are trying to avoid difficult questions and that the structure of the democracy is not good enough to bring matters out, the credibility of that democracy will be undermined. Sooner or later that must change. My hon. Friend, by the way in which he has brought the matter out, has done a service not only to the House but to the nation as well.

4.33 am

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): The House has listened, as I suspect it always does listen, to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) with great interest. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) was kind enough to say that he had no information about what the hon. Gentleman would bring before the House until a few hours before the debate commenced. The hon. Gentleman will be of the clear opinion that I had no information about what was in the hon. Gentleman's request to raise this issue on the Consolidated Fund until the moment of his utterances.

Therefore, the hon. Gentleman, whom I am pleased to say I have known for some 30 years, will recognise that any response that I give him will lack not only the measure of courtesy that I would wish to extend to him in being able to provide him with answers to the questions that he has posed, but also, inevitably, the factual background against which any ministerial answer should be given.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I cannot answer the many questions that he raised. The inferences he drew went substantially further than the topic set down for debate. We are here to discuss the police investigation into a death that occurred in tragic circumstances. Both the hon. Members for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) and for Yeovil sought, reasonably, to argue the case for a different form of control over the security services in relation to the incident at the centre of the debate.

I make my second point as an observation, the reason for which may become more evident. We are considering a fairly substantial police investigation into the alleged murder of an old lady. Thousands of people have been involved, and the inquiry is continuing. Regrettably, it has not been concluded. If a police inquiry is continuing and its scale has reached these proportions, it may be considered odd, if there were a British security element involved in the investigation, or occasioning the crime for which the investigation has been set up, that it should continue without those involved being able to ensure that the police and the security services are sharing common knowledge. That is merely an observation. It requires a great deal of weight to be attached to it. Considering the time that I have had to listen to the important revelations of the hon. Member for Linlithgow, I am bound to make that observation.

My task is to deal with the police investigation. I appreciate the words the hon. Gentleman uttered regarding the reputation of the West Mercia force, and his comments, many of which were complimentary, in describing the case. I trust that no police force would wish to tackle such a tragic incident without the fullest degree of care, skill and energy. If there is any doubt about that, I shall express great anxiety, but I believe that the force has tackled it in that way.

The House will wish me to put on record the details of the incident as conveyed to me by the chief constable of West Mercia because that is where the problem currently lies. Had we been able to book an individual or individuals, it may have provided many of the answers to the hon. Gentleman's questions. I say "may" because his questions were numerous and far-reaching. A concluded investigation which results in charges being preferred and a trial being held may be the natural order of events for an investigation into a death associated with violence, and the correct way in which the factual background of the incident and the motive should be deployed for public view. Any other way would be less than conclusive.

The hon. Gentleman expressed an interest previously in a written question about the case of Miss Murrell. It is right that I should respond on the basis of information that we have obtained from the chief constable. In doing so, I must draw attention—as I believe I have—to the fact that the story is incomplete. There are some facts which it would be inappropriate for me to disclose. If I did no, it might hinder the police inquiries that are continuing and might prejudice their questioning of any suspect who might be apprehended.

Miss Murrell, who was 79-years-old at the time of her death, according to our information, lived alone in her house——

Mr. Ashdown: There seems to be some confusion about Miss Murrell's age. Her nephew, Commander Green, assures me that she was 78 at the time of her death. It is a small point, but one which I should mention to the Minister.

Mr. Shaw: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who has impeccable authority for that, for correcting me. Let the record state that she was 78. She lived alone in her house at Sutton road, Shrewsbury, and she also had a cottage in Wales. She was known to be a member of several clubs and associations connected with conservation and the environment, and she had a substantial reputation as a rose grower. She was also involved, but certainly not solely concerned with, groups connected with nuclear disarmament. The hon. Member for Linlithgow referred to her interest in nuclear waste and to the paper that she had prepared. Some press reports after the inquest into her death noted primarily her interest in rose growing as the most important feature in her life.

Miss Murrell's body was found in a coppice at 10.25 am on Saturday 24 March 1984 by a police constable, accompanied by the wife of the local gamekeeper. In subsequent police circulations about the offence, the time of 10.40 am was used, which was the time at which other officers summoned to the scene arrived. The police surgeon attended the site and certified death at midday. The senior investigating officer, a detective chief superintendent, arrived at 1.30 pm, followed shortly afterwards by a Home Office pathologist, who further examined Miss Murrell's body, which was then taken to the Royal Shrewsbury hospital.

The likely sequence of events—the hon. Gentleman will understand that I must say the "likely" sequence—preceding the discovery of Miss Murrell's body has been pieced together by the police on the basis of information from many witnesses who came forward to assist them. On the morning of Wednesday 21 March 1984, Miss Murrell went to local shops in Shrewsbury, about a mile from her home. She travelled there in her white Renault car, and was seen shopping there between 11 am and midday. It is also known that she visited her local bank, where she cashed a cheque. Her return home at approximately midday was confirmed by two witnesses, one of whom had a brief conversation with her.

Subsequent police examination of Miss Murrell's home found no evidence of forcible entry, but that access could have been gained by an intruder through an insecure door. On her return from the shops, Miss Murrell had apparently had time to change from her outdoor clothing and to put away some of her shopping. There is then evidence that, in an upstairs room, a struggle took place with the offender, who had apparently previously made a systematic search of the premises, drawn the front downstairs curtains and left on the electric light.

Miss Murrell was then taken by the intruder in her car and driven approximately six miles to the scene of her death. Numerous witnesses have been able to provide details of the route of the journey, during which Miss Murrell sat in the passenger seat. The journey ended with the car being parked on the side of the road near the coppice, in the position in which it was subsequently found when the police were called to it. It seemed that the car had collided with both sides of the banked verges of the road, and then been driven into a ditch, from which an unsuccessful attempt had been made to remove it. Miss Murrell was then taken to the coppice by her abductor, beaten and stabbed, and possibly, as the coroner subsequently concluded, left to die of hypothermia.

Although, on the day after it was left there a local witness passed near to where Miss Murrell's body was subsequently found, he saw nothing, but the police are satisfied that the lie of the land may have hidden it from his sight. A local farmer first reported to the police, on the afternoon of 12 March that Miss Murrell's car was in the ditch in the position it had obviously been left by her assailant. The officers who arrived to investigate within an hour made only a preliminary search of the immediate area and, because there were no apparent suspicious circumstances, only superficial damage to the car and no apparent danger or obstruction to the public from the car, took no further action there. The car registration number was checked on the national computer and its ownership established. A police constable visited Miss Murrell's home early in the evening on Friday 23 March but, although he saw signs of habitation and the back door unlocked, he did not search the house as he assumed that nothing was amiss, despite being unable to make contact with anybody there. However, following a further telephone call to the police on the afternoon of 23 March to report that Miss Murrell's car was still in the ditch, officers went to her home later that evening, discovered that she was missing and a search was instituted the following morning with the results that I have already described.

Clearly, the police made detailed searches of both Miss Murrell's home and of the coppice to discover any information that might be of use in their inquiry. Reports of a grey-suited man having been seen running away from the coppice area at the relevant time of 21 March were also investigated and a reconstruction was staged. Despite 48 witnesses having been traced and further public appeals, the police have not yet been able to identify the man. The police also made extensive enquiries to trace people who might have been in Sutton road, where Miss Murrell lived, in the days preceding and the day of her murder. Over 100 people were identified as having been in the area, 50 of them on the day of the murder. Tracing these people formed a major part of the police inquiry and the process of elimination has resulted in only three of them remaining untraced at present.

From the considerable information that has been made available to me by the police it has become quite clear that the West Mercia police have devoted substantial resources to the investigation of what they see as a very grave offence. We all share their concern—that undoubtedly goes for the hon. Member for Linlithgow—that the offender is still at large.

I shall give some of the figures about the extent of the police inquiry. Some 3,500 people have been suggested as the potential offender by the public, police officers or by research on local and national intelligence indexes. Out of this number, 962 people have been identified for interview, and over half of them have already been interviewed. Over 1,300 telephone messages had been received by 30 November, over 2,000 statements taken and over 55,000 items of information recorded, both manually and on computer in the incident room.

As at 30 November again, nearly 12,000 people had been interviewed, over 4,500 houses visited and over 1,500 vehicles checked. I make these points not just because I think that this is an example of the tenacity and thoroughness with which the West Mercia constabulary are investigating this matter, but because even if some believe the inferences drawn by the hon. Member for Linlithgow, there has still been a massive orthodox investigation into the tragic events surrounding Miss Murrell's death.

In the initial stages of their investigation, the police made full inquiries into suggestions that Miss Murrell had been murdered because of her connections with various anti-nuclear organisations, in particular that she was at the time of her death preparing a paper to oppose the Sizewell B project. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Linlithgow for dismissing that suggestion out of hand, with the probity that we know him to possess. The hon. Gentleman is entirely right. A senior investigating officer assigned a small team specifically to inquire into those aspects, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be glad to note that no evidence has been found to link those activities with her death.

The police have also sought the assistance of other forces both here and overseas in analysing the considerable data available to them to prepare a profile of a likely offender by the best techniques possible. This profile closely mirrors the picture of the offender formed by the West Mercia police. Extracts of the profile have been publicised on television and in the press, and they clearly have resulted in some of the substantial public responses to which I have referred. The police investigation continues.

The inquest into Miss Murrell's death was held at Shrewsbury magistrates' court on 5 December, where both Miss Murrell's family and the police were represented by solicitors. The evidence presented to the coroner by the police was that which I have described; and on the basis of this and evidence given by the Home Office pathologist, the coroner recorded a verdict that Miss Murrell died probably on 21 March 1984 as a result of hypothermia, the victim also suffering from wounds to the abdomen and bruises to the face. The family has expressed to the police its thanks for a thorough investigation into a particularly difficult case—a case that is far from closed.

The hon. Members for Linlithgow and for Yeovil, and the hon. Member for Hammersmith in his brief intervention, said that behind these circumstances there could lurk matters of grave import. As I said at the outset, the comments made and the questions asked by the hon. Gentlemen deserve and will obtain a proper and considered response. The questions asked go beyond the remit of the Home Office, and the hon. Member for Linlithgow will recognise that time will be involved in obtaining the answers. The hon. Gentlemen have raised matters of import, and I therefore give the undertaking——

Mr. Dalyell: I thank the Minister for the seriousness of his reply. As long as there is a considered reply—whatever that reply may be—there will be no pressure from me to hurry the response. I certainly will not urge the Home Office to get on with the job and give a speedy reply. It can be a reply that takes weeks to obtain.

Mr. Shaw: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that interjection, which is both helpful and courteous. I take note that the hon. Gentleman has expressed substantial criticism of the reputation of the Home Office. I regret that fact, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that the debate and the questions will obtain full consideration and a proper and comprehensive reply in the manner wished by the hon. Gentleman, myself and, no doubt, the House.

BBC (Financing)

4.53 am

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): Shortly before 5 o'clock in the morning is perhaps not the happiest time to consider such an important subject. Interest in this subject goes far beyond that of those hon. Members who are able to join in this discussion.

For many years I have been associated with the BBC in both television and radio. I have contributed to and conducted research for a number of current affairs programmes for BBC radio and television. I formed the impression from inside and outside the BBC that many dedicated people work for the corporation, often in appalling conditions. Some parts of the BBC are of great quality. I single out Radio 3 and Radio 4 and parts of BBC 1. There is also unbelievable waste and inefficiency which are characteristics of many public sector institutions.

There is no doubt that this subject is of great interest. It evokes a considerable response from the public, as I am sure hon. Members will have found from their postbags over the past few weeks and will find in the weeks to come. It also encourages visits by constituents to Members' surgeries.

A number of opinion polls have been published. They show that there is considerable hostility to the BBC's proposal for a 41 per cent. increase in the licence fee. That increase is apparently supported by 13 per cent. only of the sample interviewed by NOP on behalf of D'Arcy-Macmanus and Masius, and by 14 per cent. only of the sample interviewed by MORI on behalf of The Sunday Times. An increase from £46 to £65 is a whopping increase for anyone who is living on a restricted budget due to a fixed income.

I am interested also in the morality of the matter. With the development of cable television, the BBC will have a declining minority of listeners and viewers. There are bound to be questions about the legitimacy of the base for a compulsory tax, such as the BBC licence fee.

Many commentators and hon. Members on both sides of the House have drawn attention to the regressive nature of the BBC licence as a form of taxation. That is hardly surprising. Television sets are possessed by many pensioners, single parent families and others who find it difficult to find the resources to pay a large licence fee, even with the various methods of payment that have been introduced in recent years. Rich people, who have more than one television set, pay the same licence fee as others with one. To that extent, this tax falls harshly upon those groups in our society which can least afford it.

The BBC's problem is that revenues are no longer buoyant. They were buoyant primarily because the number of television sets was increasing. The increase is now declining. The number of people owning colour television pushed up the revenues because of the difference between the cost of a black and white and a colour licence.

Colour television licences exceed 80 per cent. of the total number of licences. The number of colour television licences is not expected to increase at anything like the rate of recent years. That is hardly surprising. The estimates at the moment are for an increase of 3 per cent. per year.

Futhermore, the BBC, in its admirably documented submission in support of its proposal, has drawn attention to the spiralling cost of providing television services. I am not happy to accept that it is necessary that all the costs should spiral in the way that they do. That is a matter to which I shall return.

I want to discuss whether we need to increase the licence fee at all. The commonest solution to be put forward by commentators over the past few weeks is the introduction of some advertising. Whether it should be partial for Radio 1 and Radio 2, or perhaps for BBC 1, or across the entire range of BBC services, is a matter that will no doubt arouse great debate. I find the BBC's attitude to this proposition puzzling. It claims to be non-commercial and it deprecates advertising. Indeed, that has been repeated recently by the new chairman of the BBC. He has said that he does not consider advertising to be appropriate. Yet there has been a grudging acceptance of the value of sponsorship, or at any rate the necessity of sponsorship for sport and some areas of the arts. In appropriate programmes, the BBC will frequently interview authors about books which they have recently published. In a sense, that is a form of advertising of the product.

There are also the BBC's own plugs. It is scarcely possible to listen to the radio or watch television without hearing various forms of plugs almost as frequently as on the independent channels. The BBC plugs only its own programmes or its own products, of which there is quite a wide range. Martin Anderson, an economist, has written:

> "BBC Enterprises has branches dealing with TV Programme Sales, Film and Videotape Library Sales, Education and Training Sales and Hire, Video Exhibitions, Merchandising, Records and Tapes, Music Publishing, Technical Facilities, as well as Production, Technical and Service Depts."

With such a long list of branches, it can hardly be said that the BBC is virginly pure of any commercial involvement.

What are the possibilities? The possibility that seems to meet with the broadest degree of support is the introduction of advertising to Radio 1 and Radio 2, which are comparable with commercial radio stations. They play light or pop music most of the time. The primary purpose of BBC 2 is to provide programmes of an educational nature. However, BBC 1 concentrates more on entertainment, so that is another area where advertising could be considered.

What has been the reaction of the public to the idea of advertising? I return to the NOP survey. Apparently 77 per cent. want the licence fee to be pegged, even if that means advertising. According to MORI, the figure is 69 per cent. I would not draw too much of a conclusion from the difference between the two percentages. According to NOP, 56 per cent. think that the programmes would not suffer as a result. That must be set against the 42 per cent. who think that the programmes are not any good anyway.

What do the ITV companies think? We have not heard from them all, but we have heard from Granada through a number of different letters to The Guardian. It seems that it thinks it a bad idea. That is hardly surprising. After all, it would have to compete for the same advertisng revenue and, therefore, it would see the idea as a threat. It would mean that it, too, would have to tackle some of the restrictive practices that riddle the media — both televison and Fleet street.

The BBC objects to the principle of advertising because it says that it would lead eventually to the rejigging of schedules and the sales department would dominate. It claims that the rating schedules would become the most important factor. So the BBC portrays itself as highminded. I find that rather unconvincing. It should be remembered that at the end of 1983, when the BBC's share of the market had fallen to 45 per cent., it rescheduled "The Thorn Birds" in place of "Panorama" and, curiously enough, its rating increased to 49 per cent. Therefore, the BBC is not above rejigging its ratings if it thinks that there is something in it for it.

One must address the question of advertising in principle. I personally believe that advertising has much merit. In order to increase advertising revenue, television and radio must meet audience demand, and surely that should be an objective of television and radio companies. Of course, that argument would not commend itself to the eletists, but it would commend itself to the general public.

It is also said that quality would suffer. That is a difficult argument to follow, because more revenue would come into television and could be devoted to greater quality as well as to a greater range of programmes. It is instructive to note that, even with the present system, the ITV companies are capable of making some extremely good quality programmes, and at the recent Emmy awards, Britain had a clean sweep in the section for non-United States competitors. All five of those prizes went to independent television companies.

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): Almost as an aside and a throwaway line, the hon. Gentleman said that if there were to be advertising on BBC, more revenue would come into television. That is not the estimate of all the practitioners in advertising or of the television or radio companies. Where will that increased revenue come from? Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the cake will be enlarged, or is he suggesting that the additional revenue coming to the BBC under these proposals will come from commercial local radio and perhaps local newspapers? If so, what is the consequence for the latter?

Mr. Jones: I shall return to that matter later. The simple answer is that I believe that the cake will grow, and that that view is shared by practitioners in advertising.

Public opinion is important. It is the public's money, and they should be the first to be considered. The MORI poll in March 1984 showed that 44 per cent. thought that the BBC presented either not very good value for money or poor value for money, so clearly that worried them. That might have concerned simply price, with the public feeling that if the television licence fee had been lower, the standard would have been acceptable. However, apparently that is not so, because 42 per cent. were dissatisfied with quality as opposed to 53 per cent. who were satisfied. The same question was asked about ITV programmes. In their case, only 31 per cent. were dissatisfied, whereas 64 per cent. were satisfied. That is a reflection of the increasing quality of ITV productions not just in news and current affairs, where they are incomparably good, but in documentaries, light entertainment, plays, and so on.

The idea of advertising must have its supporters as well as its opponents. I should like to mention them at length. It has been welcomed by the Institute of Practitioners in Advertising. Its media policy group welcomed the Saatchi and Saatchi Compton report calling for advertising. The group stated:

"It is our view that allowing advertising to fund the BBC increasingly will give the corporation the resources to develop its services more fully without the need for the public to bear the burden."

That is part of the reply to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk).

The idea also commended itself recently to Opposition members. The hon. Member for Bassetlaw, (Mr. Ashton) has shown a particular interest in it, and, much to my amazement, so has the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), although not so recently. Michael Tracey, writing in "Public Money", in September said:

"In 1966 the then Postmaster General, Tony Benn, as the Minister responsible for broadcasting, actually considered forcing the BBC to take advertising. Such an idea was easily defeated by BBC lobbying, appalled civil servants — one, legend has it, threatened to take the issue to the Queen if Benn did not desist".

Of course, the right hon. Member for Chesterfield may have changed his mind about this as much as he has about many other matters, but it is interesting to note that he favoured advertising at that time.

Many individual advertising agencies welcome the idea of increased opportunities. Rodney Harris, media director of D'Arcy MacManus and Masius, has said:

"Last year, advertisers were having to pay nearly twice as much in real terms for television airtime as they did in 1970".

That being so, it is scarcely surprising that advertisers should view this as a means of keeping down their costs as well as bringing extra revenue into the industry.

In any real world, the BBC itself should welcome the idea because the gap between BBC and ITV resources continues to widen and will clearly lead to a challenge in the quality of programmes in due course.

Advertising is only part of the answer. For a great part of the revenue necessary there is still the choice between greater efficiency and doing something about the scale of the operations. I believe that there is tremendous waste and major opportunities for cost cutting within the present service. Many who work at the BBC admit that. Stuart Young, the new chairman, in an interview published in The Times recently, conceded:

"I think that within the industry there are certain manning practices which have developed that are less than desirable. But what I do know for a fact is that any manning difficulties that there are within the BBC are nothing as compared to the manning difficulties in commercial television."

I do not suggest that just because ITV is overmanned that means that the BBC is not. It is a case of the pot calling the kettle black.

In an admirable letter in The Times of 27 November my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Hooson) detailed the matter as follows:

"If one cuts through the BBC's idealised view of itself, what actually exists is a badly managed, over-staffed and over-extended empire, as much in need of pruning as were British Steel, British Leyland and the NCB. When can viewers expect to see a BBC TV exposure of its inefficient work practices and of the large investment in computer technology lying idle in newsrooms because of lack of will to manage resources lest any interest group might be upset?"

I have had experience of that myself when working for the BBC. One notorious practice of the BBC is that, when it wants information which may not necessarily be urgent, instead of asking one to post it, a taxi is sent to collect it. That is a shocking waste of public resources. It is also well known that on outside locations many BBC staff enjoy a standard of food and hotel accommodation greatly exceeding that which should apply when public money is involved.

Many people who work in the BBC would probably concede that there is quite a lot of waste. I have heard it said by many who work further down the tree that the BBC is one of those organisations in which there are whole tribes of chiefs rather than Indians. Certainly my personal observation has been that the people at the sharp end often have to operate in extremely poor conditions and with limited equipment, while the top people have far more support staff than one would recognise as necessary.

There is also the question of scale. The BBC has gone into a number of new areas in recent years. Local radio, for example, is costing it about £20 million per year. That is about 3 per cent. of the total and it is increasing. I do not believe that the BBC needs to be in local radio at all. Its service duplicates that of the commercial stations. It is also often inferior in quality to the commercial stations which are famed for their extremely high technical standards.

It would be far better if the public had a choice, and if there were competition. The BBC should sell off its local radio services to the private sector. In that context, I pay tribute to the Chiltern radio station — an independent radio station serving my constituency—which is widely listened to. My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) nods agreement. The station serves his area, too. It is of very fine quality. If there were two such stations in our area, with no drain on public money, that would be a great amenity for the people of our part of the Chilterns. The proposed BBC radio station will be a drain on the taxpayers' resources.

Breakfast television currently costs the BBC £5 million. I wonder why the project was allowed to go ahead in the first place, at a time when the BBC was complaining about the strain on its resources.

I do not believe that the present method of charging through the licensing structure can survive the present technological revolution. It is almost inconceivable that, with cable television around the corner and the duopoly of ITV and BBC dying, the general public will continue to be willing to pay for licences. I look forward to the day when people will pay for individual programmes through some sort of pay cable system.

The argument is about choice. We have a long way to go. People often sneer at television and radio in the United States—at the experience and the choice—but there is far more choice in the United States. In his book, "The Cable Revolution — Britain on the Brink of the Information Society", the editor of The Sunday Times, Mr. Andrew Neil, picks the schedules available in New York and London at 9 pm on 7 June 1982. In New York there was a choice of 25 programmes, compared with three in London—Channel 4 not yet being in operation. The New York programmes varied immensely. New York had a choice between "MASH", a documentary on black ghetto life, another film, a talk show, a documentary about the Kennedy years, baseball, a Spanish show, a variety show, Nureyev, Spanish drama, an opera—"Orpheus"—a public access discussion on international education, a seminar on nuclear arms, a film called "Bye, Bye, Birdie", a drama, another film, gymnastics, the Royal Ballet, folk art, Chinese cooking, the news and the film "The High Country". The citizens of New York clearly had a phenomenal choice. In Miami, too, there are no fewer than 80 stations in operation.

It is extraordinary that the hon. Member for Knowsley, North should say that there would be a shortage of advertising. If Miami — a small town compared with London—can operate 80 such stations, is it not possible for the United Kingdom to operate more than two television stations with advertising? I do not believe that advertising would be in short supply. The amount may grow slowly. That is something that will have to be taken into account when the decision is made—and in March the Home Secretary will have to make a decision.

All these features will have to be included in the package if it is to win my acceptance. I expect that advertising will be introduced in due course. I expect evidence of improved efficiency in the BBC. I expect that the BBC will be encouraged to privatise local radio and breakfast television. Meanwhile, if there is to be an increase in the short term, it will take place without my vote in the House of Commons.

5.18 am

Mr. Francis Maude (Warwickshire, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) on his introduction of this important subject. I congratulate him on the subject, if not on the timing of the debate. We are not playing to a packed House. My hon. Friend the Minister has had to sit through the previous debate as well, and I congratulate him on looking remarkably perky.

This is an important debate because of its timing in regard to the proposed increase in the BBC licence fee and because, since the beginning of broadcasting, there has been a liberal consensus that we have to maintain the purity and virginity of the public service broadcasting ethic. Any mention of advertising in connection with the BBC somehow signals the advance of the Visigoths across Europe. The fragile structure of civilisation totters and is close to crumbling at the very mention of the word.

The quality of the argument for advertising on the BBC has advanced enormously. The case has become ever more potent and it has been put lucidly and forcefully tonight by my hon. Friend. The argument against has remained static and has been poorly articulated. It does not seem to occur to those who defend the status quo that we require a fairly rigorous analysis of what is going on and of the justification for maintaining the status quo.

The intellectual arrogance of the argument in favour of the status quo reached its apogee in an editorial in The Observer last Sunday. It had that peculiarly irritating and patronising tone of superiority which is so redolent of the liberal consensus. It said:

"It is simply not the case that the sharing of advertising between ITV and BBC would leave the underlying geology of British broadcasting unaffected. It would wreck it".

I accept that as a statement of opinion. It can be held genuinely and sincerely. However, such an assertion must be backed up with some form of analysis and justification. What do we have? The editorial continued:

"If Mrs. Thatcher is not prepared to accept that warning from the BBC . . . then perhaps she should pay heed to the equally serious forebodings expressed by those in the free enterprise sector of the industry."

The support of the BBC is prayed in aid, as is the support of the independent television companies. The same vein of rigorous analysis continues:

"She might also reflect on the fact that the last politician to bring forward a proposal almost identical to her own was Mr. Tony Benn: he, too, professed not to want to swamp the airwaves with advertising — he simply, until defeated in a Labour Cabinet, proclaimed his desire to see the principle established."

[Mr. Francis Maude]

It is a curious reflection for The Observer, whose distaste for the adversarial nature of politics is well known, to assume that because one part of the Labour party has at some stage supported this issue it ought to be axiomatic that the Government oppose it. The editorial claims to set out the case against advertising in the BBC and yet t is devoid of any justification, analysis or reasoned support for that case. It continues;

"The truth is that—perhaps more by luck than foresight—Britain happens to have almost the ideal 'mix' in at least one sector of its communications industry: on the one side, a lately somewhat complacent public service corporation and, on the other, a highly competitive free enterprise system."

Again, a bald assertion of opinion. The argument just does not measure up to what the public perceive to be the case. The BBC lost its innocence in regard to commercialism a long time ago. Every year, come the run-up to Christmas, we have the unedifying spectacle of the BBC announcing its Christmas line-up with all of the razzmatazz that is attached to commercialism. It competes directly with the ITV companies. It competes, but without the sort of financial discipline that accompanies proper competition in a free market. At the end of the day, the BBC cannot go bankrupt, because it comes back to the Home Office for another subvention — another increase in the compulsory levy on everyone who owns a television set. Similarly, the ITV companies do not operate—as The Observer maintains — within a highly competitive framework. They are a private monopoly.

I am not one of those who maintain that the BBC is terribly wasteful and extravagant, without any financial discipline. I accept that there have been attempts to impose some sort of financial discipline in the BBC. I also accept the argument of those who say, "If you want to see overmanning, bad labour practices and wastefulness, don't look at the BBC but at the independent television companies." That is absolutely right. The wastefulness is far greater there, and the reason is perfectly straightforward. There is no competition and the independent television companies operate a monopoly.

There is far too much advertising chasing far too little advertising time in the independent television sector, with the result that prices are sky-high. The independent companies can charge whatever they like, because advertisers have nowhere else to go to get the same sort of coverage. Consequently, the independent companies operate without any sort of cost discipline. As well as having an effect on the quality of broadcasting, this also has a consequence on the cost of the product advertised. There is a direct public interest in that.

In anything purporting to be a free market there must be advertising. The direct consequence of restricting access to the advertising media is that the cost of the products in the market place is artificially increased. We must address ourselves to the direct public interest in that matter.

I hope that I have shown that within the present broadcasting structure there is a failure of the sort of liberal consensus that has existed for so long. At present there is a compulsory levy on everyone who owns a television set. That operates whether or not the owner ever turns on to BB1 or 2. He may watch nothing but ITV programmes, and all the evidence suggests that more people watch ITV programmes than BBC. None the less, everyone must pay the levy. That is nothing short of immoral.

Every three years the BBC comes round with the begging bowl. No doubt an agreement will be made between the Government and the BBC, and the licence fee for the forthcoming three years will be set at somewhere between the present levy and the bid. That is a shabby and unsatisfactory way of regulating a most important part of our public life. We must urgently press for the introduction of advertising into the BBC. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West suggests, it could be done gradually rather than all at once. There could be a phasing out of the licence fee over several years, but at the end of that process I want to see the complete abolition of the licence fee and the funding of public sector broadcasting from advertising.

I know that some people maintain that we could not fund Radio 3 and Radio 4, and possibly BBC 2, from advertising. There may be some justification for that point of view, but to those who say that minority interests cannot be catered for in minority programmes within a commercial framework I would point out that Channel 4, although it was quite rightly criticised at its inception, caters for a large number of minority interests within a commercial framework. To those who say that BBC2 is so sacred and important that it cannot be sullied with commercialism I say that we should try it and see. I believe that it can be properly funded within a commercial framework.

As for Radio 3 and Radio 4, if eventually the conclusion is reached that they cannot be operated within a commercial framework I believe we ought to accept it and fund them out of general taxation. As a proportion of the total BBC budget the cost is tiny. The additional subvention from the Treasury would be minuscule, but it would release anybody who owns a television set from the tyranny of the levy.

The case for keeping advertising out of the BBC has been shown to be wanting in every respect. By its increasing readiness to incorporate advertising for its own products and services within its programmes the BBC has shown that it is not averse to the commercial spirit. It is a gross insult to the dedication and impartiality of those who work in the BBC and to those who acknowledge the need for impartiality and quality in broadcasting to say that to introduce commercialisation is to destroy the public service ethic. The case against advertising has not been made. The case for advertising becomes more potent and cogent as time goes on. I hope that the Minister will be able to indicate that the question is being most urgently addressed and that preliminary conclusions may be reached before the inevitable increase in the licence fee.

5.32 am

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in the debate. May I add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) on having secured the debate and having given us the opportunity to raise this important matter.

If one is discussing the funding of any television network there are a number of options: first to fund it from taxation, secondly to fund it from advertising, and thirdly to look towards some kind of subscription basis of funding, by direct charging or otherwise. Whatever the method of funding of the television network, surely in common with all other businesses its future must depend upon being able to respond to the demands of its customers, in this case its audience. By far the worst possible system is that which is based upon a licence fee. That guarantees stability of income, regardless of the quality of programmes. Advertising, whatever the élitist arguments presented against it might be, has the merit that it is an improvement on the present system of responding to customer demand.

My principal criticism of the licensing system is that it allows no relationship whatever to occur between consumption and the price charged or between quality and the demands of the consumer. The consumer is left with no way of expressing a preference. The only way is to write to "Points of View", but that is hardly the type of preference that I would expect hon. Members of my party to regard as legitimate.

Another more serious objection — although it is a feature of our system of government that we have been able to avoid — is what is affectionately known in the trade as the Carrickmore syndrome. I was unaware of it until I undertook research when preparing for the debate. It refers to the incident in 1979 when the BBC filmed an IRA show of strength in the village of Carrickmore. The Government quite rightly protested about this excess. It happened to be an incident which occurred in the middle of the discussions on the licence fee. The BBC dropped the film and it was suggested that it did so because it was worried about the licence fee increase. Scurrilous as that suggestion might have been, it is worrying to have a broadcasting system that is open to the criticism that it depends on the good will of the Government of the day to secure its funds.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West said that the BBC was no innocent virgin in advertising and commercialism. I have had a number of visits from constituents who have expressed their strong objection to the proposed increase in licence fees. I have also had visits from people who are opposed to advertising, but they did not object for the same reasons as some of the high-flown advocates on the other side of this argument. They complained that advertising would interrupt the programmes. My perception is that programmes are constantly interrupted by commercial breaks for the BBC's own products and programmes.

Indeed, I suggest that the commercial break is useful, because it gives one — or one's wife — the opportunity to put the kettle on.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: That was a very sexist remark.

Mr. Forsyth: I apologise to the hon. Member. It was meant to be descriptive rather than sexist.

The fact that we see sponsorship at sporting events, such as football matches, shows that the rot has already set in. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West referred to the number of products that the BBC markets. It is suggested that quality would suffer if advertising were introduced, but I believe that some programmes would benefit from the introduction of advertising and would certainly not be disrupted by it. For example, it would be useful to have advertisements between horse races. I cannot see that that would destroy the fabric or the creativity of programmes or justify any of the other bogus arguments that are put forward.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Is that not particularly the case with Radio 1 and Radio 2? The jingles would be part of the atmosphere, as they are on commercial radio. The atmosphere is part of the reason why so many young people listen to commercial radio.

Mr. Forsyth: That was an extremely helpful intervention. I do not often listen to Radio 1 or Radio 2. I find the commercial stations much better.

We should be suspicious of the BBC's self-indulgent, self-congratulatory attitude. My hon. Friends have been much kinder to the BBC than I shall be. The argument that the corporation is the pinnacle of broadcasting has yet to be proved. These matters are subjective, but it seems to me that on news coverage, current affairs and investigative reporting, ITV takes the BBC by storm and is much more effective. If hon. Members choose something a little closer to home, I believe that the ITV coverage of general elections has consistently been better than that of the BBC. The ITV coverage of the recent American elections was masterful. On the BBC there was only a cosy anti-Reagan fireside chat, with little information being provided for those of us who were looking for the high ground that the BBC claims to occupy.

The argument that advertising would debase the quality of programmes hardly stands up when one switches on and sees shows of the calibre of "Blankety Blank" and other quiz programmes broadcast by the BBC. Mention has been made of the rejigging of programmes around "The Thornbirds". I seem to recall that the BBC spent a very considerable sum on securing that, I believe Australian, soap opera. Again, it would not fit the description of the high ground.

I would not describe Channel 4's broadcasting as broadcasting of the lowest possible denominator, yet advertising obviously plays its part there. I may have missed the point because I do not watch it frequently, but I would not describe breakfast television as particularly elevating. The Fleet street newspapers compete for advertising, yet they still seem capable of producing quality newspapers. Judging by the editorials, some of them are improving before our very eyes.

The fact is that the argument about quality is purely an elitist argument to prop up the view that there are one or two people in the BBC who know what a quality programme is, and what is best for the viewing public. They are entitled to their opinions, but hon. Members should look at their performance records. They show that they are extremely sensitive to audience ratings. By their own actions, they admit that the best test of effective broadcasting and quality is the extent of high ratings. One of the unfortunate aspects of the argument is that the high ratings are considered a criticism and something that should be despised. On the contrary, they should be sought after, because they show that there are satisfied customers.

The hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) asked whether there would be enough advertising. I notice that the director-general of the BBC was recently quoted as saying that local newspapers would suffer as a result of introducing advertising into the BBC. That was a new and very welcome demonstration of concern for local papers by the BBC. I am sure that we all appreciate that. But I seem to recall that the same argument was used by local newspapers against commercial television and radio in the early days. It was then argued that if there was advertising on radio and television, it would take away business from the newspapers, and would mean the end of civilisation as we know it.

[Mr. Forsyth]

We know that that was a totally bogus argument. Far from taking away advertising, the increase in commercial advertising in broadcasting in turn increased demand for advertising in the local press, as it resulted in tie-up advertising and marketing. The principal source of the argument about the volume of advertising has been the independent television producers. My hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. Maude) eloquently described how the interests coincided. People are desperately keen to preserve the monopoly. I have always been on the fringes of advertising, but those whom I know in that world very much resent that monopoly. It is used to say, "Take it or leave it. This is the price and this is the slot." Incidentally, some of the most expensive advertising on ITV is in the slots that block some of the best and most prestigious programmes on BBC. Anyone who has been interviewed at home by ITV must have been astonished by the number of cars and the people who emerge from them with clipboards but, who appear to have no particular function.

Wages in the independent television companies have consistently gone up at an astonishing rate—about 35 per cent. above the BBC rate. We are told that that is why the BBC finds it difficult to compete, that it trains all the people and that they then go off to ITV. Therefore, it is said, it needs more money to attract them back. It is a self-fulfilling spiral which is going downwards and which can only be broken by competition. It is a system that has allowed restrictive practices to grow and that has been to the detriment of both commercial and public broadcasting.

The argument about whether there is enough advertising available in the market is ridiculous when it is seen in the context of the fact that a mere 15 minutes a day for the BBC would bring in £50 million a year. We are not talking about wall to wall advertising from the start of broadcasting to the finish.

One or two anomalies exist within the licensing system which are unfair. It is impossible to defend the fact that a pensioner, regardless of income, will have to pay the proposed £65 licence fee. It becomes even harder to defend when it is recognised that if that pensioner lives in a sheltered housing scheme he would have to pay only £5 a year, provided the sheltered housing scheme is in the public sector. If the pensioner lived in one of the splendid examples of a private sheltered housing scheme put up around the country, he and every other pensioner in that scheme would have to pay the full licence. That cannot be fair.

The licensing system is questionable when one looks at the costs of collection. I understand that the cost of collecting is about 6 per cent., which is high when compared with, say, income tax, at 2 per cent.

Having put the case for advertising, let me mention the possibility of a subscription scheme, because I do not think that that has come into the debate, either outside or inside the House. The licence started as a subscription scheme. It was only as part of the wheeling and dealing done by the Government of the day in the days when it was necessary to give something in return for taking away a monopoly — a curious notion — when the BBC's monopoly on television broadcasting was removed to allow the ITV companies to come into existence, that the subscription system was changed to a licensing system, or, in effect, a poll tax on people with sets. It was part of the quid pro quo.

There is nothing in the world to prevent the BBC from allowing existing licences to expire and in 12 months we could scramble the signal. Having been so hard on the BBC, I do not want to imply that I am trying to ensure that nobody is capable of receiving its programmes any more. Newsagents and normal retail outlets could market a small device to put between the aerial socket and the television to unscramble the signal, for which a monthly rental or flat charge is paid. To deal with piracy, and so on, the scrambling could be altered and a new device could be obtained every two or three months.

That would have the happy advantage of preventing the BBC from padding out the summer with those repeats of repeats of repeats which no one wants to watch, because presumably no one would go along to their newsagent and buy the delightful device to unscramble the programmes. The BBC would have an incentive to ensure that it kept its subscribers.

I know that arguments against that will be advanced. I know that people will say it would be unfair, that the BBC would have to think about its customers, market itself, and be responsible to consumer demand. I know that those arguments will be advanced against the proposal, but they are precisely the arguments that I would advance in favour of it.

There is a further anomaly. I confess that I have not done my homework as well as I should have liked. I understand from a constituent who wrote to me this week that at every sitting of a court in my constituency there are about a dozen cases of people who have forgotten to buy television licences and have been caught by detector vans. The normal procedure is to fine them about £5 for each month for which the payment is outstanding, and to make them pay the back-duty on the fee. I understand that the latter payment goes to the court, not to the BBC, which is in contrast with the system that operates for vehicle licence dodging. As a result, the BBC is losing considerable amounts of revenue. As a gesture to its empty coffers, I suggest that that should be examined, if the present licence system, which I do not support, is to continue.

The debate this morning and the recent debate in the press and elsewhere provides us with an opportunity. Public opinion is on the side of those who think that the licensing system has been tested to destruction. There is a serious problem in the BBC, which relates to its decreasing cost-effectiveness. Since 1971 its income has romped well ahead of inflation. Licences have increased in number from 16 million to 18·5 million. Colour licences, which are about three times the price of black and white licences, have increased from 4 per cent. to 80 per cent. of licences. The BBC has, therefore, had an enormous increase in revenue.

Now the total number of licences is in decline. We have had five increases in the seven years between 1975 and 1981, compared with seven in the previous 50 years. The BBC told the Annan committee that with 8 per cent. inflation it would need a 25 per cent. increase in the licence fee every three years. This year with 5 per cent. inflation, it wants a 30 per cent. increase—that is three years after a 35 per cent. increase.

The time has come to think about radical action in terms of commercialising the BBC. Even in the present political crisis it is astonishing to find senior figures in the BBC saying, "Ah well, the problem is all those people with car radios. We need a car radio tax. It would be simple. We would just put a little green band on the tax disc of the motor cars of those who had paid their car radio fee. It is tremendous value because there are millions of car radios and the cost would be only ½p a week. People should be made to contribute towards that." Even now they are pumping the same old argument, which no longer has credibility. Auntie is in desperate need of surgery.

BBC 1, BBC 2 and breakfast TV could be hived off as a separate company. The board of governors of the BBC should be turned into a sort of IBA. It should ensure that matters go right, but it should not be involved commercially. That entity could then be funded entirely by advertising without any difficulty. I accept that there is a problem about getting all the revenue from advertising for BBC 2. However, a combination of subsidy from BBC 1 and breakfast TV — it is questionable whether breakfast TV is a viable proposition—sponsorship and subscription could fund BBC 2.

There may also be merit in hiving off BBC Television News as a separate entity that could sell its product in the way that Independent Radio News does for the commercial radio stations. My hon. Friends the Members for Hertfordshire, West and for Warwickshire, North made a convincing case for advertising on Radio 1 and Radio 2. I believe that they should be sold off lock, stock and barrel, because they are ideally placed to be operated as private concerns. There is no possible case for their being operated by the state.

I recognise the special position of Radio 3 and Radio 4, but their funding could easily be organised through a combination of sponsorship and subscription on the lines of the public broadcasting service in the United States. As for BBC local radio, I must tell my hon. Friend the Minister that in all the research that I have carried out, and in all the thinking I have done, I cannot find a single argument for that service being run by the BBC. It should be privatised, preferably through management buy-outs, or simply by the highest bidder taking all.

If I may be allowed a regional reference, BBC Scotland, BBC Wales and BBC Ulster could be funded from advertising, and private capital could be introduced. There is no reason why the board of governors of the BBC should not still ensure the quality of programmes.

Perhaps I may be allowed one reactionary proposal in my suggested programme of radical reform. It would be a grave mistake to alter the basis of the BBC external services. The case for retaining it under the control of the BBC, and funded by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, is overwhelming. Indeed, that service—the one for which there is a strong case for public broadcasting —is consistently damaged as a result of our exercises to restrain public expenditure. There is a strong case for giving that service more resources, which could be saved from the other action that I propose.

This is a great opportunity for the Government to sort out, once and for all, the licence problem. It would command the support of the vast majority of British people. Even some Opposition Members argue the case for advertising — something that I did not believe would happen in this Parliament, if ever. That is a recognition that advertising would not sound the death knell of the BBC and that there is an opportunity for change. Some Conservative Members are extremely worried by the noises being made in Government. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said some extremely encouraging things about advertising, but we have also heard the echo, "Yes, we will settle the licence fee this time, and we will think about advertising next year." No doubt that echo will disappear into the mists of, "We have an election coming", and all the other arguments that have been used to delay good ideas. The echo will result in reverberations from many hon. Members, who want the Government to seize this opportunity.

5.58 am

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): I join my hon. Friends in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) on his success in the ballot, and on enabling several hon. Members to articulate the worries of many members of the public. It is significant that all those who have spoken in the debate so far are new Members of Parliament. They represent the new thinking among the public on this issue.

I am concerned about this matter for four reasons. First, I believe that we should respond to public demand on this issue. As far as possible, Members of Parliament should reflect the views of their constituents, and there is no doubt from the excellent statistics and polls that the public want change in this sector.

Secondly, I am naturally opposed to compulsory levies in principle, and at the moment we have a compulsory levy on anyone who has a television set in his home.

Thirdly, I want to bring more competition into advertising. At the moment, advertising is a monopoly of the independent sector, and that is leading to higher costs than would be the case if there were more competition.

Fourthly, I am concerned about the BBC licence fee being increased to anything like the level that it requests in its application. Figures such as 0·5 per cent. on the retail price index have been quoted, and that would lead to about £150 million extra public expenditure, with the knock-on effect on benefits, which are tied to the RPI.

I do not agree with the three-year agreement proposal. We should be looking for a one-year agreement. In the meantime, we should be discussing alternative funding and a long-term solution that will eliminate the need for a licence fee.

Whenever one challenges public sector sacred cows, there are always people who complain and predict doom and gloom. There was an interesting article in The Times by Bernard Levin not long ago, in which he told those of us who are too young to remember what happened in the 1950s in the debate over the creation of an independent television network. He said:

"As the debate got under way, such demotic figures as Lord Waverley, Lord Halifax, Lord Brand and Lady Violet Bonham-Carter denounced the proposal as certain to corrupt the popular taste, of which they had always, of course, been such conspicuous guardians. Lord Hailsham envisaged 'Caliban emerging from his slimy cavern'; Lord Esher foresaw the nation plunged 'into a planned and premediated orgy of vulgarity'; Lord Mathers shrank from the horror of young people seeing on their screens such foul slogans as 'Beer is Best'; Mr. Scholefield Allan, MP, described the never-forgotten revulsion he had experienced when he had heard, on Radio Luxembourg, an advertisement immediately preceding a Beethoven symphony; Herbert Morrison threatened that a future Labour government might abolish ITV altogether; Beverley Baxter shuddered at the thought that an advertisement might feature a man extolling a deodorant.

Advertising-funded television arrived, and the skies did not fall."

[Mr. Christopher Chope]

The public realise that that is the reality. We have been experiencing a self-interested lobby by the BBC, which is trying to prevent Members of Parliament from taking cognisance of what people think.

The effect of the advertising monopoly has already been referred to by a number of my hon. Friends. The restrictive practices and high wage rates that exist in the television world are renowned. I shall refer to an article that Mr. Max Hastings wrote in the Standard on 25 October 1984. He was talking about the dispute that brought Thames Television to a halt for several consecutive days. He spoke of the "absurdly high" salaries in ITV and the "absurdly unrealistic" work practices, which were matched only in the press industry. The difference between Fleet street and the BBC is that one does not have to pay a compulsory amount every day for a newpaper. Many people choose not to buy a newspaper, but those who have a television set are compelled to pay a licence fee, even if they do not wish to watch BBC. Mr. Hastings said that ITV has really had a licence to print money when so much revenue was coming that nothing seemed to matter but continuing to churn out programmes at any cost. He also said:

"Once created, the system became enshrined in tradition. In the past few years, all producers of television have become deeply concerned by cost escalations, running far ahead on inflation. Yet none has made significant progress in persuading its employees to adopt more realistic practices.

With ITV film cameramen making around £40,000 a year, some electricians even more than this, film editors the right side of £20,000, relatively unskilled sound and camera assistants closer to £30,000, there is room for everybody on the gravy train.

The impact on film-making caused by overtime agreements is soul-destroying. Once the basic day has been worked, every hour thereafter the scale of technicians' earnings multiply until they reach a level four or five times basic rates.

There are 'pocket money' agreements for crews working abroad even when all their expenses are being paid, meal-break deals and rest-period arrangements of fantastic complexity. Only a handful of technicians are willing to be flexible about interpreting their rights."

Mr. Hastings went on to say:

"The irony is that BBC, with its resolute determination to yield nothing to the commercial principle, is sinking into ever-deeper financial problems, which in turn make for worse programmes, which in turn make for lower ratings.

ITV, wallowing in advertising revenue, is riding so high in the ratings that any contractors are desperate to see an improvement in the BBC's fortunes, before the Government steps in to cream off yet more of commercial TV's profits.

Last weekend, we were given our first frontal nude on that most loathsomely exploitative of all soap operas, Tenko. Do we call this an opening shot in the BBC's great ratings fight-back?"

If the restrictive practices, overmanning and high wages were occurring solely in the independent television companies, perhaps that would be of relatively little concern compared with what is happening now. Unfortunately, these same practices are occurring in the BBC. Mr. Woodrow Wyatt, writing in The Times on 6 October, said that, contrary to some opinions, the BBC has even more staffing than the independent sector. He then said:

"The BBC has a staff of some 29,000. Commercial broadcasting with a comparable television output and a radio network, employs fewer than 20,000. The BBC, a bureaucracy not concerned with maximising profits, probably employs a staff about one third more than if it were a commercial organisation."

Because there is an advertising monopoly, the independent channels are able to make extra profits by pushing up the advertising rates far ahead of the rate of inflation. Their work force then demands an extra share of those profits, and as a result, the BBC finds that it has to pay staff extra to compete. It is a vicious circle in which the consumer comes out worst and the monopoly unions operate to good effect for their members who are lucky enough to work in those industries.

Many of the people who oppose advertising on the BBC suggest that there would need to be a massive amount of advertising to have an impact. One of the points coming through in this welcome debate is that a relatively modest amount of advertising would suffice. Advertising for one minute 20 seconds in an hour would obviate the need to increase the fee. Advertising for only one minute 20 seconds in an hour would not mean that programmes have to be interrupted by advertisements. Advertisements could be placed between programmes. I believe that there would be wide public acceptance of a modest amount of advertising, even if, to start with, there was advertising only on BBC 1. That would leave BBC 2 to operate more like the public broadcasting service that operates in the United States.

I am worried about the negotiations for a three-year licence agreement. It means that any agreed licence fee will be that much higher than if it were a one-year agreement. I have already illustrated the adverse effect that that would have on the Government's policy of keeping down inflation. It also means that the welcome public debate on the subject would close as soon as a new three-year agreement was reached. I implore the Government to recognise that it is now too late to rejig the whole thing before March next year when the licence fee must be agreed. They should say that the BBC will have a one-year agreement only and that the extra time will be used for increased public debate, which I hope will result in a Bill being brought before the House and lead to the complete phasing out of the BBC television licence fee.

We have all heard about the effect of the licence fee on pensioners, people on fixed incomes, and so on. A counter-argument is that, because the licence fee would be reflected in the retail price index, pensioners would receive extra on their pensions each week from which they would be expected to meet the additional cost of the licence. In the real world it will not be like that. When it comes to paying the increased fee, pensioners will ask how they can pay for it out of their limited incomes. I sympathise with pensioners who live on fixed incomes and who are worried about this matter.

We should give all pensioner households a 5p licence, or do away with the licence. At the moment we fall between two stools. We say that the pensioner who lives in council-run sheltered accommodation is entitled to a 5p licence, whereas the pensioner who lives in a rented flat on his or her own, who probably has costs additional to those of the first one I mentioned, must pay the full licence fee.

There is one anomaly after another. Everything the Government do to try to resolve the matter leads to further anomalies, because the impact on the licence fee for everyone else if every pensioner could have a 5p licence would be so great that people would take to the streets to protest.

That is why my hon. Friends and most members of the public believe that we should eliminate the licence fee. We should not be content with half measures which lead to the problems we have had with dog licences, where the cost of collecting the fee becomes progressively a higher proportion of the revenue raised and people ask whether it is worth collecting. We should have a programme to phase out the licence fee.

If we could go to the people and say that in three, four or five years the licence fee would be eliminated, we would effectively be giving £1 per week extra to almost every householder to spend as he wished. That would be in accordance with Conservative philosophy and, I hope, with Government policy.

We know how people have been agonising recently about the £1 per week reduction in the increase in heating allowance. The Labour party spokesman on this issue is not prepared to say that phasing out the licence fee will give back £1 a week to householders.

In another article in The Spectator, Mr. Paul Johnson wrote about the "stone age BBC". He said:

"At present the BBC's obstinacy in accepting advertisements has no more foundation in reason and economics than Arthur Scargill's refusal to accept pit closures."

I agree with that. It is no doubt because the Labour party agrees with him that it is embracing the policy of repealing any proposals to introduce advertising into the BBC in the same supine way as it has been supporting Mr. Arthur Scargill.

I hope that, as a result of the debate, there will be a further debate before the BBC's licence fee increase application is approved. I hope, too, that the Government will introduce proposals for a one-year increase and a wide-scale public debate that will lead to the phasing out of the licence fee for ever.

6.15 am

Mr. Piers Merchant (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) on his initiative in bringing the debate before the House. My hon. Friend has demonstrated his acute sensitivity to popular concern. The fact that we are debating a matter of great concern to the public is borne out by press comment, public opinion surveys and letters received by many of my colleagues and me about the BBC, its financing and the proposed increases in licence fees.

The debate is extremely relevant and timely, because the BBC is mounting a campaign in support of its desire for a large increase in the licence fee. It is appropriate that we should have an early opportunity to discuss and consider the implications of the proposed increase before a decision is reached. The fact that the debate has been allowed to continue for three hours reflects the concern that is felt among hon. Members about the issue and their desire to express themselves and debate the principles involved.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on his contribution to the debate, the persuasiveness of his arguments and the general thrust of his contentions, which in general I strongly endorse. I endorse his remarks on the many good features of the BBC, its employees and its services. I have always found myself most courteously, fairly and fully treated by the BBC, and any criticism that I make of the system and its financing does not stem from a personal axe that I might wish to grind.

On the other hand, I must observe that the political nexus that the present financing system creates is one that runs to the detriment of both the BBC and Members of Parliament. The BBC rightly resents having to come almost on bended knee for increases in its revenue. I am sure that it would prefer a system where it was free of any possible political colouring and judgment. At the same time, I have heard colleagues say in private that they might not wish to be heard to be objecting too strongly to the BBC's request for a licence fee increase for fear that that might jeopardise their chances of being represented by the corporation. The political nexus bites both ways and I am sure that any means that was found to break free of it would be welcomed.

There is a strongly principled argument against any increase in the licence fee. I think especially of those of my constituents—a high proportion of them—who are unemployed, elderly or on low incomes. The ability to watch television is one of the few luxuries that they are able to afford. It might even be described as a necessity for those who have time on their hands and little to occupy it with. They have to pay for this "luxury" what is already a high rent when it is set against their income band.

The BBC is pressing a case to increase the licence fee to £65 a year, an increase of £19, or about 41 per cent. That would be an extremely large increase bearing in mind the present rate of inflation and increases in costs elsewhere. It is equivalent to a back-door tax increase of over 40p a week, which is considerable, and would be rightly condemned were it to fall in any other way.

I regard the proposal for an increase in the licence fee as quite unacceptable. After all, it is already a high enough hurdle to overcome to change from not having a television to having one. A family has to afford the capital cost of either buying the apparatus or entering into the rental agreement, and then has to pay an already large licence fee. To widen the gap between those who do not have and those who do have a television service would be iniquitous, but to load on to each year that extra payment, making a heavy annual cost, is unacceptable to the many people to whom television is so vital. They have no choice in any case over the cost of the service because, unlike virtually any other product, they cannot turn elsewhere to a competitive product and pay slightly less, perhaps for something of less quality, or even something of higher quality that offers a better bargain.

For the purposes of these arguments, I completely dismiss the suggestion that black and white television is in some sense an alternative to which one can subscribe at a lesser rate, for two reasons. The first is that it bears absolutely no relevance to the provision cost because, from the point of view of the corporation and others, it is exactly the same, whether the receiver happens to be black and white or colour. Secondly, these days, with the importance of the colour aspect of television acknowledged right throughout transmission, for someone to be expected to have to make do with black and white television is to reduce the quality of reception so far that it makes a mockery of the provision of the service.

There is also the aspect of the cost of the collection of the licence, which has been mentioned by many of my hon. Friends in the debate. The detection and collection cost is estimated by the BBC to be around 7 per cent. of the total cost of licence collection in the coming year, which is an enormous percentage if one compares it with alternative forms of taxation or revenue collection. The number of people that the BBC estimates are not at present in possession of a licence but are in possession of the facility to receive transmissions is around 1·5 million, despite the massive increase in detection facilities and warnings issued by advertising and other means, which the

[Mr. Piers Merchant]

BBC is wont to do from time to time. Nevertheless, that large figure is one that I fear will only increase if the licence fee goes up and the larger the increase in the licence fee, predictably, the larger the increase will be in the number of people attempting to get round paying.

The licence fee system has no link to usage of the service. It is not in any sense measured by the amount someone is prepared to listen to the BBC, which benefits from the revenue, as opposed to its independent competitors. I should like to refer now to linkage to use. It is of course a fact that many people might happily watch independent television and not the BBC, and listen to commercial radio, and not the BBC radio, and be quite happy with the provision that they get from the independent sector, yet still have to pay the full amount of the licence fee. They are effectively paying for nothing because they are not benefiting from or receiving the service paid for out of the licence revenue. They are using their equipment to pick up broadcasts that come from, and are funded from, entirely different sources.

There may also be people who do not receive television and do not pay a licence fee but who listen to BBC radio every hour of their waking day and even perhaps when they are asleep, and thus benefit from a service subsidised by the people watching independent television. The licence fee system is completely unmeasured, almost irrelevant, and bears no relation to actual use.

There have been dramatic changes in broadcasting and in communications generally in the past 20 years and there is no doubt that change will continue and indeed accelerate. I just about remember the days when the BBC had a complete monopoly as sole supplier of broadcasting. Some hon. Members' memories may go back even further. I certainly remember the days when one relaxed in the comforting arms of "Auntie" BBC knowing the standard of service that would be provided and regarding it as something sacrosanct that would never change.

Nevertheless, things changed and, although some horror was expressed before independent television and later commercial radio came on the air, both services have proved extremely popular as well as being free to the listener or viewer. Commercial radio was preceded by pirate radio—a sure sign if ever there was one that the market was cramped and unable to deal with the demand that had arisen. Were the fears of poor standards expressed before pirate radio became commercial radio ever justified? I believe that they clearly were not. In any case, what are absolute standards in broadcasting? I find myself questioning the whole concept, but I shall return to that later.

Far from being unpopular, both commercial radio and commercial television were highly popular and much desired. Far from hating the advertisements, as had been suggested, people liked them. According to a recent survey, about 77 per cent. of people actually enjoy watching or listening to the advertisements. As has been pointed out, there are added advantages—including the provision of a break in which one's spouse, of whatever sex, can make tea. The present system is an anachronism. The licence fee is no longer relevant, as it may once have been. Nor is the organisation of the BBC, to which the system is intimately related, ideal for the 1980s, let alone the 1990s and beyond.

Where do we go from here? First, we must look not to the past or the present but to the future and try to anticipate what will happen in broadcasting in general. I think that there will be massive changes. The BBC and broadcasting in general cannot resist direct broadcasting by satellite even if it wished to do so. There will also be competition from cable television. The BBC cannot resist more broadcasting. I have no doubt that in due course domestic viewers here will be able to pick up broadcasts from other countries and, probably via satellite, some of the main United States television channels which, as they broadcast in our language, would be immediately applicable to British audiences.

I do not doubt that before long we shall see the setting up of trans-national television, aiming not just at one country but at a number of countries. Channels such as the music and television network in the United States—which is the television equivalent of Radio 1 or some of the commercial radio stations—will inevitably catch on here sooner or later, and they could have trans-national applications. The BBC could not keep up with all those developments and corner all those markets, even assuming that it would wish to do so, which I do not believe that it would.

The BBC suffers from inherited problems. It suffers from having been an empire and also from the desire—almost the obligation—to participate in all the new applications and developments, because it always has done so in the past. As broadcasting moves into the future, the BBC always seems to want to fight its own Star Wars in the ether. One might more appropriately say that the empire is always wanting to strike back. From the days of VHF and stereo radio to those of the broader remit covering the production of its own films, records, music and video tapes, from the technical support side of television and radio to the second television channel, local radio, DBS and breakfast television—the BBC has shown an interest in everything that one can name, and tried to enter the field. I am sure that if the resources were available—the will would certainly be there—the BBC would like to launch its own satellites to provide for DBS.

A line must be drawn. There are fields that the BBC cannot reasonably enter, and things that it cannot afford to do. Inevitably, its share of the broadcasting market will slip. That cannot be helped. Whatever is done, it will attract less and less of the market. We will therefore find, if we maintain funding solely by licence, that the anomaly becomes greater and greater.

By asking for a huge licence increase this year, the BBC is, happily, opening the door to a complete review of its financial base and its structure. We should seize the opportunity to institute a timely reform of the whole provision of broadcasting by the BBC, in which we consider the broad issues of accountability and efficiency as well as financing.

Much has been done in the past few years with the telephone system. We need to open up broadcasting as widely as possible to competition, enterprise and freedom. By all means let us preserve the best of the BBC. I acknowledge that it has made great contribution to broadcasting and can contribute much in future. However, we should also give the viewers as many alternatives as possible and as fair a means of funding the various possibilities as can be provided.

One possible scenario would be very flexible. There would be a number of options that we could develop after having tested the water. In the first stage, there would be no increase in the licence fee in the foreseeable future, and permission would be granted to the BBC to bring in limited advertising, perhaps first on Radios 1 and 2 and BBC 1. Those measures could be accompanied by a measure to prevent the BBC developing into new areas and perhaps an encouragement to it to contract out many of its internal activities and limit the growth of ancillary areas.

In the second stage, we could envisage the selling off of Radio 1 and Radio 2, which are perhaps the least credible from the point of view of the BBC's historic purpose and maintenance of standards. Coupled with that, we could extend free licences to the 4·7 million pensioners. The third stage could involve the possible selling off or breaking down into separate organisations of BBC 1 and local radio or of BBC 2, Radio 3 and Radio 4 which, for the foreseeable future, should be kept as they are. They could be subsidised by a reduced licence and perhaps accept some advertising.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My hon. Friend said that he would extend a free licence to the 4 million pensioners. Why has he singled out pensioners — they do not demonstrate need as a category? What about other groups, such as the unemployed?

Mr. Merchant: These proposals have a great element of flexibility. I do not want to narrow the argument by saying that only one sector of the population should benefit from a reduction in licence fees. I chose pensioners because it can be argued that they are most dependent on television. Moreover, they have probably paid more than most in licence fees.

The BBC is a monolithic organisation which has expanded into areas such as breakfast television that could not have been imagined only a few years ago. It is an unaccountable organisation in many ways and it is certainly uncompetitive. Many of its attitudes are paternalistic and anachronistic. It follows what it believes people should see rather than what they demonstrate that they want to see.

We should not kid ourselves on the argument about standards. Standards are a subjective element. The BBC might think that it has the answer, but many others might not agree. Is the BBC that good? It argues that it offers the highest standard of broadcasting in the world, but many disagree. Close examination of the BBC and a comparison with the independent networks show that many independent programmes are of higher quality. The argument that only the BBC offers the highest standards is no longer sustainable. Does the introduction of advertising mean that there will be an automatic reduction in standards? I do not think so. Indeed, I believe that adverts would be welcomed and improve the service.

Paternalism in broadcasting might have been satisfactory in the 1920s, during the war years and perhaps in the austerity that immediately followed the war. The spirit of today's age revolts against paternalism, monopoly, duopoly and everything that goes with them. We should imagine what would happen if Fleet street or the magazine empire were run by a subsidised monopoly that was not open to the market. There would be an outcry. In the interests of plurality, quality and choice, there should be a major review of the licence system, the funding of the BBC and its structure. There should not be an increase in the licence fee but a move towards its decrease. Above all, this would clearly be in the interests of the consumer and would provide more and better services, as well as greater choice, at a lower cost.

This is a fitting time for a complete review and the institution of radical reforms in broadcasting, and I urge my hon. Friend the Minister of State to do all he can to achieve this in the near future.

6.40 am

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): I apologise to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) because I did not hear his opening remarks. However, I have listened with great interest to the contributions of others of my hon. Friends, and there is not a lot with which I would disagree. Indeed, I would positively agree with the vast amount of what I have heard, because the general feeling is that, before the BBC is able to obtain any extra increase in its licence fee, at the very least some kind of inquiry into the funding of the organisation should be undertaken before we commit ourselves to what, on the face of it, could be a very large increase.

The BBC seems to suffer from an ever-spiralling increase in running costs. Because of our busy life, many hon. Members are unable to see the programme diet that is dished up day by day and week by week. On the odd occasions when I have been at home on a Saturday or Sunday evening, snuggled up by the fireside with my wife, I have found that the last thing worth watching and indulging in is television. That applies equally to the commercial channels, but time stands still on the BBC on a Saturday evening. It is hard to tell one Saturday from another, because the same programmes are shown each week. There is a quiz show, with the same panel and almost the same contestants. There is also a female police soap opera—each channel has one—and probably an old American film which is being shown for the fourth or fifth time. That is followed by soccer, or that other hideous cult programme — snooker. It may be that such a diet is welcomed by the viewer, but it leads me to question where all the money goes.

Recently there has been a contest between the commercial and state sectors over breakfast television. I am not sure that the financial moguls at the BBC did their costings correctly on whether the corporation could afford breakfast television, but no one asked me, and many others like me, about whether we were prepared to watch it. Having said that, I should add that many hon. Members on both sides of the House seem to enjoy appearing on the programmes. Nevertheless, breakfast television has added a great deal to the cost of the BBC's budget.

That was emphasised only yesterday, when the corporation began attempts to retain one of its prominent female anchor women. A salary of about £80,000 a year has been proposed, but that is not for a five-day working week. It has suggested that that would be for working every other week. That strikes me as money very badly spent.

In the west midlands, the BBC's contribution—Radio WM — is a worthwhile operation and well worth listening to, but whether it fulfils a demand within the area, which is adequately covered by commercial radio, leaves something to be desired. In some of its programmes, both on television and on the radio network, there are grounds for economies, and probably grounds for withdrawing from a market that is best left to the commercial sector.

As was mentioned earlier, the increase in the television licence fee plays its part in the pension increase, but it never works out quite like that. Those on supplementary long-term pension arrangements have this year suffered a £1 reduction in their pension. The proposed increase of 40p or 45p per week will therefore swallow up about 25 per cent. of their pension increase. It is very hard for some pensioners to accept that.

Some kind of licence fee is needed. I do not believe that it should be phased out completely, to be replaced by commercial advertising. However, we ought to look more closely at the dividing line between black and white and colour television reception. Apart from the receiver, virtually the same equipment is needed. Years ago, when colour television was the in thing, it undoubtedly cost the television contractors a great deal more to provide colour television. However, the extra cost of transmitting colour television has long since been absorbed. Therefore, the justification for two kinds of licence fee no longer obtains.

It is also wrong that elderly people who have difficulty in finding the extra money for a colour television licence should have to put up with black and white television. First, we should consider bringing closer together the cost of black and white and colour television licences. There should at least be a reduced fee for a colour television licence. If we consider also the contribution that advertising might make, we should be moving towards overcoming some of the BBC's financial problems.

Revenue from advertising does not destroy the quality of programmes. There are many good commercial television programmes. There is no evidence to suggest that advertising has reduced the standard or quality of that kind of programme. In the early years of commercial television the contractors indulged in sponsored programmes. They fell by the wayside. They were not part and parcel of the operating requirements of commercial contractors. Some of the magazine programmes, consisting of a half-hour presentation of new products, left a great deal to be desired. But there is no reason why the "Look at Life" and programmes of that kind should not be sponsored by oil or pharmaceutical companies. It would be a very convenient and cheap way for commercial contractors and BBC television to get hold of high quality programmes at a generally low cost. It would result in the provision of cheaper programmes without necessarily having to resort to the other form of advertising—the interruption in the middle of a programme. There are other ways of presenting a commercial partnership between industry and commerce and broadcasting than blatant advertising through subsidised or sponsored programmes.

The challenge that the broadcasting companies face throughout the remainder of the century is daunting. With the advent of satellite and cable television, there will be a much wider choice for viewers. The result will be that they will watch fewer programmes of the contractors who now present them. If viewers are faced with the prospect of paying a great deal more for watching BBC, they will not resent so much having to pay the price for watching a minority channel.

We must grasp the nettle. The licence fee should be reduced and there should be only one category. We should also allow the BBC to introduce sponsored programmes and ask it to look again at its radio sector and introduce commercial sponsorship, at least on Radio 1 and local radio. Indeed, it should also consider selling local radio stations, perhaps to the existing managements.

The debate is timely and I look forward to some positive action.

6.50 am

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) for initiating this timely debate. I am sorry that I was not here for his speech, but I know that he examines competition closely and that he likes the smack of firm competition and cost-effectiveness. I look forward to reading his speech in Hansard.

I am also grateful that Mr. Speaker allowed three hours for the debate, which should serve as a curtain-raiser for a full debate in the House on the licence fee and the future financing of the BBC before any firm decision is taken about whether we retain the licence fee for another year. I do not think that we should keep it for more than one year. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office is to reply to the debate. I know that he is aware of the pressures of the market and no doubt he will show us some of his wisdom in these matters.

Although this time of the morning is fairly uncongenial and uncomfortable for us, it is an appropriate time to debate the BBC, because the range of BBC broadcasting at this time of the day shows how the corporation seems to be trying to cut its own throat. The highest pressure is put on the listener and viewer by Radio 1, Radio 2, Radio 3, Radio 4 and breakfast television. They all compete fiercely for the captive audiences in British households and among people driving to work. There is further competition from the BBC's local radio stations. In some areas, two such stations overlap. That is an excessive coverage by the BBC.

We are moving into an era of new developments in broadcasting. The BBC has stated adamantly that it wants 50 per cent. of direct broadcasting by satellite. I believe that it would be acceptable for the BBC to have one third of DBS, with one third going to independent broadcasters and the remaining one third going to the commercial world in general. Nevertheless the BBC wishes to grab an excessive slice of the action there.

Then we have cable television—the new development for which the House legislated during the last Session. Again, that will put heavy pressure on the broadcasting world. Finally, there is the argument now for much more community local radio, with low-powered transmitters spread over a wide area of the country. The community is asking for true local stations, and that will once again increase the amount of broadcasting in Britain.

Those great developments are going on, and so it is wholly appropriate that we should now look afresh at where the BBC stands within the broadcasting world. How is the BBC to be financed? My hon. Friends have very adequately covered the main suggestion, which is that it should move towards some advertising. From what I have heard and read, and from programmes in which I have been involved during the past few weeks, I understand that to put it mildly, the BBC is running scared from the idea of any advertising on its networks.

The BBC's worry is wholly unfounded. It is argued that the quality of broadcasting will be reduced as a result of advertising, but that is arrogance on the part of the BBC. Who would suggest that the programmes of independent television are of an inferior quality to those put out by the BBC? The truth is that all too often people tell us that independent television news — which is only part of independent television's output — is of a higher quality than that of the BBC. There can be no question but that the current affairs programmes and much of the entertainment put out by independent television are of a quality that is certainly equal to that seen on BBC.

Advertising already exists on the BBC. How many times do we sit in front of our television sets watching the BBC advertise the Radio Times, The Listener, BBC books, BBC video and radio tapes, not to mention BBC programmes? Indeed, great chunks of trailer material are put on at the junction of programmes. The British public are now perfectly accustomed to such advertising. It is advertising, although it is not paid commercial advertising. The British public are quite used to seeing that, and it would not think it unusual if commercial advertising was introduced into the same spaces between programmes or in the middle of them. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant) said, the polls and surveys show that many people find the advertisements carried on independent television highly acceptable productions, which are of a very high quality in terms of film work and general production. There is no harm in looking further at such advertising and at that sort of British standard of advertising on the BBC.

We are always being told that we shall get the standards of American trans-Atlantic television if we introduce such advertising. The same applies to trans-Atlantic radio. I do not believe that that will be the case.

As a former broadcaster, I have heard a great deal of that sort of thing from the other side of the Atlantic. Britain's broadcasting standards are now so firmly based that we are never likely to move to the constant churning out of commercials in the middle of a programme. We shall not have the experience which one so often has on the other side of the Atlantic.

I do not wish to delay the House, because all hon. Members wish to hear the Opposition's response, although they amount to only one Member at the moment. I beg your pardon, Mr. Deputy Speaker, it has just become two. Reinforcements have arrived. In addition, the House will wish to hear the response from the Home Office.

As I said at the beginning, the debate should simply be a curtain-raiser for a major debate on the matter before we proceed further. There is much worry, particularly in the minds of pensioners — I have many of those in my constituency — about the prospect of a £65 licence fee for a further three years. There is a worry about how much higher the figure will go. With the constant wish of the BBC to expand its empire, who knows where the BBC licence fee will go? At what point will it reach £100 a year and at what point will it go even higher? The problem cannot simply be tackled by the suggestions of some of my hon. Friends that we should move to curtail the activities of the BBC. This is the moment for a much more radical look at the financing of the BBC.

My hon. Friend the Minister may wish to know, if he does not already, that there are many producers and directors in the BBC who also wish that to happen. Let him not hold the idea that people within the corporation necessarily want to see the licence fee continued in Britain. They believe that for perhaps too long now resources have been tight because of the format of the licence fee. They would wish, in terms of some of the technological developments and in terms of their productions, to be able to see that the BBC's finance is on a truly competitive basis with the independent networks. If the Home Office is prepared to grasp that nettle and to have full discussion with hon. Members and with the wider public about the future financing of the BBC that will be welcome indeed.

I urge my hon. Friend, if he and his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary feels that the time is too short to move to something new within the next few months — I would understand that — to move to no more than one year of licence fees for the BBC. If the rumours of the £55 charge for the coming year are correct, that may be about right. At that point I would say to my hon. Friend that a full debate must take place in the House and among the public about the future.

7.4 am

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): I join hon. Gentlemen in congratulating the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) on being fortunate enough to win the lottery for this debate, and on initiating an interesting, though albeit one-sided, debate on an extremely important subject. It is a pity that he spoiled his case by degenerating in part of his speech to a generalised attack on the British Broadcasting Corporation. A hostility to the BBC was shown overtly in some cases and implicitly in all the speeches from Conservative Members. Hon. Gentlemen also showed envy and jealousy at some of the salaries being earned by technicians, directors and performers.

The debate was obviously triggered by the BBC's application for an increase in the licence fee for the next three years, and by the report of the media policy group of the Institute of Practitioners in Advertising, which contains proposals to allow advertising on all BBC, radio and television channels. Clearly it has a sharp eye to its narrow self-interest and little thought for the needs of the BBC, ITV or viewers.

We are implacably and fundamentally opposed to the introduction of advertising on BBC radio and television. The introduction of advertising would damage the BBC, the ITV companies, local commercial radio and local provincial newspapers. Most important, it would substantially erode the standards of the BBC and ITV. If advertising were carried, some programme makers and schedulers would inevitably think — even if only unconsciously — that they had an obligation to those who were paying for the programmes and financially supporting advertising. That will affect the output and style——

Mr. Maude rose——

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: I cannot give way. I am the only Opposition Member to speak and I have a great deal to say in what has been a one-sided debate. The hon. Gentleman and several of his hon. Friends spoke for a considerable time — indeed, far longer than I or the Minister will have to speak. I should like to give way and participate in debate, but hon. Gentlemen have prevented that.

The institution of advertising would also mean, the bigger the audience, the larger the income. Therefore, there would inevitably be pressure on broadcasters for high-rating programmes that attract the largest possible audiences and, therefore, the greatest income. We would have a constant diet of pap, such as Blankety Blank, which was derided by the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth), chat shows, and quiz programmes. They may be good of their kind and right in their place, but they are not the appropriate constant diet. We would be reduced to the appalling and abysmal level of television in the United States. The advent of advertising on the BBC would destroy public service broadcasting, of which the Labour party is rightly proud, and which is the envy of the rest of the world. We seek to protect the integrity of broadcasting, and not to destroy it through the introduction of advertising.

We cannot accept that there should be advertising on one part of the BBC or for a limited period during the day. To introduce any sort of advertising would be to embark on a dangerous slippery slope. It would provide a temptation for future Governments, when confronted with proposals from the BBC for an increase in the licence revenue, take the easy option and extend the range of advertising on the BBC.

Moreover, it is not merely the BBC's standards that are likely to be damaged. As many observers testify, there would be a struggle between the BBC and the independent television companies for what they say is a limited cake. I know that Conservative Members say that that is not the case, but it is a matter of judgment and belief.

On my side of the argument—Conservative Members have other evidence to adduce on their behalf—is the letter to The Times on 8 December 1984 from the chairman of Granada Television, Denis Forman. He says:

"All experienced broadcasters know that the introduction of advertising on BBC television is bound to lead to a struggle for revenue since there is not enough available to support more than one of the two major broadcasting systems . . . If the BBC were to have only five minutes of advertising each evening"—

more than one Conservative Member this evening has proposed something similar to that, implicitly recognising that there is something slightly disreputable about having advertising throughout the normal schedule—

"the result could be a drop of £110 million in the annual revenue of ITV. The profits of the ITV system in the last year were less than £100 million before levy and tax."

Of course, Mr. Forman has a vested interest, but he makes an important point. I would not have thought that Conservative Members would wish to damage ITV, just as they would not wish to damage the BBC. The Opposition would not wish to take steps to damage either.

Such remarks do not come only from those who have a vested interest in protecting the monopoly of the independent stations. The hon. Member for Hertfordshire, West quoted Mr. Rodney Harris, the media director of the advertising agency that is largely responsible for the current debate, D'Arcy MacManus and Masius. However, he did not quote all Mr. Harris's statement. He said, in the document provided to all Members of Parliament by the BBC:

"Not everyone has appreciated that if the BBC went commercial tomorrow and sold advertising at six minutes per hour of total broadcasting, as on ITV, that the ITV companies would all go bankrupt the day after tomorrow. Quite simply there is not enough advertising money to fund all UK broadcasting."

He was quoted by several Conservative Members in support of their case for advertising, and it ill becomes them to deride his judgment and his knowledge when I quote him in support of my case.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: I also quoted the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), but that does not mean that I agree with everything he says. People can be right in some places and wrong in others. That applies to Mr. Harris. It was an extreme case.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: I do not quarrel with the hon. Gentleman. All that I am saying is that the introduction of advertising on the BBC would damage it. I also believe that it would damage the ITV companies. My belief—[Interruption.] I listened courteously to Conservative Members; I hope that they will extend similar courtesy to me. My assertion was based on the evidence produced by Rodney Harris and others. It is a belief; none of us could prove it one way or the other. The potential benefits, if there are any, of advertising on BBC television are outweighed by the potential dangers that I mentioned.

Not only Rodney Harris and Denis Forman, but Saatchi and Saatchi make my case for me. The latter's report, "Funding the BBC — The Case for Allowing Advertising", stated:

"The threat to radio is much more complex to define"—

I acknowledge that—

"but it can be said with some certainty . . . that there is a risk to ILR that might pose problems to the financial viability of some stations."

It is no more and no less than a risk, although it must be taken into account. To a large extent, it is irrelevant whether the onset of advertising on the BBC would damage the independent television companies, would ensue that there is a struggle for less advertising revenue, or would damage independent commercial radio and local newspapers. There are important additional considerations, but even if that argument could be sustained, we would still resort to the argument of principle that it is inappropriate and would be damaging to the best interests of public service broadcasting.

Nor is the suggestion appropriate that the BBC's revenue should be raised through taxation. It is superficially a much more attractive method because it is more simple, and less painful, and the cost would be less direct to the individual viewer. A progressive system of taxation is more fair than the licence fee, which is a regressive system that hits hardest those who are poor.

Mr. Maude rose——

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: I have already said why I cannot give way.

There are great dangers to the BBC in a taxation system of funding. Inevitably, it would quite properly be subject to Treasury control, and to scrutiny of its internal accounting system and policy decisions. It would be subject to Home Office accountability for expenditure on a detailed day-to-day basis. Once it is subject to Treasury and Home Office accountability, hon. Members would quite properly wish to subject it to parliamentary accountability, for instance on the efficacy of its programmes and particular stations. We might have a view as to whether particular stations should be closed. That is a dangerous road for any Government to go down, and no Government of either party have so far been prepared to tread it.

This has not been mentioned in the debate tonight, but in previous exchanges in the House, both at Question Time and in other debates, it has been pointed out that the universities have managed to retain their independence while being funded, through the University Grants Committee, by the Government. However, a great deal of the autonomy and independence of universities has been eroded, not least by the actions of this Government.

Therefore, we are left with the licence as the best, most appropriate and most sensible means of raising the revenue for the BBC. It is right that the Government should have to determine the overall level of licensing. Every hon. Member must know that this is an important and sensitive issue, and it is right and proper that the decision on the level of the licence should be a political one determined by the Government. They have the responsibility to determine the overall budget that they are prepared to provide to the BBC. They have to decide what is reasonable and appropriate in the economic circumstances of a given time, and match that to the needs of the BBC.

Mr. Chope: What does the hon. Gentleman think is the right level for the new licence fee?

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: The hon. Gentleman should not be silly. If he thinks that such a question will embarrass me or catch me out, he is being both naive and absurd, which can perhaps be accounted for by the lateness of the hour at which we are debating this issue.

Having made those decisions, the Government may decide on a figure that the BBC feels is not enough. However, it can then supply its own competing priorities in terms of programmes, capital and current investment, and it can determine its own functions. For example, it can decide whether it wishes to continue breakfast television or embark on more ambitious programmes for local radio. That is properly a matter that should be left to the BBC within the confines of the overall financial strategy determined by the Government in allocating the licence. I prefer the BBC to be more selective in its functions, and to aspire to more excellence rather than to cover the whole sector. However, I resist the suggestion that that should be anything other than a matter for the BBC to decide.

The BBC has suggested that the licence fee be increased to £65, pegged for three years, to April 1988. I accept that that is, as Alasdair Milne, the BBC's director-general, said in his submission to Members of Parliament, the best bargain in Britain. No doubt it is, but the problem is that we cannot always afford bargains. I wish that we could. The fee may well prove to be a bargain, but at that price it may not be a bargain that we can afford or that the country can afford to pay.

As the BBC says in its thoroughly researched, well-presented submission to the Home Secretary and hon. Members in general, the fee may be good value. Clearly, the annual cost of a licence is good value, using the BBC's basis for the increase — making the licence fee equivalent to the cost of buying a pint of milk or a newspaper a day, or buying 20 cigarettes a week. I do not believe that any hon. Member would dissent from the suggestion that we obtain more impartial information and entertainment in a day from the BBC, in its various forms, than from the Daily Mail, the Daily Telegraph or the Daily Express. And the cost is equivalent.

The price suggested by the BBC may be reasonable in terms of what the BBC wants to do and can provide. We must accept that it is a great deal of money for all households, particularly the poor. There may be a case for saying that the BBC should not get all it wants at this time. There needs to be a much more thorough analysis of the proposal for an increase and a far more balanced debate on the BBC's future financing.

The Opposition do not want an erosion of the way in which the BBC is financed and retains its independence, but we should like more time to consider whether it is appropriate to fund the BBC to the extent it requests. We are especially concerned, as some Conservative Members said, about the effect of the increased fee on low income groups, particularly pensioners. At whatever level, the BBC licence represents a high proportion of the income of 7 million pensioner households. I believe that every hon. Member realises that the BBC's proposal has already led to a great deal of controversy and a great outcry from pensioners. I have received their complaints in my mailbag and pensioners have turned up at my surgery to discuss the matter.

Pensioners are extremely anxious and deeply distressed about their ability to raise the money required. Many already find it difficult to find sufficient funds to pay the present licence, without having to go without other necessities. Many pensioners are heavily dependent on television. Many are housebound and inactive, and a considerable proportion are ill. As the BBC points out, pensioners watch 20 per cent. more television than other viewers. Clearly, it is unjust that some pensioners should have to pay a full licence fee when others, who are also pensioners, live through no fault of their own in sheltered housing where they receive a concession and pay no more than a 5p licence fee.

This is a great cause of resentment and bitterness among pensioners. They point out that they will have to pay the new licence fee of £65, while hotels will pay the same fee for 15 sets and a standard fee for every five additional sets. It is clearly wrong, unacceptable and indefensible, as I am sure every Government Member who has participated in this debate would say, for the Savoy to have free television sets in its rooms while pensioners in my constituency—in Stockbridge village, Contril farm and Prescot—on Merseyside generally or anywhere else in the country would have to pay a full fee. That has always been unjust and inequitable, so it is important that I renew and reaffirm the Opposition's commitment to enable all pensioners to have free television licences. One of the first acts of the next Labour Government, if elected after the next general election, will be to ensure that our pensioners no longer have to suffer the anxiety and distress of finding large slices of their income to view what they regard as a social necessity. Instead, they will all be able to watch television relieved of that burden and in the knowledge that they will receive licences free as of right.

The Opposition's aim is to preserve the BBC's integrity and standards and to enhance the quality of life and the incomes of our pensioners. It is also to preserve the BBC's political independence. That clearly is and has been under threat from the Government.

The Prime Minister, not least, has been leading the way in attempting to threaten, cajole, bully and impose pressure on the BBC to influence its choice of programmes and scheduling. The Prime Minister above all should be the guardian of the integrity, impartiality and political independence of our major public service broadcasting corporation. Instead, she has exhibited a narrow-minded parochialism and a hostility, manifested also by many of her hon. Friends tonight, towards the BBC, and has attempted overtly to exert pressure on programme makers and schedulers. That is unacceptable, unprecedented and indefensible.

Much worse than that has been the recent disgraceful and inexcusable display of threatening petulance exhibited by the chairman of the Conservative party, the Paymaster General. He, as hon. Members will recall, complained about a "Panorama" programme about the Conservative party and alleged Right-wing infiltration. In The Times of 13 February 1984 he is quoted as saying that the "Panorama" programme

"alleged links between Conservative MPs and extreme right wing groups"—

and

"contained smears and innuendoes and used undemocratic techniques."

He went on to say it contained

"outrageous sentiments . . . guilt by association and McCarthyite comment."

He gave a warning that

"very serious action would have to be taken."

That report goes on to refer to the chairman of the Conservative party and the Chief Whip requesting a meeting with the director-general to protest about that programme.

We then had a saga of petulant, hysterical bullying of the BBC and its officials by the chairman of the Conservative party over that programme. He made several substantial allegations which the director-general spent two days going through, every one of which was found not to be substantiated. To this day, those apparent McCarthyite smears, innuendoes and undemocratic techniques have not led to one official complaint from the chairman of the Conservative party, the Chief Whip or any Conservative Member to the Broadcasting Complaints Commission. The threat of it was reported in The Times of 17 March, but as of 31 March not one complaint had been received by the Broadcasting Complaints Commission. There may well have been things wrong with that programme——

Mr. Maude: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It should be brought to the attention of the House that the programme to which the hon. Gentleman is referring is the subject of legal action. It is inappropriate for the hon. Gentleman to refer to it in this detailed and lengthy way, as it is sub judice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I understand the position to be that if a date has been set down for legal proceedings the matter is sub judice and should not be referred to. The Chair does not know the exact position of the proceedings. It might be as well if the hon. Member were to avoid referring to cases.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: Like you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am well aware of the sub judice rules in the House. As the hon. Gentleman should know, given his legal background, no cases are before the courts at the moment and none are set down; nor have I spoken about any hon. Member who is involved in a case. In any event, when we are talking as we are today about a matter of great public interest, it is proper and appropriate for Parliament to comment properly on the issues while not in any way derogating from the need to comply with the sub judice rule. I think that I have done that. If the hon. Gentleman had paid a little more attention to what I was saying, he would have acknowledged that.

We saw a deliberate, sustained and premeditated campaign to put pressure on the BBC on the content of its political programmes. If there were features of the programme which needed to be complained about, that should have been done through the civil courts, as the hon. Gentleman says is being done, or through the proper complaints procedure of the BBC. A Minister should not, aided and abetted by the Government Chief Whip, have been browbeating the director-general of the BBC. No doubt the Minister threatened that, if proper amends were not made, the BBC's application for a licence fee increase would not receive the same sympathy and consideration that would otherwise have been offered.

It is ironic that all the information for the programme which was the subject of complaint emanated from the young Conservatives. It was the act of a political pipsqueak, as I think the Minister was called. He acted in a petulant, bullying, intimidatory and little-Hitler fashion. It is an example of the threat that the Government pose to the BBC and to standards in public life. It was an offensive and unwarranted smear on the impartiality——

Mr. Maude: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is a debate about the funding of the BBC. Save that the hon. Gentleman is referring in the most indirect and oblique way to the BBC, I submit that his remarks are entirely out of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am listening carefully to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk). What he has said so far has not been out of order.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. Maude) should be aware that his interventions are taking time from the Minister's reply, which we all want to hear.

As I was saying, the Minister cast an offensive and unwarranted smear on the integrity, political impartiality and independence of the BBC. It was an attempt to intimidate the BBC and to cause it to cower.

We are debating the funding of the BBC and its application for an increase in the licence fee, and thus its funding, in the context of a Government who do not have the best record as a protector of individual civil liberties or of our public services. If the Government can attack democratically elected local authorities, to the great dismay and concern of Conservative Members and of those in another place, if they can attack the long-established democratic rights of voluntary organisations such as trade unions, if they can erode the academic freedom and independence of our universities and other institutions of higher education, and if they can display, as the Prime Minister and the chairman of the Conservative party have, outright prejudice, bias and hostility to the BBC, we must all of us be on our guard against any of their attempts to undermine the financial independence and political integrity of the British Broadcasting Corporation.

The Opposition wish to protect the standards of the BBC and its enviable record from the philistinism exhibited on Conservative Benches. We wish to protect the BBC from the greed and avarice that seems to motivate Conservative Members and retain public service broadcasting and all that it means for standards in Britain in future.

7.34 am

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Does the Minister of State have leave to speak again?

Mr. Shaw: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am grateful to you for your timely reminder and for offering me the opportunity to speak again.

I am in a pretty foul temper, having heard an outrageous contribution from the Opposition Front Bench. It was within order, but it was certainly not within courtesy or the practice of the House. The contribution by the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk), on a most important issue, more or less boils down to the fact that the Opposition are prepared to offer pensioners free television licences at a cost of £250 million on present bases, thus at a stroke removing about one third of the BBC's total annual income. That was a farcical statement, with no suggestion of where the money is to come from. We learnt just two things—first, that there will be not a penny piece from advertising and, secondly, that there will be no taxation. That is what the hon. Gentleman said. It is, therefore, an outrageous, unwarranted and completely unjustified statement of pseudo-policy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) introduced a debate of great importance, and his speech was followed by contributions of the highest standing from Conservative Members. I have to say to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North that it is noticeable that throughout the debate he has had massive support on the Opposition Benches for the issues of the day. His hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) has been a considerable attender—I have to grant him that —but I think that he is probably picketing his way into the next debate by obtaining a seat in good time.

My hon. Friends the Members for Hertfordshire, West, for Warwickshire, North (Mr. Maude), for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth), for Southampton, Itchin (Mr. Chope), for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant) for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) and for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) offered constructive contributions to the issue of financing the BBC, and, be it noted, most of them were, as I would expect from the Conservative party, reforming and radical contributions contrasted with the total absence of any contribution of a reforming or radical nature from the Labour party, which has so long sought to claim the monopoly on change.

We on Conservative Benches are able to discuss change, progress and the future of our great institutions in a rational and energetic way. That is the profound impression that I trust will be written into the pages of Hansard and observed by those outside the confines of the debate who most assuredly will look to what is being discussed here.

Therefore, I thank my hon. Friends for their contributions. I shall make an immediate response on one or two issues. My hon. Friend the Member for Stirling referred to licence evasion and the way in which the courts were handling it. He was right to say that the court system is concerned purely with the fine, not with refunding to the corporation a chunk of the licence fee forgone. As my hon. Friend probably knows, licence evasion entails a maximum fine of £400, but every time someone is brought before the courts, the corporation identifies someone who does not have a licence, so the licence fee will be recovered from the individual. Therefore, there is some recovery of licence income.

My hon. Friend rightly put his finger on the actual amount of evasion that takes place. In the discussion about funding the corporation and the licence fee, my hon. Friends should bear in mind that television is very widespread—97 per cent. of homes have a television receiver, and it is the receiver that constitutes the right to charge for a licence.

About 1·6 million homes are currently not paying the television licence fee, which means that the corporation forgoes—admittedly against its entire efforts—income of about £60 million on licence evasion alone. It may be only 8 per cent. of the homes in question; nevertheless, it represents a significant licence income forgone.

My hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire, North referred several times to the compulsory levy. If that meant that everybody paid, today we might be discussing not a massive increase in the licence fee but a reduction. I make that point in parentheses to comment on the observations of my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling, and merely say that there is a very large sum of money around in the licence fee application and that those who do not pay are creating a substantial problem in relation not only to the funding of the corporation but to what other contributors may have to pay to make BBC funding sufficient.

The main issues in the debate clearly revolved round other forms of funding than licence fees. The most prevalent argument was for advertising, although I noted with interest that my hon. Friends' views varied from those who said that it should be limited to television or radio in minutes or by types of programme to those who believed that it should be widespread and completely fund the corporation. Thus, there is a gradation of view as to where the corporation might look if it were seeking advertising revenue.

I note, too, the interesting point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton about sponsorship of programmes, suggesting that there are other forms of contribution from the commercial sector than spot advertising.

In the remaining minutes, my task is to set out the position as I now see it. As my hon. Friends know, the licence fee has existed for about 60 years, originally covering both television and radio. The system has stood the test of time under successive Governments as well as a fair amount of inquiry by various bodies examining the corporation and its funding—the most recent being the Annan report of 1977. But every Government and every inquiry concluded that the licence fee system was the best available means of financing the BBC in such a way as to preserve its independence and to enable it to fulfil its wide-ranging obligations of public service broadcasting. Those obligations are imposed by royal charter, licence and agreement, so any change would involve a major shift not in legislative structure but in the structure on which the corporation is now run.

There is a great variety of view as to whether the output of the corporation on radio or otherwise suits the public taste. Nevertheless, we have to conclude that over a long period the licence system has provided a major increase in broadcasting and programme provision and, broadly speaking, a very high level of public acceptability.

Alternatives start with taxation. I am glad that the hon. Member for Knowsley, North made a stand on this and said that no Government of whom he was a member would be involved in direct taxation for corporation funding because that would clearly bring the corporation much further into Government control and influence, almost on an annual basis. I am sure that the whole House is anxious to avoid that. I should say at once that the Government do not regard taxation as a suitable way of replacing the existing system.

Advertising is the most frequently argued solution that would be acceptable. It is argued that a limited injection of advertising revenue would reduce or at least avoid any increase in the present licence fee and at the same time provide the corporation with sufficient funding to compete with ITV on more or less equal terms. It is suggested that the amount of advertising revenue could be stepped up each year, so that the fee could be reduced in real terms and perhaps eventually become just a nominal amount or even disappear altogether. That is certainly a very tempting proposition and it merits close scrutiny.

A further factor would be a view about total advertising revenue and availability and whether that would increase at a sufficient rate to allow the corporation to be funded in that way. Having been involved in these matters from time to time in an earlier career, I must point out that the line between fast and famine in the margarine advertising business is not all that thick. Certainly, there are swings and roundabouts which can operate very quickly indeed. It is by no means certain that advertising revenue will continue to grow at the same rate as in the past 10 years. In fact, ITV revenue this year looks certain to fall short of the £1,000 million forecast for 1984, even though only two or three months ago it seemed likely to reach that figure. As some of my hon. Friends will know, there has been a sharp downturn in revenue in the past two and a half months. ITV is not the only consumer of advertising revenue. Consumption is widely spaced across newspapers and other media.

There would have to be a real reliance upon advertising revenue to supply sufficient funds for the corporation. If advertising were to be introduced into BBC programmes, it would have to be done gradually, with the licence fee revenue remaining the major part of the corporation's income for some time.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Has my hon. Friend noticed that the effect of Channel 4 entering the market—although the same arguments were used in that case—has been substantially to reduce the production costs of advertisements, which in some cases represent the bulk of the cost of running an advertising programme? By reducing the price, one can increase the supply.

Mr. Shaw: Yes, I have noticed that there has been little deterrent effect as yet; but my hon. Friend will know that the average viewership of Channel 4 is about 6 per cent. If that percentage were to increase to a level that was seriously competitive with other ITV channels, the question whether it would draw away more costs from the advertising pool would become relevant.

There are problems connected with how advertising could be introduced. At present the licence revenue income, at about £770 million a year, is very substantial. Any replacement for it would have to be of a comparable size and ability to grow. Expenditure in the current financial year—the last of the licence fee settlement—is greater than the licence fee income. The cost to the BBC of providing television and radio services is expected to be about £70 million more than the licence fee income this year. So, with a modest allowance for increased costs in 1984-85, the BBC would probably need £100 million more than the present licence fee produces in order to maintain services at the present level. Such a sum could not be generated by, say, one 15-second advertisement on television each hour. It represents between 10 and 15 per cent. of ITV's total advertising revenue. If, as seems likely, competition between ITV and the BBC for that revenue were to drive down advertising rates—my hon. Friends might wish that to happen, because there has been insufficient competition between ITV companies hitherto—competition would oblige the BBC to take more advertising to bring in the necessary revenue.

Another suggestion is that the BBC might take advertising on only some of its services. Radio 1 is often singled out as a service that would be suitable. The cost of providing Radio 1 is about 2 per cent. of the BBC's total expenditure. The saving on each licence under such an arrangement would be about £1. Advertising on the whole of BBC radio might double that saving, but the area is not of the same order of magnitude as other areas mentioned by my hon. Friends.

I have already considered whether there is enough advertising revenue to fund the BBC. Another consideration is whether viewers would find advertising acceptable. My hon. Friends can point to the rapid and healthy development of ITV, which suggests that advertising has not been a bar to growth. Much of the advertising material produced is of a very high—indeed, almost entertaining—quality. I was somewhat worried when my hon. Friends talked of urging their spouses to put on the kettle in the commercial breaks. That would have a serious effect on audiences.

I am not ruling out advertising for all time as a source or partial source of finance. The BBC's licence agreement has for years recognised the possibility, provided that the Home Secretary agreed. My purpose has been to point out some of the difficult issues that must be faced and to demonstrate that a decision on advertising is neither straightforward nor simple.

Advertising deserves the most careful debate and decision. That is why we have made it clear that the Government do not want any radical departure from the licence fee system for BBC finance at this stage. My hon. Friends have also made their views clear. They want a review of the three-year system and the licence not to be committed for that time so that such a review can take place. I note that that is the message that my hon. Friends want to lay before the House and the Government.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is considering the BBC's application, so my response is therefore inevitably somewhat delphic. He will take what my hon. Friends have said as an expression of important opinion.

There are other problems. Efficiency has been mentioned. I assure my hon. Friends that, at the request of my right hon. Friend, the corporation has commissioned an independent consultant's report on its efficiency. It will be completed in January and will be a crucial part of the submission that has now been met. Thus, the view that some of the costs, staffing levels and exigencies in programming that have been incurred should be put under careful scrutiny. That guarantee I can give in the assessment of the current application.

There is no easy solution to the problem of financing. Hon. Members have made it clear that, because the proposed increase is so considerable, the time is right to examine the proposal and the context in which it is put —how to sustain a level of funding which continues to allow the corporation to provide a range of programming which gives value for money by comparison with other media and a high standard of programming which has underpinned the BBC's reputation as one of the finest broadcasting systems in the world.

Maltby Common

7.51 am

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I am pleased to have the opportunity to bring to the House the issue concerning the ownership of Maltby far and low common. The Department of the Environment is deciding whether to allow a limitation order to limit access to freedom of air and exercise for commoners in the village, who have enjoyed that right for perhaps 500 years.

The limitation order was introduced by section 193 of the Law of Property Act 1925. There was a public inquiry in Maltby from 30 November to 3 December 1982 and I was one of the objectors. I had no idea that I should speak on the outcome of the inquiry as the hon. Member who represents Maltby. Many months later I was selected to fight the Rother Valley constituency, which I am proud to represent.

My stance has not changed. The first planning application to Rotherham metropolitan borough council was made by the Earl of Scarbrough for part of a golf course. The original plan was to use 38.5 acres of the 52.5 acres of Maltby far and low common. It was clear that the application was unlikely to be accepted as the site is one of special scientific interest and has been designated by a Yorkshire naturalists' trust as one where no buildings can be erected and to which people do not have the right of air and exercise, as would be normal on common land. The revised plan on which the inquiry was held proposed that 16.5 acres be taken from Malby far and low common to complete a golf course to be run by Sandbeck Golf and Country Club Ltd., a private company composed of a few business men. The idea was that the Earl of Scarbrough should use parts of Maltby common to complete an 18-hole golf course.

Another golf course is needed in my constituency. I earnestly hope that one will be built in that area, as it would provide a facility for my constituents and people in surrounding constituencies. But I object to the idea that the Earl of Scarbrough should take 16·5 acres from Maltby common to complete his golf course, when he has right of access to between 2,000 to 3,000 acres of land which he owns. The 20,000 inhabitants of Maltby have the right to use 114 acres in total for air and exercise, and even that amount is restricted because some of it comprises sports grounds owned by collieries and local authorities.

Although the limitation order affects only two commons, Maltby common is one of four and comprises about 76 acres. For that reason, 16·5 acres of this land should not be handed over to Sandbeck Golf and Country Club Ltd., by the Earl of Scarbrough and taken away from the people of Maltby.

I have sought this debate to discuss the specific question of ownership. I do not intend to go into detail about the limitation order, or into the many aspects of the report of the inspector, a solicitor appointed by the Department of the Environment to carry out the public inquiry. However, some aspects are important. The public inquiry was originally held in Maltby civic centre, but within minutes it was realised that the room could not hold the number of people wishing to attend. As a result, it was suspended for several hours and re-opened in the Methodist church hall, which could hold a sizeable audience.

The question of ownership was raised early in the proceedings and, indeed, had been raised publicly on numerous occasions. The issue was whether the Earl of Scarbrough owned Maltby far and low commons. He claimed ownership on the basis that they were manorial wastelands, and that as lord of the manor of Maltby he owned them.

At that time, the inquiry inspector accepted that claim, and in paragraph 152 of his report he talked about specific evidence to show whether the Earl of Scarbrough was the owner. He commented on the tithe commutation agreement of 1839, and said there was some doubt about who was the lord of the manor when an Earl Fitzwilliam had signed the tithe commutation agreement. He said he could not believe that if it was incorrect that the Earl of Scarbrough was lord of the manor.

"it would not have been challenged immediately by the rightful Lord, whoever he might be".

Straight away the inspector jumped to an assumption that, because there was a common land order, and because a noble lord who was a big landowner lived nearby, any land had to have a rightful owner. I submit that that is not necessarily so. It does not mean that anybody has to be the lord of Maltby far and low common or the lord of the manor of Maltby.

The lord of the manor system is based upon feudal law. The feudal system was introduced into this country by Duke William of Normandy, following the invasion and conquest of England. The manor was the basic unit of local government and administration, not land ownership. It is necessary to stress this point as the Norman earls were great land thieves. Their propensity for theft and squabbling over land has continued to this day.

In return for their services the earls were granted manors and other portions of lands by Duke William. Subject to swearing fealty to the Crown and leaving a sufficiency for others, who could be either free people or various kinds of serfs, the remainder of the profits which could be accrued from the land and administration of the manor would be enjoyed by the lords of the manors which they respectively held.

But the lords never actually owned the land. They just held it and enjoyed the profits so long as they lived. If, in turn, the lords of the manors allowed somebody to occupy land, this was only for the duration of the feoffee's life. If on death they wished to pass on their tenancy to somebody else they had to hand back the land to the lord of the manor and pay a fine for the privilege of so doing. The person who wished to take over the tenancy could do so only by payment of a fine to the lord of the manor. Subject to swearing fealty, and so on, this transference of tenancy was not by right but only by the will and acceptance of the lord of the manor.

Similarly, the lord of the manor held the manor only during his lifetime. On death, the manor reverted to the Crown. Only by swearing fealty, and so on, were the manors then bestowed on their heir or assign. In other words, death always terminated both individual tenancies and lordships. This was known as the law of mortmain.

The history of Maltby manor goes back to those days. It was one of 233 manors that were allotted by William I to Roger de Builli. It was called the Great Fee. The manors originally held by de Builli were administered as one large estate, called an honour, this being the honour of Blyth. The separate manor of Blyth was given to a religious order. A castle was built in the village of Tickhill. The administration of the honour of Blyth was handed over to the castle in Tickhill. It then became the honour of Tickhill.

The direct line of Roger de Builli died out. After much bickering, claim and counterclaim and a few acts of revolt against the Crown, the honour of Tickhill became settled with Alice, Countess of Eu who was based on London, Cambridge and her French estates. The castle and honour of Tickhill was sub-infeudated—that is, managed for her by appointed representatives. The sub-infeudatories in turn appointed fee farmer agents to manage various of the individual manors. The Countess of Eu sub-infeudated to the de Viponts. Alice de Vipont gave Sandbeck to the monastery at Roche, which is in my constituency. As my story unfolds it will be important to remember that there was a manor of Sandbeck and a manor of Roche. They were separate from the manor of Maltby. This may have led to great confusion in the past. The Countess of Eu confirmed the grant because all that Idonea de Vipont could grant was the profit she would make as a sub-infeudatory. In turn, the Crown had to confirm the grant by Alice of Eu, which confirmed the grant by Idonea de Vipont. This is how the feudal system worked.

Eventually Alice, Countess of Eu was told, as were all other people who owned land in England and France, "You hold land in England or France, but not in both." Alice, Countess of Eu, opted for France and from that day the Great Fee of de Builli reverted to the Crown and became part of the Duchy of Lancaster. All the old records are filed in the public records office under the title "Duchy of Lancaster papers".

The Earl of Cumberland and others like him were simply sub-infeudatories under the Duchy. In 1837, when the Earl Fitzwilliam agreed to the enclosure of the open field of Maltby, he did so as the sub-infeudatory of the duchy of that part of the original de Builli fee situated in and around, and administered from, the honour and castle of Tickhill.

If the Earl Fitzwilliam or anyone who succeeded him as sub-feudatory holder of the honour and castle of Tickhill had parted with the separate manor of Maltby, the holder of the manor of Maltby—what remained after the grants to the church—would be only a sub-infeudatory of a sub-infeudatory—in other words, a fee farmer to a greater fee farmer who held the lands of the duchy, as of the Crown. The statute in relation to that was one of Quia Emptores in 1289 and it is implicit in that statute that sub-infeudation means that the lordship of any manor does not make sub-infeudatories of the lords. They simply remain tenants. That statute is still used in land conveyancing. The lordship could not have been handed down.

The Earl of Scarbrough married in about 1725 into the family of the Earl of Castleton, which owned more land in that area and in Lincolnshire. A book called "The History of South Yorkshire" by the Rev. Joseph Hunter was printed in 1828. It covered all the lands and manors of South Yorkshire. On page 273 it is shown clearly that at the time of the death of the second Viscount Castleton on 13 November 1640 an abstract was taken of the inquisition after his death. I assume that that covers what land he held.

The list included the manor of Sandbeck:

"besides his lands in Lincolnshire, he had The manor of Sandbeck."

That is an important fact, because the abstract adds:

"The manor of Maltby, held of the king as of the castle of Tickhill."

The manor of Austerfield, which is quite nearby, was another of the manors handed to the honour of Tickhill and was held under the king as of the manor of East Greenwich, and the manor of Slade Houton, which is also close by and is part of the ecclesiastical manor of Maltby and is in my constituency, was also "held of the king".

It seems that when the Earl of Scarbrough married into the family of the Earl of Castleton he was perhaps the lord of the manor of Sandbeck, because that was not held as of the castle of Tickhill and was not held by what we now call the Duchy of Lancaster. There may have been great doubts about who was lord of the manor of Maltby—if there was a lord of the manor. It seems that the lordship of the manor was held by the Crown and could not, therefore, have been passed down through generations of a family.

The tithe commutation agreement in 1841 provided that people had to pay money to the parish if they were on the land and were growing crops and so on.

The tithe was about one tenth of what was produced, and it was paid to the local church. The tithe apportionment agreement for Maltby showed that the owner of Maltby's far and low commons and of Woodlee common and Stonegreen was Maltby township. As it happened, none of the commons was being used for any agricultural purpose. No commoners were growing crops on them as far as I can discover. Consequently no tithes had to be paid to the church.

But it is an important fact that the tithe commutation agreement in 1841 said, in effect, that the owner was Maltby township. It would seem that that was never challenged by the then Earl of Scarbrough. Another important point involves the Commons Act 1876. I have not seen the statute, but I understand that that Act had to be signed by all landowners in the area, and in the presence of the lord of the manor. At that time, the Earl FitzWilliam was adjudged to be the lord of the manor. That does not appear in any title deed, but he was adjudged to be the lord of the manor, and was present for the signing. Many people have said that it really does not matter, because the open fields enclosure and the tithe commutation provisions are not proof of evidence and are not title deeds. In the last century the Earl of Scarbrough's family twice applied to Parliament to enclose Maltby far and Maltby low commons. Objections were made. At the public inquiry it was said that those objections involved the ownership of Maltby far and low commons. I have been through the records with regard to both of those agreements. The 1879 one went to a Select Committee, where evidence was taken. I have read through the Select Committee's report, and there is nothing in the record to say that the enclosure legislation went through Parliament—despite the fact that two applications were made — because of the question of ownership.

The only thing that I could find with regard to the 1879 inquiry was that when the enclosure commissioners held two public meetings in the village of Maltby, a man said that the commoners did indeed own the commons. At that time, for a man to turn to the lord of the manor—albeit perhaps not the lord of the manor of Maltby—and to say that he objected to his claim to have the ownership and rights of common land in the area, would have been a big and brave thing for someone to do. I do not know whether that would still be the case in 1984.

Evidence was given to the Select Committee on the 1879 enclosure by the master cutler of Sheffield, the lord mayor of Sheffield and by the lord mayor of Rotherham. The area is very beautiful, and was then too. It is visited, and was then. People left the industrial towns of, for example, Sheffield and Rotherham and went to Woodlee common, Stonegreen and Maltby far and low commons for their holidays. Maltby village was known as a beauty spot and many people, even at the beginning of the century, used to go on holiday there. They would go on to the far and low commons and use them for exercise, while having rights as adjudged commoners. That will be restricted if the limitation order goes through now.

What is interesting about the 1879 evidence was that the people in Sheffield, and, I believe, the master cutler, said that there were only two commons where they could go where they had rights of air and exercise without trespass. One was Lindrick common, which is just in north Nottinghamshire, not far from Maltby common. The other was Maltby common.

We have now lost Lindrick common to a golf course, although I do not know exactly when. But if the mayor of Sheffield were giving evidence again now, I am sure that he would say that whereas they once had two commons, they now have only one.

There has been a massive population expansion in Maltby alone, which is known as no more than a township. Over 20,000 people live there. They have the right at present to walk on all areas, certainly of Maltby far common and on areas of Maltby low common, except for the site of special scientific interest in the charge of the Yorkshire Naturalist Trust because of its beauty. In those circumstances, I am sure that with commons commissioners today we could have had an interesting re-run of the decision on the enclosure in 1879.

Let me move on into this century. In 1919 the Finance Act was based in reality on an interesting form of land tax. It was stopped in another place, so no tax was ever levied on anybody. The district valuers had to go round all the land to find out who was the owner, to see whether they were in a position to pay a land tax as owner.

In the district valuer's report of 1915 the ownership of Maltby far and low commons was registered as being Maltby township. There is something strange, because on two occasions, in 1841 and again in 1915, when it was likely that some payments would have to to be made under contemporary Acts if one were the owner of the land, the Earl of Scarbrough or his predecessors sat back and were quite prepared to see the land in the hands of Maltby township.

I do not want to read too much into that, only to say that, as many hon. Members know, I was a coal miner at Maltby colliery before I came to the House. I have an avid interest in local history. I am a founder member of Maltby local history society. I happened to get hold of the royalties map for the Maltby main colliery company. I looked at it to see who claimed the ownership of Maltby far and low common at that time because when the colliery company mined under any land royalties were paid to the landowner. Lo and behold, on the royalties map, Earl Scarbrough's name appears in big letters all over the place, and on the two tiny patches of Maltby far and low commons is the Earl of Scarbrough's name again. Of course, he would wish to be owner of Maltby far and low commons because the Maltby miners were mining coal there and his family accrued quite a few pounds as a result.

[Mr. Kevin Barron]

I do not think for one minute that that was a massive percentage of the coal royalties paid to his family, because it was obviously a small plot of land when one looks round at the thousands of acres that Lord Scarbrough owned. It seems to smack of the fact that in 1915 the township of Maltby may have had to pay rent on the land while Lord Scarbrough was claiming coal royalties from mining it.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I know that the area is attractive. Sir Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe" begins by describing it as:

"That pleasant part of England where flows the river Don."

Was Maltby an urban district, and I am right in thinking that there was right of access to the common under the 1926 legislation?

Mr. Barron: Yes, there was a Maltby urban district. For some strange reason many public records of crucial times for the question of ownership have gone astray. We continue to look for them.

I turn to section 156 of the inspector's report. Mr. Ferris, QC, was acting on behalf of the Rotherham metropolitan borough council. At the time of the inquiry the inspector seemed to be satisfied with the question of ownership. At that time many people did not know what was going on. Advice was taken from the QC who represented the Earl of Scarbrough and accepted, without the consideration of evidence that the protesters had, at the meeting.

At present Rotherham metropolitan borough council is consulting with the solicitors, J. J. Pearlman in Leeds, who represented objectors at the public inquiry. They are investigating the legal aspects of the ownership of Maltby far and low common. A prominent member of Rotherham metropolitan district council said publicly that it would seek to finalise the question of ownership of Maltby far and low common, even if it meant going to court. Perhaps because it was said at the public inquiry that the courts must decide the question of ownership, not the inquiry, that may be the case.

In section 157 the inspector states:

"I do not consider there is an onus on the applicant to produce his deeds to enable objectors to endeavour to find planks on which to build a case in opposition."

If the Earl of Scarbrough has the title deeds of the land, the question of ownership could be settled quickly, amicably, without public delay or any more ado from the inquiry. There would be no more letters written saying that if he was not or is not the owner of Maltby far and low commons he should not have applied for the limitation order. If he showed the title deeds to those who say that he does not own them, the matter could be settled. If he finds trouble about doing that because of personal remarks made about him in connection with the ownership of the land, I shall go to his estate or to his representative in London to see the title deeds. I shall then pass on the evidence to those who still question whether he owns the land.

I tabled parliamentary questions about the matter during the past two months. The first was to the Department of the Environment on 22 November. I asked the Secretary of State,

"what evidence he obtained, prior to the public inquiry in 1982 concerning Maltby common, to satisfy him on the ownership question."

I received this definite answer:

"The evidence consisted of various documents including title deeds, and the opinion of Mr. Francis Ferris, QC, which was obtained by Rotherham metropolitan borough council." —[Official Report, 22 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 281.]

On 3 December I asked another question, although there were many more in between. I asked the Secretary of State,

"if the deeds he saw from Messrs. Allen and Overy, solicitors in relation to Maltby common, were a deed of title to the specific ownership of Maltby far and low common."

Following the definite statement that the evidence had included title deeds, I got a very different answer on 3 December:

"There was more than one deed and other documentation, examination of which satisfied my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that the title to Maltby commons could be traced to the Earl of Scarbrough." — [Official Report, 3 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 63.]

That is a little different from saying that title deeds had been seen. That highlights the vagueness of the question of ownership. If it was not vague before, it has certainly become vague after those answers from the Department of the Environment.

The limitation order that will be put on the commons is the first, if my information is correct, since 1925 for a golf course on public land. That was when the legislation was introduced. Indeed, I do not believe that a golf course has been put on common land this century. The decision will set a precedent for common land and people's rights to take air and exercise there.

Maltby common is used by Maltby people. I used it as a boy. However, in some ways it has been abused. A tenant farmer of the Earl of Scarbrough used parts of Maltby far common under the agriculture legislation that was passed during the war in the "Dig for Victory" campaign. In the 1960s the local council had a long fight to remove the tenant farmer from the common. Indeed, I remember working on that farm as a young lad. I was employed as a casual labourer to pick up stones from the land. We were filling wagons with stones, and then going to the other side of Maltby common and dumping them there. I now recognise that it is a beautiful area with much flora and fauna that is of great value to naturalists. I was not a naturalist then. I was paid by the tenant farmer to dump stones on Maltby far common.

At the public inquiry we heard that it would be a good idea to use that part of the common because it had become an eyesore. The Earl of Scarbrough should know all about that, because besides the fact that I was paid to dump stones at weekends and during the school holidays, it is well known in my area that the building company owned by the Earl of Scarbrough has been caught dumping on Maltby far common. The county council ordered the company to clear what it had been dumping, which was waste material from houses.

The question of ownership of Maltby far and low common must be resolved. If the Department makes a decision with such uncertainty still in the air, the issue will drag on for years. We must resolve it now. No doubt the Earl of Scarbrough will read this debate in Hansard tomorrow. A couplet has been made up by the people who have been trying to keep Maltby common for Maltby people, which is an honourable objective. It goes like this:

"The law locks up the man or woman,
Who steals the goose from off the common,
But lets the greater villain loose,
Who steals the common from the goose."

Is that true in the case of the Maltby far and low commons? It was quoted at public meetings last century concerning Maltby far and low commons. The Earl of Scarbrough is the owner because he claims that it is manorial waste land and he is the lord of the manor of Maltby, but I would like to know the truth, and I should like the Department of the Environment to know as well. At the end of the day, this proposal will take up 16·5 acres of common land that Maltby people have had the right to walk on for hundreds of years.

8.30 am

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I pay tribute to the way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) has presented his case, and for the diligent way in which he has collected the facts on this important matter. I declare an interest as chairman of the Open Spaces Society, which started in 1865. One of our earliest cases concerned Maltby common, and we were fighting against enclosures in the 19th century.

Therefore, we are greatly concerned about the latest limitation order. The Opposition would officially fully support the representations made by my hon. Friend. This land has belonged to the ordinary people of the Maltby district for generations. It looks as though it will be stolen from them, although it may be done legally. I urge the Minister on two points. First, if the Earl of Scarbrough, or anybody else wants an adjudication, but will not accept my hon. Friend, I am happy to offer the good offices of the Open Spaces Society, and I know that my hon. Friend would accept them.

Secondly, will the Minister give the House an assurance that no final decision will be taken on the limitation order until the ordinary people of Maltby have the right to continue their legal inquiries, that the case will be fought fairly, and when it is decided it will be in the light of proven evidence and not on the hearsay of a noble lord?

8.32 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): I join the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) in congratulating the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) on the way in which he presented his case. It was a fascinating tour de force of local history, which will be read with great interest by those who are interested in the area. I congratulate him on the way that he presented a complex and interesting case. It reminds us what a privilege it is to live in a country that has been so free from foreign invasion that we can argue about ownership going back to the 11th or 12th century, with some hope of finding records and unbroken continuity.

In cases such as this, I begin to feel that this is real politics. It was for matters such as this that hon. Members from both sides of the House went into politics. These are real matters that affect the people, and on which careful judgment has to be made. One has to think of tests by which one can measure these matters, and I can think of no better assessment than that of a great hon. Member, who sat for one of the university seats, which have been, perhaps sadly, abolished, although I believe that there is still a Conservative manifesto pledge in 1951 to re-establish them. We have not got around to doing that yet. That was Mr. A. P. Herbert, and one wonders what his view of a case such as this would be. When I come to advise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on his decision, I shall have Mr. A. P. Herbert looking over my shoulder to see that we make a decision that is commonsense and takes into account the traditions of the country.

I should like to put on the record a few points, most of which confirm the account of the procedures given by the hon. Member for Rother Valley. Perhaps it will be helpful if I give our understanding of what is happening. We shall carefully consider the hon. Gentleman's points, and any other relevant evidence that is offered, before making a final decision.

As the hon. Member for Rother Valley said, section 193 of the Law of Property Act 1925 gave the public a legal right of access to areas of common land for air and exercise by virtue of their location in an urban district on 1 January 1926. My Department has been involved in this matter for a number of years, and I hope that that will assure the hon. Gentleman that we are not rushing into a premature decision. As he rightly said, Lord Scarbrough applied for an order to impose limitations and conditions as to rights of public access to parts of both commons.

Subsection (1) of section 193 of the 1925 Act provides:

"The Minister shall, on the application of any person entitled as lord of the manor or otherwise to the soil of the land, or entitled to any commonable rights affecting the land, impose such limitations on and conditions as to the exercise of the rights of access or as to the extent of the land to be affected as, in the opinion of the Minister, are necessary or desirable for preventing any estate, right or interest of a profitable or beneficial nature in, over, or affecting the land from being injuriously affected".

Such an application was made by Lord Scarbrough to enable part of the commons, as we have been told, together with other land which was not common, to be used as a golf course. The wording of the proposed limitations was provisionally agreed, in accordance with the Department's normal practice.

The first occasion when the ownership of these commons was called into question, in connection with this application—although there may have been a history of cases — was following public notice of the proposed order. A number of objections were received and one ground of objection put forward by some of the objectors was that my noble Friend was not the owner of the commons and therefore not entitled to apply for an order under section 193.

The applicant for the order was given the opportunity to comment on all the objections, and various documents, including copies of title deeds, were provided by the applicant's solicitors to my Department.

The Rotherham metropolitan borough council objected to the proposed order, but not on ownership grounds. The borough council investigated the ownership question because of assertions that the council and not my noble Friend was the true owner of the commons. They sought counsel's opinion on this issue from Mr. Ferris. Having considered all the evidence, counsel concluded that the real evidence of title appeared to be all one way, in favour of the Earl.

This opinion was made available to my Department, and I have read it carefully. My legal advisers studied all the evidence of title which had been put forward by the applicant and Mr. Ferris' opinion, and concluded that my noble Friend Lord Scarbrough was the owner of the commons and had the status to make the application for the order. Subsequently, it was decided that a non-statutory public inquiry should be held to assist in determination of the application for the order, but that this should not extend to the ownership question, as the Secretary of State was satisfied on this issue.

However, inspectors appointed by the Secretary of State have considerable discretion in their conduct of inquiries. When, at the opening of the inquiry, several of the objectors challenged the Secretary of State's ruling that the applicant was the owner of the commons, the inspector responded that he was prepared to hear legal submissions as to whether the Secretary of State had jurisdiction to make the order, but he stated that the inquiry could not be a forum for a detailed conveyancers' investigation of the title, as the hon. Member for Rother Valley said. The inspector also pointed out that only the courts could determine conclusively any question of title to land. The Queen's counsel representing the applicant at the inquiry indicated that he was not prepared to disclose details of the applicant's title, and the inspector ruled that the objectors were not entitled as of right to the title documents.

The inspector allowed the various parties to make their submissions on the ownership issue. These are set out in the inspector's report, to which the hon. Member for Rother Valley referred, and based on the evidence presented to him, the inspector reached the same conclusion as that previously reached by the Secretary of State — that the applicant was lord of the manor of Maltby and had the status to make the application.

After consideration of the inspector's report, the Secretary of State was disposed to accept the inspector's recommendation, which was to the effect that the order should be made reducing the area over which the limitations should apply and the number of limitations. However, it was decided that the applicant and the objectors should be allowed the opportunity to make representations about the proposed modifications, before the Secretary of State reached a firm decision. The respondents were originally given 21 days in which to respond, but in response to requests from several objectors, including Rotherham borough council, two extensions have been granted, and the new deadline is 15 January 1985.

Although representations have only been invited from objectors to the proposed modifications to the order, we have already received representations about the ownership issue, and have heard the hon. Gentleman's speech, and consideration will be given to all such representations. I shall pay close attention to all the arguments put forward by the hon. Gentleman. I shall need to study them and obtain legal advice about them. I shall take everything fully into account.

There has been pressure by objectors and by the hon. Member for copies of the ownership documentation which were supplied to the Department by the solicitors acting for my noble Friend to be made available. The trouble is that these documents are not ours and it is not for the Secretary of State to disclose them.

I must emphasise the distinction between the Secretary of State's duty and a court, if the matter came before a court. The Secretary of State's duty is to reach a reasonable decision. He must not lay himself open to legal challenge by taking a decision against the principles laid down in the Wednesbury rules. He cannot make a final legal judgment in the way that the court could. We have taken an unusual amount of trouble in this case to try to check the ownership, because questions were asked about it.

Dr. David Clark: This is an important point. Is the Minister saying that, if his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State makes a limitation order and there is then a legal challenge, the "common" people could continue to have their right of access pending the court's decision?

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall have to go carefully here, and perhaps write to the hon. Gentleman after legal advice on the matter. It would be wrong of me to say, off the cuff, that we would wait indefinitely for a potential court challenge, because one might never come.

If a court challenge were mounted, it would be a serious matter, which the Department would wish to take into account. It would be wrong for me to try to settle that matter from the Dispatch Box now. I shall take further advice on it.

The Secretary of State must beware of legal challenge from either side. If he were to make an unreasonable judgment on the evidence before him he would be open to legal challenge. We must reach our decision on the basis of the evidence available to us. We are, as the House can see, taking considerable care to ensure that we do that.

If objectors wish to pursue strict proof of title, that must ultimately be done in court. The expertise of the hon. Member for South Shields is well known. We shall pay close attention to what he and the hon. Member for Rother Valley have said. We shall take further advice about the implications of any court case. I should be grateful to the hon. Member for Rother Valley if he would kindly keep the Department informed about any such developments, because they would plainly be relevant to any decision we make.

Dairy Industry (South-West Wales)

8.45 am

Dr. Roger Thomas (Carmarthen): In the few minutes that we have at our disposal, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I wish to say that the farmers of south-west Wales—many of them small and some not so small—are facing a rather bleak Christmas. Milk quotas were introduced nine months ago and, unfortunately, confusion still reigns in the minds of so many in the farming community about their future. It is a community which I and the Secretary of State represent. We have been awaiting information about the hardship cases and the secondary quotas for a long time. Many of the farmers of south-west Wales are looking ahead three months to the negotiations for 1985-86 instead of looking back nine months.

I am sure that the small village of Llangadog is indelibly fixed in the mind of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. It was the scene of an example of militancy among the farming community to which we are not accustomed. That militancy stemmed from frustration and the fact that the milk quotas had been introduced like a bolt from the blue. They represented a U-turn for the agriculture policy of all Governments who have held office since the war. Many of us look back to the publication of the White Paper, "Food from Our Own Resources". Until March, farmers were being urged to expand. The request was made to such an extent that in the past year milk production in Wales increased by 17 per cent. That was not far short of the expansion that took place in Northern Ireland. However, the additional quota in Northern Ireland amounted to almost double the quota that was to be made available to Welsh farmers.

We in Wales are concerned about the small farm with 40 cows or more, but not in isolation; our concern extends to all farms. The farmers have been somewhat reassured by an announcement by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food that farms with an annual production of 200,000 litres of milk will be looked after by redistribution, but they represent only about half of the farms in south-west Wales. There are many farmers with 40 cows and upwards who are waiting anxiously to learn whether the outgoers scheme can be extended to them. If the scheme is to be successful, additional money will have to be made available. There should be some arrangement whereby farms, whatever their size, are able to surrender, in part, their milk production.

Given the confusion that has developed over the past nine months, it appears that the farmers of south-west Wales and the entire agricultural community are worried. We are worried about the future of our creameries. Due to the especially dry summer and winter, milk production in south-west Wales has fallen to the extent that some of our creameries are not getting sufficient supplies. However, farmers' wives are discovering that massive Irish product importations are now to be seen in our shops. Our farms are subject to a 9 per cent. cut in quota, but during the negotiations which took place last March the Irish Republic was allowed a 5 per cent. increase in quota. For the farmers of south-west Wales, this has been a raw deal and an unfair state of affairs.

We are anxiously awaiting what the Minister has to say. Above all, the message from the farmers of south-west Wales is that, when the negotiations take place in March next year, we must put forward a case, preferably through the personal intervention of the Minister, for an additional quota for the farmers of Wales, particularly south-west Wales. If we can get that additional quota, people's fears will be eased; they will know what their future is.

At the moment, in our colleges of agriculture in south-west Wales there is a considerable drop in the number of students. Why has that significant drop taken place? The reason is that farmers cannot afford to send their sons to the colleges of agriculture. If farming is to develop in south-west Wales, it is essential that the know-how and expertise is handed down from one generation to the next.

Therefore, we should look, not back at nine months of confusion, when people have hardly known what tomorrow would bring, but forward to the negotiations that are to take place in Brussels in the early spring. If Wales does not have a better deal for the year to come, many Welsh farmers will be unable to carry on.

The truth is that the farmers of Wales cannot diversify. Farmers are committed to dairy farming. The climate and topography is such that they can carry on only that type of dairy farming. Indeed, it galls the people of south-west Wales when they watch a Sunday afternoon television programme and see farmers from East Anglia—the corn farmers—telling the farmers of south-west Wales that, as a result of the imposition of quotas, they over-reacted. I challenge the farmers in those lucrative arable areas of England to come to south-west Wales, for there they will see real hardship.

We hope that the Minister will give us a ray of optimism. We know of his connections with my part of south-west Wales and the respect that the people have for him there. We anxiously await words of optimism, because, after nine months of darkness and pessimism, the farmers in that area are surely worthy of such optimism.

8.52 am

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Mr. John Stradling Thomas): I welcome the opportunity of this late—or early—hour to reply to the debate. In his closing words, the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Dr. Thomas) referred to my connections with the part of Wales that he represents. I am delighted to see present my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who also represents a similar constituency that is greatly involved in the difficulties that I freely admit the dairy industry has been passing through recently. It is still affected, as the hon. Gentleman said, by the upheaval of quotas, and he stressed that the uncertainty has caused a great deal of worry.

The uncertainty and the difficulties are due not only to the introduction of quotas but to the effects of the long, dry summer. As a result, milk production in south and west Wales has suffered an unexpectedly large reduction. However, that is not a pattern that I expect to continue. I greatly sympathise with all producers throughout the United Kingdom, not only in south-west Wales, who have been badly affected by those events, especially those who have no alternative to milk and little scope to adapt their dairy enterprises to a lower level of production.

I also fully appreciate the concern that has been expressed about the difficulties arising from the new arrangements, but I believe that the quota system does represent a significant step, in combination with price restraint, towards containing the Community surplus, which, even with the introduction of quotas, is expected to cost over £2·4 billion this year.

[Mr. John Stradling Thomas]

I am sure that after the inevitable period of uncertainty and adjustment, dairy farmers will be better placed to take the necessary decisions on long-term planning and future investment and that the industry as a whole will be more stable and better placed to respond to market demands.

The Government have taken positive steps to ameliorate the effect of quotas on those most harshly affected. The one-year phasing in has reduced the immediate impact, but we foresaw that there would be particular difficulties for certain areas, such as Wales, where production increased sharply between 1981 and 1983. That is why we held back a quota reserve of 2·5 per cent. to assist not just the special cases provided for in the regulations but those producers who were carrying out development plans.

Some 4,700 Welsh producers applied for special case treatment. I must take this opportunity to express our gratitude to the chairman and members of the local panel of the Dairy Produce Quota Tribunal for England and Wales for their invaluable work in processing those applications.

The Government are also making available £50 million over five years under the outgoers scheme, which is designed to help both those wishing to leave and those wishing to stay in milk production. Those leaving will receive compensation and the quotas surrendered will be re-allocated to those wishing to stay, giving priority to those who produced less than 200,000 litres in 1983 and providing an additional quota for those awarded an increase by the Dairy Produce Quota Tribunal for England and Wales in respect of exceptional hardship applications.

I am sure that that is the best way to help small producers, who represent more than half the total number of producers in south-west Wales. In addition, the aid to small milk producers scheme is being continued and a lump sum payment of £209·20 will be made to all producers who delivered not more than 200,000 litres of milk to the Milk Marketing Board in the 1983 calendar year and were still delivering milk in August or September 1984.

Last, but by no means least, farmers within the area added to the less favoured area whose incomes are below comparable incomes have been able to obtain higher rates of grant under the capital grant schemes on work commenced after 28 February 1984. Eligible works are the same as those which previously attracted the higher rate in the original less favoured areas—except for roads, bridges and similar items which retain the standard rates. A wide variety of investments in the new less favoured areas, including sheep pens, drainage and grassland improvements, now qualify for the higher rate.

In addition, all those in the extended less favoured areas will, if they occupy at least 3 hectares of eligible land, be able to qualify for compensatory allowances from 1 January 1985. The allowances are paid on breeding ewes and cows but not on dairy cows, although dairy farmers who run a separate livestock enterprise can benefit from allowances on the sheep and beef cows.

I should add that farmers in the less favoured areas pay a reduced rate of co-responsibility levy on milk deliveries to the dairies of up to 60,000 kg. The actual rates of compensatory allowance were announced recently and will, I am sure, benefit many dairy producers in the extended area.

The agreement reached on 31 March 1984 cannot be altered, and future allocations from the Community contingency reserve will be negotiated at the 1985-86 CAP price-fixing talks. The Commission's proposals have yet to be published, and it would clearly be necessary to look at the proposals on milk not only in their own right but as part of the complete package as it affects the United Kingdom. That being so, we shall have to decide upon priorities, once we have had a chance to study the price proposals in the light of the United Kingdom's negotiating objectives as a whole, not only on agriculture but on any wider budgetary considerations.

Even at the reduced levels of quotas which are already laid down for 1985-86——

It being Nine o'clock am on Thursday, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

PETITIONS

Human Embryos

9 am

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): I beg leave to present three petitions collected by residents of the constituency of Stockport. They are all in identical terms. They affirm the petitioners' belief that the newly fertilised human embryro is a real, living, individual human being. I share that belief. They all oppose all practices that discriminate against the embryo or violate his human dignity and right to life. I share that opposition.

The petitions continue as follows:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

9.1 am

Mr. David Gilroy Bevan (Birmingham, Yardley): I beg to ask leave to present three petitions on the protection of the human embryo, signed by nearly 1,000 petitioners living in, or being fortunately close to, my constituency of Yardley. The petitions are in the names of Mr. C. H. Greenhalgh of 35 Kathleen road, Yardley, Birmingham, Janet M. Felton of 17 Forest road, Yardley, L. Benbow of 14 Harnall Croft, Sheldon, Birmingham and Gail Aucott of 16 Broad road, Acocks Green, Birmingham.

The petitioners refer to and endorse the statement in the Warnock report that "the status of the embryo is a matter of fundamental principle which should be enshrined in legislation".

I concur with that view. My constituents pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

I join many hon. Members in hoping that such legislation will be brought before the House this Session, and that I shall be able to sponsor and support it.

To lie upon the Table.

9.3 am

Mr. Tom Sackville (Bolton, West): I beg to ask leave to present a petition in the name of Mr. Andrew Blackwood of Bolton Life group, 28 Brentford avenue, Bolton and signed by 2,200 residents of Bolton, West. The petition affirms that the newly fertilised human embryo is a real, living, individual human being. It continues:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research and experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Glasgow Health Board (Housing)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lang.]

9.4 am

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): I thank the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland for his presence. He will appreciate that, as we conclude our all-night sitting, workers at Woodilee and Stoneyetts will have just finished their night shift. I am sure that we all anxious about the fact that they will be returning to housing conditions which fall far short of the type of environment that we want for people who do so much for the Health Service in my constituency.

The Minister is aware of the history of the problem. There are 100 houses in Woodilee and Stoneyetts. The campaign for the improvement of those houses began some time ago, and it is essential bearing in mind the appalling conditions in which some of my constituents have to live. The Minister was kind enough to afford me a meeting in St. Andrew's house on 1 June. We discussed the problems. Following that meeting—I was delighted with the Minister's response—he announced that an extra £6 million would be made available to the Greater Glasgow health board for the maintenance and improvement of those properties and that £250,000 of it would be allocated to Woodilee and Stoneyetts. The Minister also assured me that he would monitor the matter.

I have called for this debate because I should like to see what evidence there is of the Minister acting in that way. Monitoring is essential if we are to achieve what we want to achieve. When I met representatives of the health board on 1 November, they were not able to assure me that a start had been made. Indeed, the tenders had not been issued. I am sure that the Minister was greatly disappointed at that, in view of the additional allocation that he made. I am sure that, like me, the Minister has an eye on the financial year. I was disappointed to learn this week that, although the contractors have made a superficial appearance, there is no evidence that any real work has been done. I fear for the loss of the £250,000, which is welcome, although it is not an enormous sum. I am much more worried that, if the health board does not spend the money that is available in this financial year, it will be much more difficult for the Minister to endorse the rolling programme, in spite of his good intentions.

It is not enough to say that I am worried about the condition of the houses. I therefore invite the Minister to visit my constituency to see Woodilee and Stoneyetts for himself. If he did that it would be part of the monitoring process, and we might then make the type of progress that has not been made, although I think that the Minister wanted to make progress on 1 June. Even before he arrives, I would like him to send a surveyor so that he can be given professional advice on existing structural conditions. I hope that the Minister will come to Woodilee and Stoneyetts in due course, and I hope that it will not be too long before he does so.

The Minister is aware that I am referring to two old psychiatric hospitals. In Woodilee there are between 900 and 1,000 beds, and at Stoneyetts there are 140 beds, made up of six 40-bed villas. There is a large number of psychogeriatric patients, and I am sure the Minister will acknowledge that even today in Stoneyetts and Woodilee, as elsewhere, we have an absolutely devoted staff that is dedicated to its work and entitled to far better housing than the Greater Glasgow health board is prepared to provide.

The Health Service in my constituency, as elsewhere in Scotland, has experienced cuts. I shall not dwell on that, but, if the Minister is not convinced, all the more reason for him to accept my invitation. He will certainly be unable to persuade the nurses and those who work in those hospitals that the cuts are merely in their imagination. The staff are working longer hours to make up for inadequacies.

There are no changing facilities for staff at Woodilee, and they are using patient facilities. That in itself is indefensible, but to encourage these people to return to houses that are vastly inferior to any reasonable standard is something that I know the House will not accept.

If the Minister accepts my invitation, he will see houses, most of which were built at Woodilee in 1875 and at Stoneyetts in approximately 1912. He will see evidence of precious few repairs and he will award no prizes at all for maintenance. He will see that virtually all the houses are damp and he will learn that 90 per cent. are in need of rewiring. He will see that most of the houses are far from wind and watertight, with roofs leaking, poor guttering, windows in need of repair and outside stairways which are far from secure.

I would like the hon. Gentleman to meet some of my constituents, who can explain their cases much more eloquently than I can. For example, Mrs. Barrie of 12 Carriesbrook puts on a switch and finds that lights other than those expected come on. I am sure that Mrs. Barrie is committed to the Christmas spirit, but that is extending things just a little too far. In addition, it is expensive and dangerous.

The Minister will, I hope, meet Willie Copeland, who has two children aged seven and four. Willie must pay between £450 and £500 a year for a fireplace to heat one room and to keep hot water. Another constituent, Jim Anderson, must pay £400 a year for his gas bill, even though, like most houses, his, too, has only one fireplace.

The same is true of apartments 3, 4 and 5 in this development. When the Minister comes—I am sure he will confirm a visit in his reply—he will meet folks like Evelyn Johnson, Ricky McManus, Rona Anderson and Ciz McMullen. They will tell the Minister—and I shall support them — that they want central heating, dampproof coursing, modern bathrooms and kitchens, new windows, rewiring and modern plumbing and sewerage arrangements. They are absolutely right to ask for each of those amenities and services. It is the very least we expect to meet modern housing standards.

Those of my constituents who are in such houses are aware that modernisation has taken place in the Strathkelvin and Monklands district council schemes. They want similar modernisation. If those of my constituents who are in modernised district council schemes were here they would support fully the argument for similar arrangements to be made for those who work for the Health Service. I make that point not because Health Service workers are envious of council tenants whose houses have been modernised but to confirm that it is right that in both circumstances tenants should be provided with the same opportunity.

We want our staff to live in reasonable conditions. The health board has acknowledged that by reducing rents people are living in inferior conditions. I wish to put on record the response of Mr. Philip Tilley, the Secretary of the Woodilee tenants association. When writing to the district administrator of the Greater Glasgow health board on 9 July 1983 Mr. Tilley said:

"A number of concerned tenants have asked the committee to write to you regarding your letter dated 22nd June 1983 informing us of the proposed abatement of rent and when it was to be implemented.

What concerns the tenants is that the abatement will in some way affect their rights as tenants and their right to have the repairs and improvements carried out. As you will appreciate, we do not feel that a 30 per cent. abatement would be adequate compensation for sub-standard housing or preferable if our rights were to be affected in any way. The tenants' committee would therefore ask that you give your assurance that the abatement in no way affects our rights as tenants.

We would also like to take this opportunity to enquire as to whether or not the £40,000 to £45,000 revenue per annum, from the Woodilee houses alone, might not be used to carry out the repairs. We would feel it only just that the rent we are paying should go to improving the properties.

In the light of recent government statements regarding the health service it would seem to us that the likelihood of these improvements being done grows increasingly slim. We would also be interested as to whether or not the government's plans might in any way affect your hopes that the improvements will be carried out this year.

We hope to hear from you in the near future. Yours faithfully, Philip Tilley".

The Minister will recall that the Prime Minister and other ministerial colleagues have often stated that the National Health Service is safe in their hands. Until these improvements take place my view is that the health of my constituents is not as yet safe in the hands of the Government. I should like an assurance on that point. We are seeking an improvement which represents a modern aspect of the National Health Service—and nothing less. Until recently the water supply of two houses was provided by fire engines. When some empty houses at Stoneyetts caught fire it was not very long before they were engulfed in flames and disappeared because of the absence of fire walls. I do not wish to spread fear and panic, but that is clearly unacceptable. I am sure the Minister would not wish to defend it.

The health of the tenants is a worry. There is evidence that children are suffering from kidney problems caused by dampness. One lady takes her family to live with her mother throughout the winter. I am sure that such circumstances are unacceptable to the House. In the absence of a positive response from the Government, Stoneyetts and Woodilee represent the Cinderella of the NHS in Scotland. My constituents would not expect me to accept that and to say nothing.

I have campaigned with the good people of Stoneyetts and Woodilee and COHSE to seek improvements in the houses, to ensure not what Scottish people would call a lick and a promise, but the full-scale modernisation to which those good people are entitled.

I thank the Minister for listening to the debate and for the response that he is about to make. I assure him that my constituents will consider his remarks carefully, because they will want to see for the people of Stoneyetts and Woodilee, not the bleak future that seems to be in store, but the sort of improvements that can only add to the status of the NHS in Scotland, for which the Minister has a major responsibility.

9.21 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) for giving us the opportunity to discuss the condition of houses provided by the Greater Glasgow health board at Woodilee and Stoneyetts hospitals for the benefit of staff.

I know of the hon. Gentleman's keen interest in the matter, about which he came to see me in June. The hon. Gentleman will be pleased that the House is in a calmer mood than it was when he first attempted to initiate this debate on 21 November. I am sure that his constituents will be impressed by the fact that it is 9.21 am and we have waited through the night for the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst), in whose constituency some of the houses lie, would like to have been present, but he has asked me to apologise to the House for his absence. He is on parliamentary business in Edinburgh. Given the length of time that the business is taking, I suspect that my hon. Friend would prefer to have been here.

Hon. Members will know that all NHS property should be maintained to a satisfactory standard. Unfortunately, the standard of maintenance in the past has not always been as good as it might have been. The hon. Gentleman's description of the houses at Woodilees and Stoneyetts confirms that. The problem has been increasingly apparent in recent years.

In March 1980 it was agreed with the chairmen of health boards to set up a group—called the capital steering group—to review the health capital building programme. The group soon decided that a condition survey of existing stock was essential to its work. Such a survey was carried out, being completed early in 1981. The returns made it clear for the first time that a severe problem had built up over many years which could not be solved rapidly from within the normal revenue allocations of boards. It was estimated that the sum required to put matters right would be over £200 million. Accordingly, my right hon. Friend and I decided to provide extra resources from capital funds to attempt to reduce the backlog. Inevitably, it takes time to work up programmes, but we were able to make a start by allocating an initial £6·5 million to boards in the financial year 1983-84 for the purpose. So good was the uptake that we were subsequently able to increase the amount provided in that year to £9·4 million. As their upgrading programme developed, boards sought a total of £16·8 million for the current financial year.

We agreed to meet the whole cost of those programmes and, in the light of progress during the year, we have been able to provide additional amounts, so that, by the end of the year, we expect the total amount allocated to exceed £18·5 million. The House will not expect me to give an open-ended commitment for the future, but we are committed to tackling seriously and systematically the situation that has developed, and I expect, at worst, to maintain the allocation at this year's level.

I expect to learn early in the new year just how much boards themselves consider they can realistically tackle. I shall do what I can to provide the necessary resources. Boards are, I know, fully stretched in preparing suitable schemes. A great amount of detailed planning and negotiation is entailed, and the greatest care has to be taken to ensure that the funds are used to maximum benefit and are fully accounted for.

Nevertheless, having made a useful start, it is important and necessary to maintain momentum in tackling the very serious backlog maintenance problem. Of course we shall also have to take account of other demands for capital funds for new and replacement building. The responsibility for maintenance and for determining the priorities for the use of the funds made available naturally rests with the health boards. It is understandable that pressure from the public leads boards to think first about devoting resources to matters that affect patients most directly.

But it is still short-sighted to neglect maintenance altogether, and I have made that quite clear to boards. The money to which I referred earlier is being provided in an endeavour by my Department to get things back to rights. The buildings which can be improved and restored to a satisfactory condition will be upgraded in accordance with programmes prepared by them from the special allocation.

Of course, I also expect boards to carry out routine maintenance from their own resources. It would be quite wrong for them to perpetuate the errors of the past. In addition, new accommodation is constantly being provided, either directly from central funds or from the boards' own ordinary capital programmes. Some of the worst hospital accommodation has been closed and patients are being treated in new or upgraded wards. Total capital expenditure this year will be well over £100 million.

I turn now to the position of the Greater Glasgow health board. The board has benefited from the special allocation. Work to the value of over £3 million was carried out last year, and more than £6 million is expected to be spent on backlog maintenance by the end of March. It is for the board itself to determine where the money should be spent, and it is natural that the first thought should be to improve patient accommodation. Staff housing has, however, not been neglected.

I have referred already to the meeting that I had with the hon. Member for Monklands, West in June. I welcomed that meeting and the very fair way in which he made his views known, just as he has made them known today. I was able to tell him then that the Greater Glasgow health board was anxious to proceed with necessary upgrading work to staff houses in its care. It proposed to allocate £250,000 to this work out of the total of £6 million which it had sought and which had been allocated for the current year. It was its intention that part of that money would be spent on staff housing at Woodilee and Stoneyetts hospitals. Had that been its only concern, I have no doubt that work would have been well under way, if not completed, by now.

However, preparatory work for a wide range of schemes affecting much of the stock has taken a good deal of time. A major programme is being carried out at Woodilee hospital on various works costing £500,000. I hope that those staff who look around and think that there may be cuts in the Health Service will consider that work which is going on in their own hospital at Woodilee. They might then realise that those cuts are more imaginary than real. Indeed, we are spending more money than ever before on the Health Service.

Those parts of the hospital that have benefited include wards one to four, wards five and six, the pharmacy, the laundry, Craigie house and Woodilee house. As an extension of that work a start has been made on upgrading the houses at Fauldhead and Woodilee cottages and at Stoneyetts. I am informed that the first stage of the work —a drainage contract involving houses in Carresbrooke avenue and Marweed avenue, Fauldhead, is due to be completed today. Similar work involving the houses in Blairhill avenue and Rutherford avenue and the Woodilee cottages is due to be completed on 10 January, and equivalent work at Stoneyetts, which is also under way, is due for completion on 18 January.

Going beyond this necessary preliminary work, a contract has been agreed covering the external work on the houses in Carresbrooke avenue and Robb terrace, Fauldhead; Woodilee cottages Nos. 15 to 18, and two houses at Stoneyetts. This work, which will cost in the region of £200,000, will commence on 7 January 1985, and the board is pressing ahead with the details necessary to let a further contract for the phase of the operations covering Marwood avenue, Rutherford avenue, Blairhill avenue, all at Fauldhead, and the remaining cottages Nos. 1 to 14 at Woodilee.

If weather conditions remain favourable, the work in phase one should be completed by the end of the financial year. I hope that that answers the hon. Gentleman's specific point about ensuring that the work was done in a financial year.

Mr. Tom Clarke: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but in saying,

"If the weather conditions remain favourable", is he not confirming my criticism that the work should have started much earlier during the summer months? Has he had an explanation from the Greater Glasgow health board as to why that did not happen?

Mr. MacKay: I appreciate that it would be nice if all building work could be done in the summer months, but that is not possible. The building industry would not like that for a start.

I mentioned that the Greater Glasgow health board has a number of new building projects, schemes and problems of this nature on its books. Therefore, its staff resources have to be divided among those planning matters. Unfortunately, as the hon. Gentleman will know from his previous incarnation in local authorities, it takes time to draw up specifications and get tenders. But I hope that, if the weather conditions remain favourable, the first phase should be completed by the end of the financial year and the second phase should proceed immediately thereafter.

Mr. Tom Clarke: In view of the Minister's reference to my previous involvement in local government, it is necessary, in the light of my invitation to the Minister to come to my constituency, to say that I cannot think of any local authority which, having been given money by his Department, then waited five months without presenting evidence that it was anxious to spend the money.

Mr. MacKay: The Greater Glasgow health board is anxious to spend the money. Indeed, it is anxious that phase two should proceed immediately after phase one. Any remaining external work and such other internal work, including re-wiring, as the board decides to carry out will be met from the 1985-86 allocation.

The board is responsible for many other staff houses associated with hospitals throughout its area. While I have concentrated on the houses which are the subject of this debate, I know that the board is carefully considering the improvements which are required to its remaining housing stock, and also, importantly—this is a matter that I wish to develop a little — the extent to which it can now declare staff houses surplus to requirements and earn some income from their disposal.

Concern about under-used residential property in the NHS is widespread. I have recently arranged for copies of a report, carried out for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, to be issued to boards in Scotland, and they have been asked to look closely at their residential accommodation with a view to identifying and disposing of all that is not needed.

I want to make it clear that there is no threat to tenants of NHS houses who do not wish or cannot afford to buy their houses. We simply want them to have the opportunity to do so. Health boards have always shown themselves to be good landlords and the guidelines that I have laid sown should ensure that they continue to do so.

Officials of the board met members of the Woodilee tenants association early in November to tell them of their plans for improving the houses. Since then they are to be congratulated on the progress that has been made and on keeping in close touch with the tenants association. When the last meeting took place, a further meeting was arranged for 21 December to review progress. I hope that that meeting will be an opportunity both to review the real progress that has been made and to discuss the board's proposals for future improvements.

The hon. Gentleman has been constructive in his discussions with me and in the attention that he has paid to this important matter. I hope that if he attends that meeting on Friday, as I think he intends to do, he will be able to hear further details of the progress that I have outlined today. He will also be able to raise, along with his constituents, some specific points.

I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman will keep me informed of progress, and I shall bear in mind his invitation to pay a visit to his constituency. I was flattered that he felt that a visit from me would be such a catalyst that work would progress apace and almost instantly. I hope that the work will progress apace without the necessity of a visit from me to stimulate it. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will keep me informed, and I hope that before next winter, certainly, his constituents will be living in upgraded and much improved houses.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-six minutes to Ten o'clock am.

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Civil Defence

1. Mr. Charles Morrison asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many local authorities have started recruiting civil defence volunteers since December 1983.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): This information is not readily available in the form requested, but I understand that 36 county councils already have volunteers enrolled and of these 28 are currently recruiting volunteers and a further eight have plans to do so next year.

Mr. Morrison: That seems to be a reasonable start. Will my hon. Friend say whether the analysis of answers to the local government civil defence questionnaire has yet been completed and whether the constitution of the successful Devon volunteers might be recommended for other local authorities.

Mr. Shaw: With regard to the latter question, the activities of the Devon volunteers and, indeed, the contribution of the west country to civil defence exercises are a model and I trust that they will be looked at.

With regard to the main point of my hon. Friend's question, the analysis is complete and a report summarising the results has been placed in the Library. I welcome the evidence of progress that the results show, but many local authorities have much more to do. I intend that all local authorities shall carry out their statutory civil defence responsibilities, and we can enable them to do so by making the resources available.

To secure the implementation of the regulations we shall provide guidance to develop a programme of planned action and monitor progress, while holding in reserve the use of formal directions and the default powers available in the 1948 Act. The replies to the questionnaire provide the base line from which to develop a programme of work and the target dates. As a first step I have arranged that local authorities should be asked to complete the plans required by 31 December 1985.

Mrs. Clwyd: As there is no intellectual reason for civil defence, would it not be more prudent for the Government to persuade local authorities not to spend their money on such a foolish and wasteful exercise when the Government are starving so many local authorities of resources?

Mr. Shaw: No, Sir.

Mrs. Clwyd: I am a woman.

Mr. Shaw: I was correct in the first instance. I shall recommence. No, Sir. It is an essential requirement that local authorities make some sensible provision for civil defence emergencies.

Mr. Jessel: Is not a very clear intellectual reason for taking such measures simply that if an explosion took place 10 miles from where a lot of people live many could be saved by those measures? Even though the catastrophe of a nuclear explosion is unlikely, it still remains possible.

Mr. Shaw: Yes, Sir. That is a correct view. We must make a humanitarian response to emergencies.

Disaster Planning

2. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he considers that potential peace time major disasters require emergency plans for limited evacuation and relocation of population.

4. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek to require local authorities to include integrated evacuation, relocation and shelter plans in their emergency plans.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Leon Brittan): Many types of potential peacetime emergency will require that plans are made for the population to be evacuated from the vicinity of the incident and accommodated temporarily elsewhere. The preparation of such plans is a matter for local authorities, advised as appropriate by the Government. Local authorities are already required by regulations made in 1983 to prepare plans to protect the public from the effects of a nuclear attack.

Mr. Bowden: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that a number of local authorities have already made voluntary evacuation plans? In those circumstances would he consider giving some force to guidelines to encourage other local authorities to follow suit as quickly as possible?

Mr. Brittan: I am aware that some local authorities have made plans. I dare say that in doing so they have been assisted by the guidance given in the 1975 circular and I hope that other local authorities will find that circular of continuing value in making their plans, which are certainly worth doing.

Mr. Knight: Does my right hon and learned Friend agree that not only is there a case for issuing general guidelines, but that some monitoring should take place to ensure that those guidelines are acted upon? Will he give the House an assurance that should any local authority decline to carry out its duties in respect of emergency planning he will take the appropriate action?

Mr. Brittan: I think that we are talking about two different things — civil emergency plans and plans in respect of armed conflict and nuclear attack. With regard to the civil plans, compliance with the voluntary guidelines to which I have referred has been good, and I do not see the need for further powers, although the House will know that regulations implementing the European Community's Seveso directive were laid on 18 December and come into effect on 8 January 1985. With regard to the plans dealing with nuclear attack and other armed conflict, my hon. Friend the Minister of State has explained the position regarding local authorities' co-operation.

Mr. Pawsey: Clearly it might be difficult to have evacuation plans for the entire population, the size of the island being somewhat limited. Can my right hon. and learned Friend therefore say what plans he has for persuading local authorities to identify structures and buildings in their areas which might be used as refuges in an emergency?

Mr. Brittan: As my hon. Friend may know, we are preparing, in consultation with local authority associations, technical guidance for local authorities on how they can conduct a survey to identify existing accommodation that is suitable as a shelter. I think that that is the most useful guidance that we can give. It will be as straightforward as possible and designed to minimise the resources required.

Mr. Skinner: What good are guidelines to local authorities which have been financially crippled by the Government?

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman obviously does not appreciate that there is no local authority which is not able to comply with the civil defence requirements, because the financial regime amply permits that to happen.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: May I ask my right hon. and learned Friend about peacetime disasters? Can he tell the House whether the existence of evacuation plans is a condition precedent to the granting of planning permission when there is an application in respect of factories that carry out dangerous processes? If there is no such requirement, can he say whether he will consider talking to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment with a view to making such a condition necessary?

Mr. Brittan: In the case of hazardous chemicals there is a requirement of notification to local authorities of the details of the chemicals concerned. I think that my hon. Friend's point is covered in that way.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: Will the Home Secretary accept that it is far more important to develop plans for dealing with peacetime emergencies and disasters than to fritter money away on futile, misleading and unnecessary civil defence? Is it not a scandal that Government grants are available for the latter and not for the former?

Mr. Brittan: No, I do not accept that it is possible to make that distinction, although I hope that the hon. Gentleman's remarks indicate that he will support the amendments that we propose to introduce to the Civil Defence Act, which will add flexibility to the expenditure of civil defence grant-aid. However, it does not follow that because it is necessary to prepare for civil contingencies it is not equally important to prepare for nuclear or conventional attack, knowing, as we do and as my hon. Friend has pointed out so clearly, that proper preparation could save lives. We all have a duty to do that.

Broadcasting (Political Balance)

5. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has plans to seek to amend the statutory provisions governing political balance in broadcasting.

Mr. Brittan: No, Sir.

Mr. Bruce: Does the Home Secretary believe that the broadcasting authorities should simply recognise the political balance that is frozen within this House, or do they have a responsibility to accept the dynamic changes that are taking place? Does he further recognise that a growing body of public opinion believes that the broadcasting authorities' presentation of political news is unfair and that the majority feel that it is particularly biased in favour of the Government and unfair to the Liberal/SDP alliance? [Interruption.]

Mr. Brittan: It would not appear that most of my hon. Friends share that perception.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that there is a perfect balance at the moment, because it is not the fault of the BBC or the other media if they do not know Liberals from SDPs, or Socialists from Militants, as no one else in the country does?

Mr. Brittan: I agree with my hon. Friend. Those are some of the problems with which the broadcasting authorities have to contend.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does the Home Secretary agree that it is important that the television and radio companies should be fair in their political coverage? If so, can he think of any better balance than that of public opinion, as opposed to the balance of seats in the House?

Mr. Brittan: It is certainly true that broadcasting authorities must ensure that people are not unfairly treated in respect of the material that is broadcast. As the hon. and learned Gentleman will know, legal proceedings are pending on this matter, so I should not go into it in greater detail.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Home Secretary aware that he has had no complaint this afternoon from the Social Democrats and that they are not here to line up with the Liberals, because they have not turned up for work, and they know that the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) is never off the BBC?

Mr. Brittan I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his unique insight into the thinking of the Social Democratic party.

Entry Clearance Applications

6. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the operation of the primary purpose rule in relation to application for entry clearance by husbands of British citizens.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): In considering applications for entry clearance by husbands of British citizens entry clearance officers apply the immigration rules approved by Parliament in the light of the decisions of the immigration appellate authorities.

Ms. Short: Does the Minister admit that the rule that requires a man to prove that it is not his primary purpose to come to the United Kingdom when seeking entry for marriage discriminates unjustly against British women of Asian origin, and that hundreds of them are unable to marry the man whom they wish to marry? Even worse, does he agree that there are couples who have children, and whom the Minister accepts have genuine marriages that will last for life, whom he is refusing to allow to be together in the United Kingdom? Can any civilised country defend that rule?

Mr. Waddington: No Sir, and the hon. Lady is obviously referring to a particular case in which she has taken a great interest. That case proves clearly that it is perfectly easy to apply the primary purpose test and that it is fair to do so. If a person who is interviewed on the Indian subcontinent says that it has been his ambition to come to Britain for a long time, since his cousins are here, that he wants to come to Britain to earn more money and that he decided to achieve that ambition through marriage, it is not difficult to conclude that his primary purpose in marrying was to get here. The House must face the fact that it would be absurd if, having tightened up on work permits for young men who would do unskilled jobs here, we allowed exactly the same young men to come on to our labour market by using marriage as a device.

Mr. Soames: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that many of the immigration rules are being grotesquely abused? What steps can he take to tighten them up?

Mr. Waddington: As my hon. Friend knows, there is a very sophisticated appeals machinery. In the case which the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) has in mind, a person whose application was turned down, appealed to the adjudicator and then to the immigration appeals tribunal. In both cases——

Ms. Short: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I think that I know what it is.

Ms. Short: The point of order is that the Minister is giving a false version of a case that is going on in my——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was wrong, I did not know what it was. It would be extremely helpful if the Minister did not go into too much detail, as to do so activates supplementary questions that are rather too long.

Mr. Waddington: I certainly have no intention of going into detail, but it is apparent from the hon. Lady's point of order that she was referring to a particular case.

Ms. Short: I was not, I have hundreds of cases.

Mr. Waddington: It is right that I should point out that in the case to which the hon. Lady referred the decision of the entry clearance officer in the subcontinent was upheld by both the adjudicator and the immigration appeals tribunal.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the Minister not aware that Asian people actually fall in love and want to get married? By what right does he set himself up as judge and jury between people who want to get married out of love, and people who, in his mind, want to get married for the sake of convenience?

Mr. Waddington: I want to make it plain that the primary purpose rule is not an attack on marriage and is certainly not an attack on the system of arranged marriages. What it does attack is marriage being abused and used as a means to get entry into this country.

Mr. Marlow: In view of the very real and proper pressures on public expenditure at present, is my hon. and learned Friend of the opinion that money spent on the Commission for Racial Equality and the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants is public money well spent?

Mr. Waddington: I think that that question goes very wide of the question on the Order Paper.

Mr. Snape: Does the Minister accept that the primary purpose rule referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) is unjust and unfair? Will he also accept that the inhuman and bureaucratic delays to which all these cases are subject are also inhuman and unfair? Finally, will the Minister do something about these delays, instead of subjecting the House to an arrogant monologue as he has done this afternoon?

Mr. Waddington: I think, first, that I have explained adequately that the rule is not unfair. It would be grotesque if people were able to use marriage as a device to get into this country when they are not qualified to come here to work under work permit rules.

I have given the House the figures on delays on many occasions. Delays are shorter now than they were under the Labour Government.

Mr. Sayeed: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the number of unemployed in this country is already too high and that to import more people to do the same few jobs is not a good idea?

Mr. Waddington: My hon. Friend is entirely right. We simply cannot allow marriage to be used as a device to enable people to come here and go on to the labour market at a time of high unemployment.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: How can the Minister possibly defend the primary purpose rule when he admitted in this Chamber that one out of every four cases falls foul of the rule? That means, in effect, that nearly 1,000 people a year are being refused access to the fiancées they propose to marry.

Will the Minister also tell the House that the reason for the rule is to play to the racists on the Government Benches and has no real value whatsoever as an immigration control?

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentlemans is wrong in his statistics. The failure rate of applications by husbands and fiancés to come to this country has dropped quite dramatically. In 1982 the overall refusal rate was 63 per cent. In 1983 it dropped to 47 per cent. Refusals on the ground of primary purpose are running at about 25 per cent., and on primary purpose and another ground at 33 per cent.

Mr. Murphy: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that all immigration rules should be applied strictly but fairly, and that it would be wrong for any Member of Parliament to abuse his or her position in that respect?

Mr. Waddington: I am not quite sure what my hon. Friend is referring to, but I am sure that hon. Members do not wittingly set out to abuse their privileges. I think that sometimes the facility allowed to Members of Parliament to approach a Minister to ask for a man's temporary admission, while they make representations, can be abused. I recollect that recently a person affected by the primary purpose rule remained in this country for months and months, and is still here, as a result of a Member of Parliament making representations.

Ms. Short: The Minister is referring to my case again.

Mr. Kaufman: The Minister has displayed the naked racism that underlies the way in which this rule is administered. The hon. and learned Gentleman is completely distorting the statistics. Since the period 1980 to 83, refusals on the ground of primary purpose have risen 25-fold, and the Minister takes pleasure in causing that rise. Is he not aware that this deliberate and inhumane distortion of the primary purpose rule is persecuting British women who want the same right as everybody else to live in this country with the husbands of their choice? The Government should be downright ashamed of themselves.

Mr. Waddington: As shadow Home Secretary, a right hon. Member should have more than one speech. We have heard that one before. I pointed out to the right hon. Gentleman that one can take any statistic and find that the rates of refusal under this Government compare favourably with those under the previous Government. As usual, the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to distort the statistics. He refers to the proportion of refusals on the ground of primary purpose compared with the total number of refusals on other grounds. In fact, the only realistic way to assess the matter is by the number of primary purpose refusals as a percentage of all applications. Those figures show that it was easier for husbands and fiancées to establish a right to enter the country in 1983 and 1984 than it was in 1982, before the 1983 rules came into force.

Civil Defence College, Easingwold

7. Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much time he expects the principal of the Civil Defence college, Easingwold, to spend on co-ordinating civil defence volunteers.

8. Dr Glyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what responsibility the principal of the Civil Defence college, Easingwold, will have in advising local authorities on what organisation to adopt for their civil defence volunteers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: How to optimise the allocation of his time seems a matter best left to the principal's judgment in the light of his experience and the respective needs from time to time of the college and volunteer co-ordination. The precise organisation for volunteers is a matter for local authorities to decide in the light of the guidance available to them in Home Office circular ES 2/1981 and any advice offered by the principal.

Mr. Banks: Does my hon. Friend agree that volunteers in the civil defence movement are in the front line of that programme? Does he also agree that we need many more and better organised volunteers? Surely this matter would be better in the hands of one person, who would be better able to co-ordinate the activities of local authorities and other voluntary organisations?

Mr. Shaw: I entirely agree that it is important to recognise the importance of volunteers and to encourage them to join the civil defence movement. However, the decision regarding the principal will make the resources of the Civil Defence college available to him in his task of improving the recruitment and training of volunteers.

Dr. Glyn: As my hon. Friend has answered the main question, may I now ask him a more important question? In the event of hostilities, is my hon. Friend satisfied that, after regional government has been installed, the role of the Army will be sufficiently important and well established to view what will be essentially a military rather than a civilian capability? As the emergency will be dealt with by civilians who, incidentally, will not be elected, is my hon. Friend satisfied that the Army will be able to execute its duties?

Finally, I thank my hon. Friend for his work on this subject.

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend has asked a very fair question. The degree of co-operation between the civil defence and the military is already very close. Might I remind him that earlier this year we began an exercise in the north-west of the country which will bring together all the emergency services as a training exercise. That will include the Army's contribution, which is very important. May I conclude by wishing my hon. Friend a merry Christmas.

Mr. Hill: Will my hon. Friend say how any organisation of civil defence volunteers can be set up in local authority areas, such as Southampton, which declare themselves nuclear-free zones and take no precautions whatsoever? Have they some mysterious treaty with Moscow saying that they are nuclear-free zones and should be excluded——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is rather wide of Easingwold.

Crime Prevention

9. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will provide financial assistance to those local authorities wishing to introduce crime prevention schemes.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No, Sir. The Government are, however, making money available through the urban programme for local authority projects that contribute directly or indirectly to the reduction of crime or the alleviation of its effects; and the crime prevention unit which my right hon. and learned Friend set up within the Home Office last year is providing advice and assistance to local authorities in the design, introduction and evaluation of crime prevention initiatives.

Mr. Boyes: Given the increase in crime under the Government, does the Minister agree that the cash from the urban aid programme is simply not enough? Is he aware that many local authorities want to fit spy holes, chains and special locks to the homes of old-age pensioners? Is he further aware that the proposed £1 billion cut in capital spending announced yesterday will make these essential jobs even more difficult to carry out? My own local council has managed to equip 11,000 houses and the Opposition want more authorities to do that, does that not once again show theat it is we and not the Government who care for the elderly?

Mr. Shaw: I disagree with the hon. Member on that. There is plenty of opportunity for a well-organised local authority to make significant improvements connected with crime prevention, at absolutely minimal cost. The hon. Gentleman knows that there is a major campaign abroad to try to achieve just that.

Mr. Lawrence: Will my hon. Friend consider whether the best way in which he can increase the deterrents to burglary would be to give tax relief for the installation of burglar alarms and other home crime precautions? Perhaps he would consider discussing that with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Mr. Shaw: I am well aware of that argument, and my hon. and learned Friend is right to pose it. The question of giving any special relief from VAT obviously poses great difficulty, because it was designed as a broad-based tax. Frankly, I fear that tax is not really a suitable instrument for the fine adjustment needed to reflect other aspects of the Government's policy, such as crime prevention.

Mr. Corbett: Given that rising crime means a rise in the number of victims, how can the Minister defend spending only £46 million out of a budget of £3,000 million on law and order services to help the victims of crime?

Mr. Shaw: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. Victim relief is one of the important areas of crime prevention. We must make certain that society sees that it can properly care for the victims of crime. The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the substantial growth of the voluntary organisations, which are designed to do that.

Mr. Stanbrook: Instead of giving extra financial assistance to local authorities will my hon. Friend consider increasing the establishment of the Metropolitan police, which, after all, was fixed in 1965, since which time the demands upon its manpower have increased enormously? Why do we not give attention to increasing the policing of London's streets?

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend will, I know, be aware that the establishments are under review and, indeed, that there has been a modest increase in the establishment of the Metropolitan police this year, but he has a fair point.

Mr. Soley: Is it not time that the Minister gave up any pretence of crime prevention in much the same way as his hon. and learned Friend seems to have given up any pretence of racial equality? Is it not a fact that the crime figures released yesterday, which show a 9 per cent. increase on the third quarter of last year, demonstrate that this is not a Government of law and order, but a Government who utter pious platitudes on crime prevention and victim support at the same time as they sit back and watch disorder and crime rising throughout the country?

Mr. Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has done more than any of his predecessors to increase the effort to prevent crime. The fact that the crime figures were indeed a major disappointment yesterday should not distract attention from the major efforts made by the Government.

"Civil Defence—The Basic Facts"

10. Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to publish an updated version of "Civil Defence—The Basic Facts".

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes, Sir. Early next year.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Does the Minister recognise the need for a range of well-presented and readable books for the guidance of the increasing number of civil defence volunteers?

Mr. Shaw: I do indeed, and it is for that purpose that we are reviewing all the literature connected with civil defence.

Mr. Leigh: Will my hon. Friend be sending copies of the literature to Left-wing authorities, whose refusal to have anything to do with civil defence is a denial of their humanitarian duty to care for all people in peace and war?

Mr. Shaw: I shall be very pleased to do so, and to do more than merely send the literature. We intend to ensure that local authorities respond to the regulations of 1983.

Metropolitan Police (Code of Conduct)

11. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to put before the House of Commons his new code of professional conduct for the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Brittan: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that his handbook of guidance for professional conduct will be published in the new year. He intends at that stage to send copies personally to all hon. Members with constituencies in the Metropolitan police district. I shall arrange for copies to be placed in the Library of the House at the same time.

Mr. Atkinson: Is the Home Secretary aware that many well-informed people who are concerned with civil rights, and also with improving relations between the police and the public, are anxious to discuss the details of the code because they believe that it could be a contributory factor to both aspects? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman therefore do his best to encourage the Leader of the House to bring the code before the House for full debate as soon as possible in the new year?

Mr. Brittan: My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will have heard what the hon. Gentleman said. I cannot add to that, but I agree that the documents to be published are of great importance; and amount to a real effort by the police to deal with matters which affect us all.

I hope that I shall be allowed to pay tribute to the former deputy commissioner, Mr. Laugharne, who has been closely involved in the production of these substantial and creative documents, but who, sadly, had to resign earlier this month because of ill health.

Mr. Greenway: Has my right hon. and learned Friend seen some of the damaging and unpleasant documents produced by the so-called GLC police committee at a cost to public funds of some £8 million? Will he ensure that the morale of the Metropolitan police is not allowed to be damaged by the appalling activities of that committee?

Mr. Brittan: The morale of the Metropolitan police is much more dependent on the knowledge that it is doing a job in a very professional way, that it has the support of the overwhelming majority of the people of London and that the committee to which my hon. Friend referred has no standing or authority whatever.

Visitors (Entry Statistics)

12. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of visitors refused entry to the United Kingdom have been granted temporary admission between January 1984 and the latest available date.

Mr. Waddington: The information is not available in the form requested, but between 1 January and 30 September, which is the latest date for which figures are available, 6,358 passengers were granted temporary admission either pending completion of their examination or following refusal of leave to enter. During the corresponding period, a total of 13,400 people were refused leave to enter.

Mr. Lamond: As I am one of the hon. Members who have used as much influence as they have with Ministers to obtain temporary admission for relatives of their constituents—and I am not ashamed of that—may I draw the Minister's attention to the fact that, as far as I know, none of those for whom I obtained temporary admission did not present themselves for return to their home country? If that is the case, does it not suggest that the regulations are applied rather harshly, particularly at Heathrow? They seem to trap many people who are perfectly innocent visitors to this country.

Mr. Waddington: I do not think so, but obviously it is my duty to see that immigration officers carry out theirs correctly and do not refuse admission unless they are not satisfied that a person is a genuine visitor. I remind the House that temporary admission is an alternative to detention and not a substitute for admission as a visitor, and that temporary admission should properly arise only when hon. Members believe that they have a proper case to put the Minister on the ground that the immigration officer has made a mistake.

I have a further comment that is relevant to the attack made a moment ago by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). In 1983, 7,292 people were granted temporary admission, compared with 3,874 in 1978. So much for the draconian enforcement of the law by the Conservative Government. We have granted temporary admission far more often than the Labour Government did.

Sir Dudley Smith: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that my experience as one who represents an area of high immigration with many visitors is that he is extremely fair and even-handed in dealing with the matter?

Mr. Waddington: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for saying that. The matter has to be put in perspective. Lower than 1 per cent. of those coming from the Indian subcontinent were refused entry last year. Again in reply to the ridiculous attack made by the right hon. Member for Gorton, that refusal rate is similar to the refusal rate under the Labour Government.

Mr. Dubs: Is it not the truth that the way in which visitors are treated at Heathrow airport and other points of entry is racially discriminatory? Is it not the truth that most visitors who are refused entry are black or come from the Asian subcontinent and that the device of temporary admission provides one way for the Home Office to take some of the heat off itself? Finally, will the Minister confirm that the tiny proportion of those granted temporary admission who do not leave the country on the due date is a sign that almost all those people should have been allowed in as of right?

Mr. Waddington: I do not for one moment concede that the system is racially discriminatory. However, if the system is racially discriminatory now, it was certainly racially discriminatory under the Labour Government. It has not changed one iota since the hon. Gentleman's party was in office, except that we are more generous on temporary admission than the Labour Government ever were.

Coal Industry Dispute

13. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will instigate a public inquiry into the policing of the mining dispute.

Mr. Brittan: No, Sir.

Mr. Barron: Does the Home Secretary accept that many right hon. and hon. Members will be dismayed by that answer? Will he explain why the Minister of State with responsibility for the police, the hon. Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw), made an unannounced visit to my constituency and visited four collieries, yet spoke neither to striking miners nor to others in the community who have had to live with a massive police presence for the past 10 months? Like many other hon. Members, I see that kind of action by Ministers as nothing short of irresponsible.

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to know what goes on in his own constituency. My hon. Friend did have meetings with community representatives and representatives of the National Union of Mineworkers, but that does not seem to relate to the question. I am happy to elaborate on the answer by saying that, given the opportunity for any action to be tested in the courts—as has happened—and for any complaint against the police to be ventilated through the statutory mechanism, I see no need for an inquiry such as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mrs. Currie: Does my right hon. and learned Friend recognise the gratitude of working miners all over the country, and especially those in my constituency, to the police, who have enabled them to go to work safely? Will he join me, on behalf of those working miners, in wishing all the policemen who have helped them a very happy Christmas and a more peaceful new year?

Mr. Brittan: I do so gladly.

Mr. Kaufman: Is it not a fact that through the miasma of distortion which the Government have created on this issue the Home Secretary was forced to admit yesterday in his press notice about crime that the number of notifiable offences in connection with the miners' dispute has not had any material effect on national crime figures, despite the fact that under his stewardship crime has risen in the past year by 9 per cent. and now stands at near national record levels? Is it not in the interests of the police and the public that we know exactly what takes place on picket lines and that a public figure such as Lord Scarman is put in charge of an independent public inquiry?

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. Gentleman has not begun to make out a case for such an inquiry. He merely seeks to cloak his own embarrassment at what is being done in the name of the Labour movement.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Pawsey asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 December.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend is paying an official visit to Hong Kong.

Mr. Pawsey: While thanking my right hon. Friend for that imaginative answer, may I draw his attention to events nearer home, specifically to the visit of the Russian delegation to the United Kingdom? The visit is receiving much favourable comment and seems to be heralding a thaw in the cold war. Will my right hon. Friend say whether he feels that that will continue, and comment on its implications for increased trade between Britain and the Soviet Union?

Mr. Biffen: I hope earnestly that my hon. Friend is right in saying that the visit will presage an improvement in relations between the Soviet Union and Great Britain. It does no harm to reflect that at various stages in our national destinies the people of Russia and of the United Kingdom have been joined in a common and vital interest.

I believe that our prospects of increasing our trade with the Soviet Union will depend upon our competitiveness, as happens elsewhere.

Mr. Kinnock: Apart from his personal friendship with the Secretary of State for Defence, what can possibly justify the appointment of Mr. Peter Levene as Chief of Defence Procurement? By accepting a mere £95,000 a year, does the right hon. Gentleman think that Mr. Levene is pricing himself into a job?

Mr. Biffen: No, but I can say this: my right hon. Friend is in a good position to judge who should fulfil this vitally important task, and in going to the world outside Whitehall he is merely repeating past practice with Lord Rayner. My right hon. Friend's actions will stand every test.

Mr. Kinnock: Yes, but why £95,000 a year, and why this particular individual? Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that Opposition Members and many other people, in the House and elsewhere, think that the appointment and everything connected with it stinks?

Mr. Biffen: One of the privileges of this place is that people may make easy and cheap jibes at those outside without having to take the consequences. The task of managing an £8,000 million budget is formidable indeed, and the price tag of a salary of £95,000 a year is not unrelated to what will be returned to the private sector.

Mr. Kinnock: Many things may be said about Mr. Levene, but at £95,000 a year for five years he certainly is not coming cheap. Will the right hon. Gentleman now answer my question? What possible justification can there be for an appointment at double the salary of the current appointee, and what justification can there be in savings to the national Exchequer and effective defence procurement? Is it not a fact that the whole recent history of the nature of the Government's relationship with this man has given grounds for great suspicion?

Mr. Biffen: The judgment of Mr. Levene's ability was made by my right hon. Friend. A man who successfully executes a job at £95,000 a year is a damn sight cheaper than a failure at half that salary.

Hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Andy Stewart: In view of the historic decisions by the Nottinghamshire NUM today to take steps to protect its members, would my right hon. Friend like to give a Christmas message to Arthur Scargill?

Mr. Biffen: As this is a period of charity before Christmas, I wish to make it quite clear that my last exchange with the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition should not in any sense be construed as casting a reflection on Mr. Perry. Indeed, I am prepared to exemplify a spirit of charity in respect of those outside the House who cannot answer back. That is sadly lacking in the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Wareing.

Mr. Biffen: May I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart), to whose question I am still replying, that my message to Mr. Scargill is very simple. There exists a NACODS' agreement which provides an excellent framework for a return to the negotiating table.

Q2. Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wareing: Will the Leader of the House say what is the Prime Minister's view of the fact that while delicate negotiations are being carried out with Mr. Gorbachev and the Supreme Soviet delegation, the Reagan Administration is precipitously awarding defence projects in order to make progress on star wars technology? Where is the special relationship now?

Mr. Biffen: There is absolutely no inconsistency in being a loyal member of NATO and a strong supporter of the United States presence in that organisation, while at the same time expressing the view about star wars technology that we have recently done.

Mr. Soames: Does my right hon. Friend agree that to televise the proceedings of the House would be a thoroughly bad thing?

Mr. Biffen: That is a matter for individual judgment. No doubt when, in due course, we have had the opportunity to assess an experiment in another place, we shall have a chance to convert the matter from a generalised observation to a specific vote.

Q3. Mr. Willie Hamilton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 20 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hamilton: Reverting to the question asked by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, I wonder whether the Leader of the House accepts that the Prime Minister, as the First Lord of the Treasury, must have approved that salary of £95,000, while at the same time she was lecturing workers to the effect that the only way that they can get jobs was by accepting lower wages. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell her, when she comes back from world junketing at the taxpayers' expense, that the natives are getting increasingly restive and angry at the overt corruption and incompetence of her Government?

Mr. Biffen: Of course my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister approved the appointment and salary to which the hon. Gentleman refers. Doubtless, in making her judgment, she took account of the fact that Mr. Levene was earning a great deal more in the private sector. The hon. Gentleman referred to the corruption of the Government——

Mr. Hamilton: Hear, hear.

Mr. Biffen: He now re-emphasises that. That language falls easily from the hon. Gentleman's lips, but I must tell him that it is more likely to consolidate support for the Conservative party than anything else.

Q4. Mr. Brinton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Brinton: Does my right hon. Friend agree that after the festive season those of us who are lucky enough will have to pay a little attention to our weight? Does he also agree that we might be healthier if, after Christmas, the Government pay a little more attention to reducing the total of public expenditure instead of finding new ways to tax us?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the Government will be happy to turn their energies in that direction, and I am very hopeful that they will be fully supported by those on the Benches behind me.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Bearing in mind the need for care on the sensitive issue of former civil servants transferring to public companies, will the right hon. Gentleman tell us whether it was part of the deal that Frank Cooper, former permanent secretary at the Ministry of Defence, should become chairman of Mr. Peter Levene's former company?

Mr. Biffen: It was not part of the deal.

Mr. Pike: Does the Leader of the House recognise the severe concern of householders throughout the country at the announcement of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment this week which has made it virtually impossible for many councils to meet the requirements for improvement and repair grants? Indeed, many councils in the year ahead will not even be able to meet the commitment for mandatory grants. Will he give the assurance that the Cabinet will reconsider this and make more money available so that councils can meet the urgent requirements for housing needs?

Mr. Biffen: This matter was debated considerably yesterday. The factors which the hon. Gentleman mentioned were undoubtedly uppermost in the minds of those who took part in the vote that concluded that debate. I do not believe that this subject is likely to be reopened, but all these matters are subjects of continuing political concern.

Q5. Mr. Amess asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 20 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Amess: Following the most reasonable rate limitation settlement placed upon Basildon district council, does my right hon. Friend agree that the council will still be able to provide excellent services, but should stop wasting ratepayers' money on propaganda exercises such as the recent advertisements placed in The House Magazine?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that my hon. Friend is in a good position to judge what can be done by Basildon council in the context of rate limitation, and I am most encouraged by his view.

Mr. Hume: Is the Leader of the House aware of a recent inquest decision in Northern Ireland which found that an innocent housewife had been killed by a plastic bullet? Is he further aware that an investigation by an inspector of the RUC found that the police evidence to that inquest was completely false and that evidence given under oath that is completely false is called perjury? Will he ask his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General why he will not reopen this case?

Mr. Biffen: Clearly I cannot comment on the facts of the case, but I shall undertake the hon. Gentleman's requests.

Q9. Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Leigh: What deep cultural service to the nation is provided by a pop station such as BBC Radio 1 which should prevent it for ever more from being financed by advertising?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point which will be undoubtedly be included in the wider debate about the BBC licence fee, which the House will consider after the recess.

Mr. Tony Banks: When the Leader of the House next sees his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, will he ask her to drop her personal veto against Miss Sarah Keays being included on the Conservative party list of approved candidates? Such a veto is a discrimination against both women and single-parent families.

Mr. Biffen: That really tells us more about the hon. Gentleman than it does about the Conservative candidates' list.

Q10. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. MacKay: Will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity to put into perspective the week's events, both here in Westminster and abroad, and point out to the House that the most historic event has been the signing in Peking? That has led to an improvement in Anglo-Chinese relationships, and will also lead to increased trade with China.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. As our future foreign policy will increasingly be related to influence, as opposed to actual executive power, there is no doubt that our relationship with the Far East will turn considerably on the future role and status of Hong Kong.

Q16. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Banks: When the Leader of the House sees his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, will he ask her to come to the Dispatch Box and condemn picket line violence by the police?

Mr. Biffen: That is the most obvious and plain wife-beating question that I have ever heard asked. I have no intention of responding.

Q17. Mr. Thurnham asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my right hon. Friend ask the Prime Minister if she has full confidence that the BBC can give a good service to the public and advertise?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly pass on that point to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, but I suggest to my hon. Friend that these are arguments that are awaiting the debate, which will come reasonably soon.

Mr. Ryman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Directly arising out of questions?

Mr Ryman: I wonder whether you will give the House some guidance on the following point, Mr. Speaker, which arose during questions to the Home Secretary? One of the Ministers answering them, who is not on the Front Bench now, was the Minister of State, the hon. and learned Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Waddington). He repeatedly gave inordinate and repetitious answers which took so long that it prevented other hon. Members who had legitimate supplementary questions to ask from being called. Will you consider that practice and condemn it when it arises again?

Mr. Speaker: I must say to the hon. Member that I made mention of that at the time. That was why I allowed a rather larger number of supplementary questions from Back Benchers on that question.

Ms. Clare Short: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The same Minister of State, Home Office who is no longer on the Front Bench, in my view abused his position at the Dispatch Box to give a very distorted account of the case of one of my constituents where there is a small——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is an attempt to continue Question Time. The hon. Lady made that point during Question Time on a point of order and I cannot take it again now.

Animal Experiments (Petition)

3.32 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): May I ask for your advice, Mr. Speaker? This morning at noon, three hon. Members of this House presented a petition signed by 300,000 members of the public against animal experiments outside the Home Office——

Hon. Members: "Inside."

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does this arise out of questions?

Mr. Banks: No, not out of questions but on a separate point of order.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. Member has started I shall allow him to continue.

Mr. Banks: I am seeking your advice because after the petition was presented, the three Members of Parliament were subjected to what can only be described as offensive abuse from the Metropolitan police. We were trying to carry out our duties as hon. Members of this House and I would ask you to rule, Mr. Speaker, whether interference by the Metropolitan police in charging two hon. Members of this House and my personal assistant with obstruction was in fact——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot possibly rule on a matter which is sub judice.

Questions to Ministers

3.34 pm

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Prime Minister's Questions today consisted of 108 questions, 105 of which were exactly the same. I thought that a lot of time was wasted, first, by the Leader of the House having to repeat the same answer each time a question was raised and, secondly, by the calling of Members who were not here to ask their questions. Therefore, several of us did not have the opportunity of asking a question. I suggest that instead of a draw being made a fortnight before of questions that are exactly the same, so that hon. Members come to the Chamber and are called in that order, we should have an open 15 minute session in which members are called at random by you, Mr. Speaker. Thus, we can ask a straightforward question and not have to waste time with the answers such as the Leader of the House was giving today.

Mr. Speaker: The answer, as the hon. Gentleman knows, is that if he feels strongly about it he should raise the matter with the Procedure Committee. What I do at Question Time, in so far as possible, is to ensure that those hon. Members who have questions on the Order Paper are called. That is why we reached Question 17 today.

Mr. Boyes: Further to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), three policemen were involved—No. AC 871, No.——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot entertain that question.

Business of the House

3.36 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for the week after the recess?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for the first week after the Christmas Adjournment will be as follows:

Wednesday 9 January — Second Reading of the Shipbuilding Bill.

Remaining stages of the New Towns and Urban Development Corporations Bill and of the Mineral Workings Bill.

Thursday 10 January—Second Reading of the Milk (Cessation of Production) Bill.

Debate on European Community Documents on fisheries relating to the overall arrangements for total allowable catches and quotas for 1985. The relevant document numbers will appear in the Official Report.

Friday 11 January—Debate on the fourth report from the Select Committee on the Environment on acid rain, House of Commons Paper No. 446, and the relevant Government observations Cmnd 9397. The Debate will arise on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

[Debate on fisheries documents on Thursday 10 January 1985:

Relevant Documents

(a) 10171/84 Fishery total allowable catches in Community waters, 1985

(b) 10264/84 Fish guide prices 1985

(c) 10697/84 Fishery Conservation, technical measures

(d) 11515/84 Quotas for 1985

(e) 11452/84 Member state quotas for Norwegian waters 1985

(f) 11453/84 Norwegian fishing in Community waters

(g) 11451/84 Member state quotas. Faroese waters

(h) 11450/84 Faroese fishing in Community waters

(i) 11423/1/84 Spanish fishing in Community waters

(j) 11513/84 Member state quotas in Greenland waters

Relevant Reports of European Legislation Committee

(a) HC 5-i (1984-85), para. 4

(b) HC 5-i (1984-85), para. 3

(c) HC 5-iv (1984-85), para. 6]

Mr. Kinnock: On this side of the House and, I suspect, elsewhere there will be concern that the debate on the fourth report on acid rain from the Select Committee on the Environment is to be taken on a Friday. In view of the importance of this issue, may I urge the Leader of the House to reconsider that decision and to arrange the debate at a time which permits a wider involvement of hon. Members?

May I also press the right hon. Gentleman to provide time in the early part of next year for a debate on the threatened closures of post offices? This subject clearly concerns hon. Members on both sides of the House, it is viewed with growing alarm by the general public and that would be an appropriate time to discuss the issue.

May we look forward in our first week back to a statement by the Secretary of State for Defence both on the appointment of Mr. Peter Levene as chief of procurement and, especially in view of the evidence given to the Select Committee on Defence in the earlier part of this year, the appointment of Sir Frank Cooper to United Scientific Holdings as replacement for Mr. Levene?

When may we expect to have the Budget in 1985?

Will the right hon. Gentleman assure us that we shall have a debate on housing and home improvements after the Prime Minister has returned from her foreign travel, as the Tory Whips will not then be able to use the excuse of her alleged embarrassment in order to get unwilling Members into the Lobby in support of the Government?

Mr. Biffen: The plan to hold the debate on the report on acid rain on a Friday is, I realise, disappointing to the right hon. Gentleman. However, I believe that the House must accept that a Friday is a legitimate day on which to consider major business as we now get on to the Adjournment at 2.30 pm on such days. As the right hon. Gentleman has made the request, the matter will be considered through the usual channels, but I must say that there is a very strong presumption on my part that such reports are legitimate matters for Friday business.

Perhaps the question of the closure of post offices can be considered through the usual channels. I acknowledge that interest in it has been shown from the Opposition Front Bench.

Although I noted the wish that yesterday's debate should be re-run, just as yesterday's margin was greater than had been popularly expected, I suspect that a re-run would be even more comforting. However, I have noted the right hon. Gentleman's concern.

I will, of course, consider through the usual channels the question of a statement on the defence matters to which he referred.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer intends to introduce his Budget on Tuesday 19 March 1985. I hope that it will be for the convenience of the House to know the date so early.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the recent review of the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers' static workshops is throwing hundreds of people out of work, including almost 200 in my constituency? Is he further aware that there is widespread resentment in my constituency because no statement has been made on the Floor of the House and no debate has so far been permitted? I urge the Government to allow a debate in Government time so that hon. Members who are affected are not left merely with the chance of an Adjournment debate on the subject in the small hours of the morning.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises a point which is serious for his constituents and is of national import also. I must tell him candidly that no Government time is available during the first week after the recess and I therefore suggest that he uses whatever opportunities are available to hon. Members.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): Will the Leader of the House urgently consider bringing before the House legislation to control the activities of retired senior civil servants, bearing in mind the fact that if Sir Frank Cooper says much more than "Good morning" at his first United Scientific Holdings board meeting he will probably be in breach of section 2 of the Official Secrets Act?

Mr. Biffen: In his good natured remarks the hon. Gentleman avoided saying that Sir Frank will have allowed to elapse the required period before he can enter private service. There is no prospect of the legislation suggested by the hon. Gentleman being introduced.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): Will the Leader of the House consider arranging an early debate on civil defence? In view of the obvious diversion of opinion on both sides of the House, it would be advantageous to clear up these matters.

Mr. Biffen: I shall take on board my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that one of the first tasks for the Prime Minister when we meet again will be to come to the Dispatch Box and make a statement on Mr. Levene's appointment? Is the withdrawal of the Whip from a Tory peer intended as a warning to some of his right hon. and hon. Friends about their behaviour in 1985?

Mr. Biffen: If the hon. Gentleman knew a little more about all the factors related to his second point, he would not detain the House with such a matter. On his first point, the hon. Gentleman will have noted the reply that I gave to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): Will my right hon. Friend tell the House when it will have an opportunity to debate the report of the Public Accounts Committee on the evasion of vehicle excise duty?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot do so. However, there is a mechanism for parliamentary consideration of such reports. The issue is serious and I take note of what my hon. Friend says.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): As all hon. Members understand the importance of obeying the law, will the Leader of the House provide an early opportunity in 1985 to debate the matter as hundreds of thousands of private companies deliberately defy the law by refusing to file their accounts or annual reports at Companies House? Many firms also defy the law with respect to wages councils. As the law exists, does not the right hon. Gentleman believe that it should be obeyed by everybody and that we should have a brief debate on that in 1985?

Mr. Biffen: I note the hon. Gentleman's point, which is substantial and long-standing. However, there is no prospect of Government time for such a debate early in the new year.

Mr. Matthew Parris (Derbyshire, West): In view of the fact that the south-west water authority—and, no doubt, other similar authorities—intends to introduce new water rates in mid-February, will my right hon. Friend tell the House when the Government's proposals for the new rating arrangements will be put to the House for approval, especially as some of us find the proposed water rates totally unacceptable?

Mr. Biffen: If my hon. Friend is referring to the rate support grant, he will not have to wait too long.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): May I reinforce the question about changing the date of the debate on the report on acid rain and ask the Leader of the House for a debate on the closure of post offices before they are closed? May I also ask the Leader of the House to arrange for a debate on the Floor of the House of the prayer tabled by my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Housing Benefit Amendment (No. 4) Regulations 1984, because the House will no doubt wish to have clarification of the Government's motives in withdrawing housing benefits from miners who are paying rent to their relatives for their accommodation?

Mr. Biffen: I shall look into the question of the prayer that the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

He will appreciate that the more one argues for matters to be taken on the Floor of the House, the more one underlines the importance of Friday as a constructive day in the parliamentary week.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): In view of the Government's problems with the Civil Aviation Bill, will my right hon. Friend consider having an early debate on the report on the expansion at Stansted, because such a debate might show the Government the way in which opinion in the House is moving and enable them to inform the proceedings of the Committee on the Bill?

Mr. Biffen: As my hon. Friend may have noted, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is to make a statement this afternoon on the first matter. On the second point, I realise the general desire for an early debate on the inspectors' report, but a number of hon. Members have informed me that they want a certain amount of time to assess the formidable volume of evidence that is contained in the report.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): In view of the positive response that there has been to the visit of Mr. Gorbachev and the rest of the IPU delegation—although, in fact, all Mr. Gorbachev said was already on offer, and was either concealed or distorted—would not it be a good idea to assist the drawing together of our two countries by having at least a statement from the Dispatch Box about what has been done in our name at the Stockholm confidence-building conference, which has now been going on for almost a year?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): Has my right hon. Friend noted the report in this morning's newspapers that the Liberal party is to press for the reduction of the voting age to 16? Will he reassure us that the House will not waste time debating such a scatty notion?

Mr. Biffen: If such a proposal were ruled to be in order, there would be absolutely nothing I could do about it, but I think that the House would thoroughly enjoy the debate.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): Is the Leader of the House aware that it is more than five years since the Royal Commission on legal services presented its report to the House, and that, although there have been several requests for a debate on this important subject, no time has been given for it by the Government? Does the right hon. Gentleman hold out any realistic prospect of having a debate on the report in the foreseeable future?

Mr. Biffen: I regret to tell the hon. Gentleman that there is no prospect of such a debate taking place during the first week after we return from the Christmas recess, but I shall of course bear in mind his anxiety.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): As local authorities clearly have a great deal of trouble with housing—sometimes it is of a very low standard—will the Government, when they bring back their proposals on housing expenditure, put forward proposals to encourage the expansion of the private rented sector and to encourage some local authorities to divest to the private sector some of their housing assets so that they may be better managed and at less cost to the public?

Mr. Biffen: The best thing I can do is to draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is the Leader of the House aware that, during last night's Adjournment debate and the debate on the Consolidated Fund, there were repeated references to two documents — one produced by the five academic accountants, which has been revised and published this week in the "Accountancy" magazine, and the other the London Business School document—both of which challenge the National Coal Board's accountancy arrangements? Is he aware that he himself repeatedly alludes to "frameworks for negotiation"? In so far as those documents could provide the basis on which negotiations could take place, does he agree that the House of Commons deserves a statement so that we may all learn the truth about the value of NCB figures?

Mr. Biffen: I certainly see no prospect of a debate on that topic during the week we come back. It will be up to the people who conduct the negotiations within the coal industry to assess the documents.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Silberston report on restraints on trade in textiles and clothing caused concern in those areas which are dependent for employment on such industries? As there has not been a major debate on textiles during this Parliament, will he endeavour to arrange one as soon as possible and before the Government form a view prior to the MFA negotiations?

Mr. Biffen: I recognise the very important role that textile industries play in many constituencies and, therefore, the influence they have upon the time of the House. I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to the point that has been made.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): May I make my annual appeal to the Leader of the House to allow time to consider the awful and uncompassionate state of the law and practice on shoplifting? Meanwhile, will he join me in urging shoppers who wish to have a pleasant Christmas free from fear to take very great care not to be wrongly charged with that offence?

Mr. Biffen: I did not realise that the hon. and learned Gentleman made the appeal but once a year. Of course I take note of what he says.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Will my right hon. Friend follow his normal practice and let the House know what the business will be on Monday 14 January?

Mr. Biffen: No. It is not customary to announce Monday's business when one makes a statement before a recess.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Since the Government came to power on the promise of protecting our freedoms, does not the Leader of the House think that we should have a debate on the further erosion of those freedoms when the major clearing banks have written to every branch of every bank asking for details of the private bank accounts of NUM employees at Sheffield? Does not he also think that we should have a discussion on the powers given to the sequestrators, which apparently are the same powers as those provided by the Act dealing with enemies and aliens during the last war?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the hon. Lady will realise that there was a debate on the matter of the sequestrators earlier today. I cannot helpfully comment on the first point, but the hon. Lady may like to pursue the matter as a private Member.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): As one of those pressing my right hon. Friend to find time to debate the report of the Select Committee on the Environment on acid rain, may I thank him very much for finding that time in the first week after the Christmas recess? As for the rather surprising and churlish remarks of one or two hon. Members about the debate being arranged for a Friday, will he accept—at least from myself—thanks for his courtesy in giving 22 days' notice, which means that even the most tardy Member of Parliament should be able to arrange his constituency engagements in order to be here?

Mr. Biffen: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind and reassuring comments.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Does the Leader of the House recall that on Monday the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a statement about the Bank of England's commitment of £75 million towards the Johnson Matthey rescue when he either was misleading the House or being misled by the people concerned, because, according to today's information, that £75 million has now risen to £100 million, and there are forecasts that the Bank of England —the taxpayers' bank—will have to be committed to figures in excess even of that?

In view of that statement and those events, would it not be sensible for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make another statement? Even more important, should not we have a debate on the affair so that the Government are not caught as previous Governments were caught when the Crown Agents were involved in similar difficulties with the result that we did not have a debate on the matter until the Crown Agents were in debt to the tune of over £200 million?

Mr. Biffen: I understand that the £100 million to which the hon. Gentleman refers is a post-rescue transaction from the Bank of England to its new subsidiary, Johnson Matthey Bankers Ltd. It is a normal banking transaction and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor did not know of the deposit on Monday. There is no reason why he should have known.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): In view of the forthcoming Geneva talks and the great interest both in the House and in the country on these matters, will my hon. Friend see whether he can arrange a debate on arms control soon after our return?

Mr. Biffen: While I fully accept the importance of the topic to which my hon. Friend refers, I confess that I cannot see the likelihood of Government time being available for such a debate in the near future.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Will the Leader of the House take more seriously the request for a debate in Government time on the mining dispute in view of the fact that at least two accountants' reports published in the last month have seriously criticised and undermined the National Coal Board's basis for its pit closure programme?

Mr. Biffen: I do not accept the immaculate validity of those accountants' reports which are endorsed by the hon. Gentleman. There is no likelihood of such a debate on the mining industry being held in the first week after the Christmas recess. The reason is the formidable and important programme of legislation that I announced a few moments ago. However, we shall keep the matter under consideration.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend arrange an early debate on the latest report of the Top Salaries Review Body and allow it to range as widely as before to enable hon. Members to consider whether some Opposition Members give value for money? Will he also commend the Attorney-General for the excellent pressure that he is bringing to bear on the students union of the polytechnic of North London which sent £5,000 of public money to striking miners? The Attorney-General's actions in this matter are greatly appreciated, and I hope that he will see them through.

Mr. Biffen: As to my hon. Friend's first point, I shall certainly refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I note with gratitude the comments on the second point.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): Will the Leader of the House assure us that the Government will provide time for a full day's debate on regional assistance? He will recall that a large number of hon. Members tried to speak on the subject when a statement was made earlier this month. He must recognise that serious concern is still felt about the Government's policy on regional assistance.

Mr. Biffen: I am happy to confirm that we shall have a full day's debate on regional aid. I cannot state precisely when, but it should be soon.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): In view of two recent perverted and disgraceful cases of sexual offences involving children, will my right hon. Friend arrange for a statement to be made following the meetings that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has had today? The public deserve to know that this can be controlled and cut out at a stroke.

Mr. Biffen: I can assure my hon. Friend that I shall refer his anxiety on this immensely important topic to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Will my right hon. Friend ensure that we do not waste any of the House's time debating the manic and ludicrous suggestion made in the early hours of this morning by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) that members of the security forces are roaming round the country bumping off ladies to filch documents relating to the Belgrano?

Mr. Biffen: I can promise that no Government time will be made available for such a debate and certainly not in the first week after the recess.

Civil Aviation Bill

3.58 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short statement about the Civil Aviation Bill.

The House gave the Bill a Second Reading on 21 November, by a majority of 78, and committed it to Standing Committee F for consideration. However, on two separate occasions, Tuesday 11 December and Tuesday 18 December, the Committee voted against the sittings motion.

The Bill is required whatever decisions are taken in relation to the inspector's report on Stansted and terminal 5. The Government will need the powers in the Bill if at any time it is decided to impose a limit on air transport movements at any British Airports Authority airport for environmental reasons. Equally it will need the powers, even if the environmental limit at Heathrow were not imposed, because both Heathrow and Gatwick are rapidly approaching the point when demand for runway space will exceed the physical capacity for extended periods of the day.

Proceeding with the Bill would not therefore have prejudiced the decision that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and I will have to take on the inspector's report. Nevertheless, the Government suggest that further consideration of the Bill be postponed until that decision has been taken.

I note that the Chairman has reconvened the Committee for 12 February. I must make it clear to the House that it is very likely that no decision on Stansted/T5 will be possible by then. We shall therefore in due course seek to arrange through the usual channels with the Chairman when the Committee shall meet again.

I hope that this procedure will be in accordance with the wishes of the House.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that with a little common sense on his part this problem would not have occurred? Will he accept that it is entirely due to his own arrogance that this unique public humiliation is taking place this afternoon? How can he say that when the chairman of the Heathrow scheduling committee and the British Airports Authority have both indicated that the true physical capacity of Heathrow is greatly in excess of the present ATM limit? If there is such a problem, why on earth is the right hon. Gentleman refusing international flights into Manchester, to give one example?

"demand for runway space will exceed the physical capacity"

When does the Secretary of State anticipate the announcement regarding Stansted and terminal 5? Is it the Government's intention to hold a debate in the new year on United Kingdom aviation and airports policy? I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that the Government should follow the example of the last Labour Government and publish a White Paper embracing both airports and aviation so that we can see what their national policy is, if they have one.

Will the announcement today further delay the privatisation of British Airways? If so, does the right hon. Gentleman anticipate a painful interview when the Prime Minister returns? The long distance praise from Peking which appeared on his behalf in this morning's newspapers might in some circles be likened to the vote of confidence received by the average football league manager shortly before the axe descends on his neck.

Mr. Ridley: It is usual for the Government, when a Bill has received a sizeable majority on Second Reading, to proceed to take the Bill through Committee. I have never before heard anyone suggest that it is arrogant to frustrate the will of the majority of the House. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that again he has got it wrong. It is not only a question of annual capacity into Heathrow and Gatwick; it is a question of capacity at certain times of the day and certain times of the year. Without these powers, congestion will occur.

I cannot possibly forecast or guess when my right hon. Friend and I will be in a position to give a decision on the inspector's report into Stansted and terminal 5. Also, any example from the last Labour Government will certainly be eschewed by this Government as being a dangerous precedent to follow. Furthermore, it is of no relevance to talk of the future of British Airways on this statement.

Sir Humphrey Atkins (Spelthorne): Does my right hon. Friend recollect that it is almost exactly five years since his precedessor with responsibility for these matters, Sir John Nott, together with the then Secretary of State for the Environment, now the Secretary of State for Defence, issued a statement confirming that the Government intended to impose a limit of 275,000 air traffic movements at Heathrow? The statement was well received by hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of Londoners and others affected by Heathrow who are looking to him to honour the Conservative Government's promise.

Mr. Ridley: My right hon. Friend is completely correct. The Government have attempted to honour that promise by introducing a Bill and by taking it to Committee. Those who have frustrated the progress in Committee are those whom he must blame if it proves impossible to get the legislative powers to implement that limit. To boot, I have been called arrogant by the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) for attempting to do that. Will he at least tell his constituents where the blame might lie?

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I came to the House this afternoon to praise him for the statement which I understood he was to make? Does he recognise that he is in danger of risking a certain amount of exasperation among his colleagues if he persists in believing that there is no connection between the contents of the Bill and the decision on airports policy? Does he further recognise that he will exasperate hon. Members if he does not realise that he must not pick and choose between the pledges that he honours?

Mr. Ridley: I think that on this matter praise from my hon. Friend could prejudice my quasi-judicial role in relation to the inquiry. If the Government did not proceed with the Bill, they would appear to be accepting one part of the inspector's recommendations, which might prejudice our position.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): As the Secretary of State has missed the plane, will he give the House an assurance that he will miss the bus and bury his plans to abolish public bus services and most of the concessionary fares?

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I thank my right hon. Friend for persevering with help for the environment of those who live around Heathrow, but may I remind him that in the terminal 4 inquiry the inspector recommended a maximum of 260,000 ATMs as the limit of what the environment could take? Furthermore, does not my right hon. Friend find it remarkable that, although the Liberal party claims to care about the environment, the Liberal representative on the Committee, the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross), helped to defeat the sittings motion?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is right, and he is absolutely correct to say that the Liberal party does not show the consistency in these matters of which I am accused, although such consistency seems to me correct.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Will the Secretary of State accept that my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) clearly shares the views of many Conservative Members—views of which the Secretary of State was clearly not aware? He needs time over the recess to digest the content not only of the report but of the views of his own party. Only when that has been done and there has been a debate on Stansted and on putting airports into the regions, where they and the jobs are needed, will the House be in a fit state to consider the Bill again, either in Committee or on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Ridley: Yes, but it will be of considerable comfort to my hon. Friends whose constituencies are situated around Heathrow to be able to point out that the Liberal party is not in favour of protecting their environment but has voted against proceeding with the Bill which would have had that effect, and that the Liberal party is more interested in frustrating the majority of the House than in protecting that environment.

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): May I thank and congratulate my right hon. Friend on making this decision. It will enable us to consider all questions relating to airports in a saner and more realistic way.

Mr. Ridley: I thank my hon. Friend and express the pious hope that when the Government finally bring forward across-the-board proposals for airports he will express that same support.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The Secretary of State has made it clear that the problem is about peak air traffic movements. Will he tell the House why the Government are making plans to deal with peak air problems and not with continuous and urgent problems for public expenditure on housing and health?

Mr. Ridley: The Bill under discussion has no implications for public expenditure. Also, it is not only an airport peak problem. The powers in the Bill would enable the Government to impose the environmental limit on Heathrow, as is the pledge given by predecessors in my office and which the people living around Heathrow expect the Government to give.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): We on the Standing Committee are certainly keen that my right hon. Friend's quasi-judicial position should in no way be prejudiced but would it not have been better had he come to the House and said unequivocally that he intended to withdraw the Bill in its entirety until he had decided on an airports policy? Any fudging of the air transport movements limit question is impossible as in paragraph 1A of the report the inspector says that the 275,000 limit is unjustifiable on environmental grounds because the noise criteria will no longer apply as from next year there will be new noise regulations and quieter engines. Furthermore, the air traffic control considerations will not apply — the scheduling committee itself gave that evidence to the Transport Committee. Will not my right hon. Friend listen to the advice of British Airways, which also says that the limit is entirely unjustifiable?

Mr. Ridley: Surely the boot is on the other foot. Would not my hon. Friend be prepared to listen to the other side of the case that he has just put and to the reasons why to have proceeded with the Bill would not have had the effect that he fears and would certainly not have prejudiced the decision on Stansted? Instead of being prepared to listen to those arguments, he preferred to vote in favour of the debate being terminated. Does that mean that he does not have quite the faith in his own arguments that he suggests?

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Given that the Secretary of State has had to bow to the democratic process brought about by his hon. Friends and by my hon. Friends and has had to accept the need for a proper review of airports policy and a debate on the Floor of the House, will he also guarantee that the democratic process will be maintained and that there will be a vote in the House on a motion on Stansted and that he will agree to be bound by that decision?

Mr. Ridley: My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, who is listening to this interchange of views, has made it clear that there will be a debate on the Stansted terminal 5 issue. I am sure that I am right to leave the form and nature of that debate to him.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Is my right hon. Friend aware that it would be entirely wrong to allow the opinions of the planning inspector, who is no more than an adviser and whose report differed from that of the previous inspector who reported on the fourth terminal, to override the clear commitments of the Government to millions of people living around Heathrow?

Mr. Ridley: I agree that it is difficult when two distinguished inspectors reach entirely opposite views on the matter, but the Government have tried to secure the legislation that is necessary to impose such a limit and, as my hon. Friend knows only too well, we could not have tried harder. If we do not succeed, he will know precisely who is to blame. May I make it clear that it was not only three of my hon. Friends but a large number of Opposition Members—[HON. MEMBERS: "All of us."] All of them. That is why my hon. Friend's constituents may have difficulty in the future.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): May I say as a member of the Committee how glad I am to see the Secretary of State relieved of his considerable embarrassment and let off the hook? To see him squirm during two separate sittings was an extremely uncomfortable experience for hon. Members on both sides of the Committee.

May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to look at the substantial claims of the regions. Some of us view the Bill and the Stansted report as a further attempt to hijack resources from the south-east of England when vast regions in Britain are suffering from very substantial unemployment. Decentralisation of air services would lead to substantial employment at airports in the regions which could do with the substantial investment that the Government clearly intend to put into Stansted and possibly into a fifth terminal at Heathrow.

As someone who has spent five years going twice a week to and from Heathrow when I live only 10 minutes from an airport, may I say that it is high time that we made use of the substantial resources that already exist at, for instance, Cardiff airport?

Mr. Ridley: Nothing would please me more than to see greater expansion and prosperity in all of Britain's regional airports. I have some good news for the hon. Lady: considerable extra investment for Cardiff airport has been approved this afternoon. That makes it harder for me to understand why the hon. Lady is not in favour of discussing a Bill which would have limited the number of flights into Heathrow. Without such a limit, presumably more flights will go into Heathrow and fewer into Cardiff.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall endeavour to call the hon. Members who have been standing, because I know that this is an important matter for their constituencies and for themselves, but I think that we should move on at half-past four.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): In considering his decision on the Eyre report, will my right hon. Friend take fully into account the increase in aircraft size? If he does, he will appreciate that it is terminal capacity at Heathrow that will be the problem in the 1990s and beyond and not runway capacity. Will he acknowledge that the decision—I hope that he can give us a better idea of when it is likely to be made—will have a profound effect on the date on which we can sell the shares in British Airways to the general public?

Mr. Ridley: I cannot comment on the contents of the inspector's report, as that would be to prejudge our decision, nor can I tell my hon. Friend when it is likely that my right hon. Friend and I will be in a position to make that decision. That would be pure speculation. But I repeat that none of the matters that the House has been discussing this afternoon is remotely connected with the privatisation of British Airways.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): As one of the members of the Committee which delayed the Committee proceedings on the Bill, I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the fact that I was one of the many who supported the principle of the Bill and still do. I have never accepted that to give my right hon. Friend the powers necessarily meant that the 275,000 limit or other matters were cast in stone. We in this House must accept that we have a responsibility to view carefully and fully all matters that are relevant to the Bills that we are working on, and in this case it was nonsense to believe that we could not study, at least in some depth, the report on Stansted before we went into Committee. I believe that when the Committee reconvenes it will be much better equipped to argue fully the amendments already tabled and many others. Then we shall see Parliament working at its best.

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for taking the sensible position that, after having a chance to study the inspector's report, it would have been wise to proceed to debate the Bill, because so many of the questions which have been raised this afternoon and outside the House could well have been addressed in the debate on the substance of the Bill.

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): In the spirit of the season, may I thank the Secretary of State for saying this afternoon that the Bill will at least be postponed? When the debate on Stansted does take place, will he, first, identify the date on which the pledge on Heathrow which has been referred to was first given to this House rather than referred to outside and, secondly, will he agree that we should have a free vote on the issue of Stansted?

Mr. Ridley: I cannot without notice give the exact date when my predecessor, Sir John Nott, gave the pledge, but I point out to my hon. Friend that a pledge, whether given inside or outside the House, is interpreted as a pledge by the world at large, and little distinction is made. A pledge is dependent upon the person who utters it rather than the place where it is uttered. My hon. Friend's second point about a free vote is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his usual wisdom in withdrawing the Bill at this stage? However, I am sure that I am not alone in being considerably alarmed that he persists in the view that there has to be a limit at Heathrow. Will my right hon. Friend agree that he is a supporter of the market and that the market determines these things, and that the airlines themselves are the best judges of whether Heathrow should be expanded? Will he assure the House that he will not repeat the remark that he made on BBC Radio 4 the other night to the effect that, without these powers, there will be chaos at Heathrow next summer, because that will manifestly not be the case and it will not help the debate?

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks, but Heathrow is within 10 per cent. of its total physical capacity. At certain times of the day in the busy season there is already a conflict between different aeroplanes which wish to land at the same time. For safety reasons, if for no other, the time will soon come when there must be some form of control. As no powers exist for that, we must proceed to take them sooner or later.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement seems to be a rational way forward? Will he bear in mind that a great many people in the south and east midlands are very much in favour of Stansted and hope that he will make an early decision in favour of it?

Mr. Ridley: I must not say anything in response to my hon. Friend's kind words that would suggest that I had any preconceived ideas about the decision on the inspector's report.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): Is my right hon. Friend aware that my constituents, together with many other constituents who live in the vicinity of Heathrow, will congratulate him on his strong stand——

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): He has just lost.

Dr. Glyn: Not yet — in confirming what the Government have promised on numerous occasions, and as recently as 1984?

Mr. Ridley: The derision and mirth with which the Opposition seem to greet the news that those living around Heathrow may have to suffer increased noise and disturbance show an absolutely cynical disregard both for the Government's pledges and for the interests of 500,000 people, some of whom my hon. Friend represents.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): I deeply regret the need to delay the progress of the Civil Aviation Bill and I welcome the Secretary of State's constructive and measured statement, but will he confirm that the pledge given to the country in 1979 by his predecessor was given on the basis of noise nuisance and the damage to the environment? If so, will he please tell the British Airports Authority that he will not tolerate its proposal for an increase in landing charges of 244 per cent. for the quietest private domestic scheduled airlines, and the removal of all charges entirely for the noisiest international jets?

Mr. Ridley: I cannot tell the British Airports Authority anything unless Parliament grants me the relevant powers to do so.

Mr. Steen: My right hon. Friend has them.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): May I welcome the fact that the reintroduction of the Civil Aviation Bill will not occur until after debate and decision on the Stansted report? May I also express the hope that that will ensure time for thorough, fruitful and rational discussion of the Bill's implications for the small airlines, the south-east and the regional airlines?

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful for what my hon. Friend has said today, though I was not quite so grateful last Tuesday. I hope that it will be possible to have thorough, fruitful and rational discussions on these issues, although I slightly regret that we could not have them on the Bill, which would have been an excellent vehicle for that purpose.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Will my right hon. Friend accept that much further delay in this matter is likely to lead to the establishment of the third London airport and the business that it attracts not at Stansted or Manchester, but at Schiphol?

Mr. Ridley: I fear that my hon. Friend is talking of a real possibility. That is why I hope that when we return to our discussions on the Bill we shall do so in the context of an airports policy which will allow the House to permit the Bill to make progress.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I thank my right hon. Friend for taking today the judicious decision that he has announced to the House. In pursuit of that judicious decision, and in the obvious desire for a rational discussion on airports policy, will he persuade the Leader of the House that there should be a debate on a substantive motion relating to the Stansted report before the Committee stage of the Bill is resumed?

Mr. Ridley: Grateful as I am to my hon. Friend, that must be a question for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. We will certainly wish to hear everything that the House has to say. As my hon. Friend knows, we will not be able to contribute matters of substance to the debate because my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and myself will in the end have to make the ultimate decision, and we must not prejudice that decision.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): Will my right hon. Friend give me guidance as to what I should say to the representatives of Humberside airport when I meet them if the Bill eventually reaches the statute book in its present form? Can I give them the assurance that flights from Humberside to Heathrow will continue?

Mr. Ridley: Yes; I think that there would be no difficulty in my hon. Friend doing so. I should have liked to have had the opportunity of giving many such reassurances, had we been able to proceed with the debate on the Bill.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): Will my right hon. Friend remember that many millions of people live within a short travelling distance of Manchester airport and that they would welcome an opportunity to debate how that most profitable airport should be allowed to develop free of all restrictions?

Mr. Ridley: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Government have repeatedly made it clear that they would like to see everything possible done to allow all the regional airports, including Manchester, to expand their traffic and to grow. However, I hardly think that that question arises on the Bill.

Mr. Christopher Murphy (Welwyn Hatfield): As one who is opposed to the expansion of Stansted as London's third airport, may I ask my right hon. Friend to give to my constituents a pledge that we shall have debates both before and after the Government decision?

Mr. Ridley: I am not able, or willing, to prejudice the position of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. He has listened to every word that has been said today and will, I am sure, take note of them.

Select Committee Reports

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to raise with you the question of the use of uncirculated Select Committee reports. As you may know, the Public Accounts Committee recently took evidence from the DHSS following allegations that the British Oxygen Company could be abusing its monopoly position as supplier of oxygen to the National Health Service. The allegations were sparked off by complaints to the College of Health and others, reported in The Guardian, of excessive profiteering on the back of lucrative contracts. Such allegations are still being fuelled by the announcement of Mr. Richard Giordano's increase in salary to £771,000, but that is not relevant to my point of order, Mr. Speaker.

My point of order relates to BOC's use of uncirculated Select Committee documents as a basis for potential litigation. On 26 November the DHSS gave evidence in public to the PAC on the question of oxygen supplies. On 27 November the BOC chief executive for corporate communications, acting on behalf of Mr. Giordano, approached Mr. Rose—Clerk to the PAC—and asked him for a copy of a transcript of oral evidence so that

"BOC could submit further evidence if they found it necessary."

The Clerk to the Committee agreed, citing precedent, and on the strict understanding that it was supplied to the company in its capacity as a potential witness. Members of the Committee were not aware of the existence of that transcript until the night before last, when I was informed that The Guardian had a confidential transcript of our proceedings. I checked with the newspaper and was informed that that was not the truth, but that BOC had had a copy since the end of November and that it had been quoted from, at length, with large chunks of evidence in a letter dated 30 November from BOC to The Guardian. I have a copy of that letter.

In the form of a letter, and using a transcript that has been provided in confidence, BOC threatened The Guardian with the possibility of legal action and reference to the Press Council unless it agreed to meet BOC to discuss the retraction of articles in The Guardian on BOC's activities. Our confidential document was provided to BOC by the Clerk to the PAC without PAC Members having seen it, approved it or amended it. It was supplied to BOC strictly on the basis that it was to be used in the submission of further evidence. PAC Members received copies of the report only two days ago. The document was used as a basis for potential litigation and reference to the Press Council. British Oxygen attempted to muzzle The Guardian by using a confidential Select Committee document.

Mr. Speaker: I think that the hon. Gentleman should bring his comments to a halt, because he is now going into detail that may be prejudicial to any inquiry.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: By sending a transcript of our proceedings to a national newspaper, The Guardian, BOC was making public our papers. I use those words advisedly.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall now stop the hon. Gentleman. I have listened carefully to what he has said and I believe that he has raised a matter which is a possible contempt of the House. He must write to me about it and not pursue the matter on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I shall do that immediately, Mr. Speaker.

Sub Judice Rule

4.32 pm

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I wish to draw the attention of the House to a breach of the sub judice rule. During this morning's debate on the BBC the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) referred to certain matters which are the subject of legal proceedings in a case in which I am a plaintiff.

Although I was not in the House at that early hour, I have obtained a transcript of the proceedings from the Library. My hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. Maude) pointed out to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North that his remarks breached the sub judice rule, but the hon. Gentleman proceeded with them. The hon. Gentleman was then warned by the right hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Mr. Walker), who was in the Chair, that although the Chair did not know the exact state of the proceedings on that case, it might be as well if the hon. Gentleman were to avoid referring to it. Despite those two warnings, the hon. Gentleman continued to make remarks which, I believe, were prejudicial to the action which is now proceeding.

The hon. Member for Knowsley, North said that at present there were no cases before the courts involving the matters to which he referred and that none were set down for trial. In fact, two actions of mine were set down for a hearing on 19 November and the BBC's solicitors were informed of them in a letter from my solicitors on that day.

Other hon. Members are also involved in separate actions which emanate from the same subject matter. I have spoken to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North and invited him to withdraw his remarks and to apologise to the House for his breach of the sub judice rule. He has refused to do so and I seek your protection, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. Gentleman continues to refuse to withdraw his remarks and to apologise for them, will you require him to do so?

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I associate myself with the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton). I, too, am a plaintiff in proceedings against the BBC. The hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) should have known that the actions were set down. He made no attempt to contact me, but to judge from his remarks he was clearly aware that I was a party to the proceedings. I, too, seek your protection in this matter, because there is only one way in which a Member of this House or any other citizen may seek to clear his name against television mis-reporting, and that is through the courts. You will know that that is a very lengthy procedure.

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I make it clear that in my comments early this morning I did not mention either of the two hon. Gentlemen who have raised the matter with you or any of the other hon. Members who are engaged in those cases. I sought advice at 3 o'clock this morning and was told that no cases had been set down for hearing on this issue. Clearly, that advice was wrong, and I accept that. I acknowledge what the hon. Gentleman said, and I am happy to put the record straight.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman, and I do not think that anything else can arise. It is clearly very important to remind hon. Members that whenever we discuss anything in the House we bear in mind the subjudice rule.

Later——

Mr. Neil Hamilton rose——

Mr. Speaker: I hope that it is a different point of order, because we have disposed of this matter and I do not think that I can take it any further. I shall be very cautious about hearing the hon. Member.

Mr. Hamilton: I merely wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Member for Knowsley, North has not withdrawn the remarks which are on the record, and has refused to apologise. Once again, I seek your protection.

Mr. Speaker: I thought that I heard the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) say — [Interruption.] Did the hon. Member not say that he had received incorrect advice and that he withdrew those statements?

Mr. Kilroy-Silk indicated assent.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us be rational. The statements are on the record, so they cannot be withdrawn, but the hon. Member has put the record straight.

Stansted Airport

4.37 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During the Business Statement the Leader of the House quite properly invited an hon. Member who asked him about the debate on Stansted to await the statement of the Secretary of State for Transport. In due course the Secretary of State for Transport, when questioned about the debate on Stansted, referred the matter back to the Leader of the House.

Because of the great concern on both sides of the House about the debate, its form will be important and we shall want to know whether there is to be a vote on a substantive motion. We have had a statement from the Leader of the House, and I ask for your assistance so that I may know how to proceed on the matter.

Mr. Speaker: I think that that is a matter for the Leader of the House, and no doubt at the appropriate time we shall know that.

Royal Assent

Mr. Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

1. Consolidated Fund (No. 2) Act 1984.
2. Friendly Societies Act 1984.
3. Lochaber Water Power Order Confirmation Act 1984.
4. Highland Regional Council (Uig Pier, Skye) Order Confirmation Act 1984.
5. Lochmaddy and East Loch Tarbert (Improvement of Piers &c.) Order Confirmation Act 1984.
6. British Railways Order Confirmation Act 1984.
7. Greater London Council (Money) Act 1984.

BILLS PRESENTED

Shipbuilding

Mr. Secretary Tebbit, supported by Mr. Secretary Hurd, Mr. Secretary King, Mr. Secretary Younger, Mr. John Moore, Mr. Norman Lamont, and Mr. John Butcher, presented, under Standing Order No. 111 (Procedure upon Bills whose main object is to create a charge upon the public revenue), a Bill to extent the period in relation to which schemes under the Shipbuilding (Redundancy Payments) Act 1978 have effect and to extinguish all outstanding liabilities in respect of the loan made to Upper Clyde Shipbuilders Limited by the Shipbuilding Industry Board: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 51.]

Water (Fluoridation) Bill

Mr. Secretary Jenkin, supported by Mr. Secretary Edwards, Mr. Secretary Younger, Mr. Kenneth Clarke, and Mr. John Patten, presented a Bill to make provision with respect to the fluoridation of water supplies: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 52.]

Tobacco Products (Sports Sponsorship) Bill

Mr. Roger Sims, supported by Mr. George Foulkes, Mr. Nigel Forman, Mr. Laurie Pavitt, Mr. Toby Jessel, Mr. Clement Freud, Mr. Robert Sheldon, and Sir Anthony Meyer, presented a Bill to provide for a ban on sponsorship of sporting events by tobacco companies to be achieved by progressive reduction of expenditure; and for purposes connected therewith: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 8 February and to be printed. [Bill 53.]

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the House, I shall put together the Questions on the two motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the Tyne and Wear Metro (Rateable Value) Order 1984 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Anti-Competitive Practices (Exclusions) (Amendment) Order 1984 (S.I., 1984, No. 1919) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978

4.40 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Douglas Hurd): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of the Review of the Operation of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978; accepts the continuing need for temporary emergency powers; recognises the need to maintain as fully as possible the liberties of the individual; and looks forward to considering the Government's legislative proposals.

We are discussing this afternoon the late Sir George Baker's review. The Government and the House clearly need to look at Sir George's conclusions against the background of the security situation in the Province today. I have not yet had a chance, except fleetingly at Question Time, to discuss and listen to the views of right hon. and hon. Members on security policy and I am glad that there is a natural opportunity to do so today. If we allow our decisions on security matters to be swayed entirely by our reactions to the latest event or the latest propaganda campaign, then we shall probably decide wrong. It we are to get our decisions right, we must look at the whole situation with clear eyes and that is what we can do today.

But first I am sure the House will wish to join me in paying tribute to the work of Sir George Baker, whose last public duty was the preparation of this report. In studying it I have come to appreciate the qualities that he brought to bear on the task. It is a hard business to strike the correct balance between protecting life and property, and protecting civil liberties in a free society which is plagued by terrorism. Sir George examined that balance with diligence and sensitivity. Much of the material, is necessarily arid, but he treated it in a lively style which makes the report a good read. I believe that he accurately identified the issues which the Government and Parliament must consider when examining the provisions of the Act. We broadly agree with both the tone of his report and its conclusions, and I welcome this opportunity to listen to the views of the House upon them.

I should like first, before I turn to the recommendations, to speak more generally about the security background to them. The aim of our security policy is not to contain terrorism or to achieve an acceptable level of terrorist violence. Our aim is to eradicate terrorism and to restore peace and normality so that all the people of Northern Ireland can go about their daily lives free from fear. There are of course relationships between the security problem, the need for political development and the economic situation. The most pressing problem must, however, be the continuing violence. Bringing it to an end is our chief aim. Violence obviously brings individual tragedy, it heightens tension within Northern Ireland, it places a major constraint on political development and it inhibits investment and prosperity. So a vicious circle is created. The lack of political agreement within Northern Ireland adds to instability, and may well help the terrorists through hindering the growth of whole-hearted support for the security forces from each part of the community. Equally unemployment leads to enforced idleness and discontent, which can be exploited by the para-militaries. We have to seek progress on all these fronts if we are to secure the peace, stability and prosperity which we want for the people of Northern Ireland.

Faced with the tension and the tragedies caused by terrorism, some people, naturally enough are, tempted to look for short cuts in winning the battle. But in a free, open and democratic society such as ours, terrorism is best countered by the resolute application of the criminal law. We should maintain arrest-powers, court procedures and treatment in prison which are as standard as they can practicably be. That means that we should look to the police to charge terrorists and bring them before courts where independence cannot seriously be questioned, where the rules of evidence apply and where fundamental safeguards for defendants are maintained. To some to whom I have listened in the last three months it may seem paradoxical that terrorists are entitled to the protection of the judicial system which they are seeking to destroy; but I am convinced that in any democratic society that approach must be the right one. I think that it is also the only practical one, because anything else would, in the long run, produce the wrong result. If we departed from the rule of law we would leave a difficult but sure pathway and plunge into a morass in which it would be easy to sink. We would give the terrorists a line with which to rally formidable support in the Province, in the rest of Britain and abroad.

Security has undoubtedly improved since the grim days of the early 1970s. But to help the House to grasp the scale of the continuing violence in Northern Ireland, let me briefly mention some recent statistics. Since 1 July six members of the security forces and 11 civilians — Protestants and Catholics—have died in incidents arising from the security situation. In the five months following 1 July, 131 members of the security forces and 226 civilians were injured. Since 1 July there have been 105 shooting incidents and 53 explosions, and 17 explosive devices have been neutralised.

The House will see at once what those figures mean to the people involved and to their families and friends. During that period, we on this side of the water—and, indeed, in this House—have learnt vividly the realities of murder and bereavement.

Hon. Members may observe that I have not compared the figures with those of earlier periods. I would like to say a word about the handling of such figures. As the House knows, we publish the casualty figures twice a year in some detail, and we shall continue to do so: the House and our constituents are entitled to know how things stand. At present the figures show a continuing decline in most categories of violence and in the totals, and of course that is satisfactory as far as it goes. But my colleagues and I do not intend to generalise prematurely from that trend. For one thing, statistics bring no comfort to the bereaved or the injured. For another, we know that we are faced with a ruthless and sophisticated enemy who continues to have access to recruits, money, arms and explosives.

Security policy is not static. All the time we look for ways to deny that access, and to grind down the terrorists. Usually, we prefer not to speak about those ways. But I would be misleading the House if I fell into the temptation of predicting that the present relatively favourable trend would lead inevitably and without fluctuations to the ending of terrorism, which is our aim.

Before I turn to the provisions of the emergency legislation, I want to refer to the individuals and organisations who are charged with the responsibility for maintaining public order and enforcing the rule of law in Northern Ireland, within the framework established by the Government and Parliament. In recent years, the Royal Ulster Constabulary has trebled in size and expanded its capabilities enormously. It is a tribute to the qualities of those in the force that that has been accomplished with the minimum of dislocation. We now have a highly competent, professional and resolute police force. The courage, dedication and sacrifice of the men and women who make up that force and its reserve place us greatly in their debt. I know that the chief constable and the police authority are determined to see that the force maintains the highest standards, and that its resources are effectively deployed to protect the community as a whole from terrorist attack and public disorder.

On Tuesday for the first time I "flew the border", to use a familiar phrase. When I met at each post soldiers who had served in Northern Ireland before, I asked them what was the main change which they had found since they had last been there. Almost all of them said it was the extended role of the RUC, and the way in which the police were now able to do work which had previously fallen to themselves as soldiers.

The establishment of police primacy, which has gone on under different Governments, is a thoroughly healthy development which we mean to maintain. We recognise that policing a divided community is a highly sensitive task, particularly when the police have at the same time to counter a vicious terrorist campaign supported by a sophisticated and insidious propaganda machine.

It would be silly for the Government, for me, or for anybody to suggest that all officers have responded to the many difficult situations that they have faced in exactly the right way at all times. From time to time individuals may lose their heads and mistakes can be made. But the same could be said for any police force anywhere in the world.

However, the record of the RUC shows that there is the will to enforce the law even-handedly and in the interests of the whole community. The police recognise more clearly than anyone that effective policing depends on their establishing links with the community and building a fund of trust and good will. Support has to be earned. It is a slow process, especially against the backdrop that I mentioned earlier. The police must maintain their efforts to win the confidence of the whole community. But it is not a one-sided business. The Government and political leaders on both sides of the community must work to remove the obstacles in the way of acceptance of the RUC as an impartial professional police force throughout the community.

In the violent campaign confronting them, the security forces at times have no option but to use force, sometimes using firearms or riot guns with plastic baton rounds. But let me make it absolutely clear that there is not a shoot-to-kill policy — nor would the Government countenance one.

When policemen and soldiers are faced with terrorists who are likely to be armed, or with dangerous riots, quick decisions have to be taken under intense pressure. However, all fatalities are fully investigated and reports go to the independent Director of Public Prosecutions who considers whether the force used was reasonable and whether there are grounds for prosecution. If there is a prosecution, it is right that the same safeguards — in particular the test of proof beyond reasonable doubt — should apply to members of the security forces as to other members of the community.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): The Minister will appreciate that this point is especially sensitive. I realise that an inquiry is being made into the recent incident in Derry. But how do the security forces operate in stopping and shooting to kill a person when no warrant for his arrest has been issued—I refer to the reply that the Secretary of State gave me yesterday—and when he has not drawn arms? Does the right hon. Gentleman understand that that leads many people to think that the policy is shoot to kill and not stop and arrest?

Mr. Hurd: As I said, the policy is not shoot to kill. The existence or non-existence of a warrant is, of course, only part of the story. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah".] Of course it is. I have explained exactly how the rule of law applies.

Much depends on the reasonable grounds for suspicion. But I shall not be drawn into commenting on the recent incident that the hon. Gentleman clearly has in mind. As I have said, all fatalities are investigated under the rule of law. The investigation of the two fatalities that the hon. Gentleman has in mind is proceeding, and it would be quite wrong for me to dwell on the matter.

Mr. John Hulme (Foyle): On the same crucial question whether the security forces have abandoned the rule of law and are pursuing a shoot-to-kill policy, and on the incident in my constituency, does the Secretary of State agree that the security forces clearly had considerable advance information as to the intentions of the two members of the IRA? That advance information should have given them plenty of time to take action other than execution — particularly that form of execution — had they been proceeding according to the rule of law.

Mr. Hurd: I am tempted, but I must resist the temptation, to question whether the hon. Gentleman's account is likely to be realistic. As I have said, an investigation——

Mr. McNamara: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hurd: No. I have given way to the hon. Gentleman. I am now dealing with an understandable inquiry from the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), in whose constituency these events occurred. Without endorsing or contradicting his statement of the events, which would be improper, I must tell him that under the rule of law, which is the framework within which we are discussing these matters, these deaths are being independently investigated. I believe that that is the right way, and it would be wrong for me as Secretary of State to comment further on what happened on that occasion.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman take it from me that all right-thinking people in Northern Ireland prefer IRA men rather than innocent people to be shot?

Mr. Hurd: That intervention confirms my prudence in not commenting further upon these events.

Fatalities are fully investigated and the reports go to the independent Director of Public Prosecutions, who considers whether the force used was reasonable. That is the principle, and it is being applied in this case.

Behind the police stands the Army, because military support is still required by the Royal Ulster Constabulary in certain areas of the Province and in certain operational situations. That support has been unswerving, and I am sure that the House will join me in paying tribute to the Army commanders and soldiers who have gone about their tasks bravely and shrewdly over the years.

An invaluable contribution has been made by the Ulster Defence Regiment, which, as I and other hon. Gentlemen have seen for ourselves, provides front-line support to the RUC in much of Northern Ireland. The Government and the people of Northern Ireland will continue to need its services.

The efforts of the security forces continue to show results. Since July, 237 terrorists have been charged with serious offences, including 41 for murder or attempted murder, and 80·5 kilogrammes of explosives, 87 weapons and 8,324 rounds of ammunition have been recovered.

I should like to mention also the men and women of the Northern Ireland prison service who have faced with courage and dedication large-scale protest action within the prisons and attacks upon them outside. They are not always remembered in this catalogue. Such attacks include the assassination earlier this year of an assistant governor at the Maze prison.

I should also mention the co-operation received from the security forces of the Republic of Ireland, among whom lives have been lost in the fight against the common enemy. The co-operation between us is crucial in bringing about the defeat of terrorism, and we must work to make it stronger.

Against that background, I turn to the specific measures and recommendations in Sir George Baker's report. The operations of security forces against terrorists, and the way in which the courts deal with cases of a terrorist nature, have been helped by the various emergency measures in the 1978 Act. The Act confers on the police and armed forces special powers of arrest, search and seizure. It also provides for trial without jury in certain specified classes of serious criminal offences, and imposes stricter-than-normal bail conditions in such cases. It contains other provisions intended to make it possible to bring terrorists to justice through the courts without unduly affecting their rights. The Act also contains provisions which would permit the detention without trial of suspected terrorists, although this power has not been used since 1975, and has not been in force since 1980.

Successive Parliaments and Governments have decided that these exceptional powers should be continued only for as long as necessary. I endorse that. Such powers should be available only to the extent that circumstances render them strictly necessary.

Having studied the position carefully, Sir George Baker concluded that there was a continuing need for emergency powers such as those in the Act. I agree. So indeed does the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights, which after long and exhaustive studies of these problems reached a similar conclusion. We have undertaken a detailed scrutiny of the Act in the light of Sir George's report, and I believe that there is some scope for making changes which would reflect developments in the security situation and perhaps strike more precisely the right balance between individual liberties and the need to give the security forces and courts adequate powers to deal with terrorism.

I do not propose to go through Sir George's recommendations in sequence; I shall, however, set out my views in general terms as the starting point for the debate. I have taken no final decisions; I wish to take careful note of what is said today, to weigh hon. Members' points and then to decide what changes in the law I should submit to the House when there is an opportunity to do so. I have sought and received comments on the Act and the review from many people and organisations in the Province—for example, I have had correspondence with the chairman of the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights, whom I hope to meet to discuss these and other matters soon.

A number of Sir George's recommendations aim to bring the emergency provisions more closely in line with the ordinary law of Northern Ireland. In general I regard those recommendations sympathetically and I propose to carry them through, except for a few subsidiary recommendations which would cause undue practical difficulties and be of little benefit. Thus, I am inclined to accept Sir George Baker's recommendation for the rationalisation of police arrest powers. I have noted the declining use of the arrest powers at present possessed by the Armed Forces and Sir George's recommendation that in the light of that there should be some additional refinements to the powers. That will need to be very carefully considered, taking into account the principles and practical implications. I subscribe, too, to the principles that underlie Sir George's recommendations for increasing the scope of the Attorney-General's discretion to certify particular offences out of the scheduled, non-jury mode of trial. I am inclined to adopt most of those recommendations in that respect. However, I want to examine rather more closely the list of offences that Sir George suggests might be triable by jury in an increased number of cases.

Sir George makes a number of other recommendations designed to rationalise the emergency provisions in areas where the practices and operational needs of the security forces and the courts have moved some way since the Act was last amended. His recommendations on bail and on the admissibility of statements are good examples of that category. In each instance, the practice of the courts is somewhat different from what a superficial reading of sections 2 and 8 of the Act might suggest. Sir George endorses current practice but makes recommendations to bring the wording of the statute more closely into line with the way in which the intentions of Parliament have been interpreted by the courts. Specifically, he recommends that the Act be revised to make it clear that the onus to show reason why bail should not be granted lies upon the prosecution. In respect of admissions, Sir George suggests that an amendment to the Act might endorse what is already the well-established practice of the courts, namely, that admissions by accused persons should not be admissible as evidence when there is reason to suppose that they have been extorted by violence or by the threat of violence.

I am not sure that either of those essentially cosmetic changes to the law is strictly necessary. The way in which the courts have hitherto chosen to interpret the law is satisfactory and is endorsed by Sir George. However, I shall listen carefully to the points made in the debate before reaching a final conclusion on that.

One of the most important questions raised by Sir George is whether there is a continuing need for the detention provisions that are still contained, although no longer in force, in the 1978 Act. At present, I could bring those powers into immediate effect by order, which would then have to be approved within 40 days by resolution of each House. I have thought hard about that and I should like to explain my views. Clearly, there are political attractions in complete repeal; we have come a long way since 1975 when detention was last used. I can think of no circumstances in which detention without trial would be sensible or justifiable as a settled long-term policy. The opposition that it would stir up would quickly outweigh the benefits that it could bring. Detention runs counter to the traditional concept of the rule of law.

However, one cannot exclude a sudden short-term crisis, which might occur when Parliament was in recess. It could then be difficult to secure the new primary legislation which would be needed to introduce detention in an emergency if the present powers were repealed. I would welcome the views of the House. I am tempted to repeal, but on the whole my present inclination is that it would not be prudent to deprive myself or my successors of a reserve power which I certainly hope may never be used. A similar power is of course retained in the Republic of Ireland.

A number of Sir George's recommendations arise from his concern that delays in the judicial process should be kept to a minimum. I share that concern. I shall watch with interest the field trials announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to be conducted in England and Wales into the practicability and effectiveness of time limits. I am keeping in close touch with the Attorney-General and the Lord Chancellor on this matter, and we shall do what we can to reduce waiting times. I know that the prosecuting authorities and the courts service have done their utmost to reduce waiting times between remand and trial and will continue to do so. In particular, I am pleased to be able to announce that the Lord Chancellor has agreed to the appointment of an additional county court judge. However, it must be said that delays can often occur at the request of the accused, in particular when the services of a particular defence counsel are awaited. We would face the greatest difficulty in restricting this freedom of choice. I take Sir George's point that we could, perhaps, increase our flexibility by allowing trials of scheduled offences to be held at courts other than the Crown court in Belfast. We must take careful account of all the security implications of this proposal.

This brings me naturally to Sir George's comments on the use of accomplice evidence, with which he dealt at length.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): Will my right hon. Friend comment briefly on the recommendation in the report by Sir George Baker relating to the length of time that someone may be held before trial? I think that he makes the recommendation that if the delay should exceed 12 months, the individual should be set free.

Mr. Hurd: I have said that I am worried about those delays. They are related to the practice of granting bail and to the choice of counsel. I am watching the trials taking place this side of the water to see to what extent—while not exactly imitating the Scottish law—delays can be reduced by setting time limits. I should welcome views on this as it is an area of genuine concern shared by everyone—police, judiciary and elected representatives in the Province. However, it bristles with practical difficulties.

I move on to the use of accomplice evidence. Sir George affirmed that the use of such evidence in no way deprived the accused of a fair trial. He pointed out that, following any conviction in a non-jury trial, the judge had to set out his reasoning, which is not the case with a jury. The question of accomplice evidence is of course topical following the recent case based on the evidence of Raymond Gilmour. I do not wish to comment on that particular case. But I want to remind the House of part of the statement made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General in answer to a written question on 24 October last year:

> "In Northern Ireland terrorist crime is a serious problem and the full extent of the involvement of many of the terrorists is perhaps known only to those engaged with them in their criminal activities.
> When one of those who has been involved in terrorism and is thus an accomplice indicates his willingness to give evidence about crimes of which he knows and in which he may have been a participant, it is the duty of the chief constable to put the full facts before the Director of Public Prosecutions. It is then the duty of the director to consider all the evidence and information before him with a view to the initiation of criminal proceedings."
> —[Official Report, 24 October 1983; Vol. 47, c. 3-4.]

My right hon. and learned Friend then explained that, where the evidence appears to be credible and cogent and relates to serious terrorist crime, there is an overriding public interest in having charges brought before the court, and it is the Director's clear duty to see that this happens. It is then for the court to determine whether the evidence of the accomplice is so convincing as to its content and so reliable in itself that it reaches the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt. In the Gilmour case obviously the court of the Lord Chief Justice came to the conclusion that it did not.

That is a clear statement by which I stand. There is no reason to reject in principle evidence simply because it comes from an accomplice who has given information to the police. The Lord Chief Justice made that clear in his remarks on the Gilmour case. But that evidence then has to be weighed in the scales of justice. If a court rejects accomplice evidence in a particular case, it does not mean that the decision to prosecute was wrong, any more than acquittal in a case involving a member of the security forces means that the case should never have been brought. The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) made a similar point yesterday. It is a question of testing available evidence in open court, and the Director's decision to proceed in each case is taken in full consciousness of his responsibility for the independent, impartial discharge of the duties of his office.

On a connected point, Sir George Baker suggested that efforts be made to reduce the number of defendants to 20 or less in trials involving accomplice evidence. There have been very few cases involving more than 20 defendants. While the Government will clearly look very closely at this issue, I am not so far convinced that trying a number of defendants simultaneously affects the standard of justice or causes undue delay. Indeed, I could imagine longer delays for some accused, if different batches were brought to trial separately.

Sir George also dealt with the composition of the court before which scheduled offences are tried, and he endorsed the present use of a single judge to try cases where there is terrorist involvement. Underlying these conclusions in the report are substantial arguments both of principle, in terms of workability and the standard of justice which might be provided by a multiple judge court, and of resources. If we are to make progress in reducing delay, we have to make the very best use of the judicial resources available to us. Of course someone convicted before a single judge has the right of an appeal court, normally of three judges.

Mr. McNamara: I have been trying to follow the track of the right hon. Gentleman's argument, particularly when he seemed to endorse the comments of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) on the recent trial. Is the Secretary of State therefore prepared to say that it will now be policy in his Department that accomplices —supergrasses—will not be granted remission for any crimes for which they admit they are guilty, that there will be no monetary rewards, that they will not be settled in foreign lands, that they will not be taken on expensive holidays to Cyprus and elsewhere and that one can now trust the odd supergrass as opposed to the generality of supergrasses? Does the Secretary of State appreciate that the manner in which supergrasses are being used is bringing the whole system into even further disrepute?

Mr. Hurd: If the hon. Gentleman catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he may have a chance to develop that theme. The inducements and immunities which may be offered in a particular case are revealed to the defence. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to develop this point, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will take it up when he replies to the debate.

I think that I have made clear the basis on which we believe it is right that evidence which is available and relevant should be available to the Director of Public Prosecutions. Where he decides, using his usual standards, that it provides a basis for prosecution, the prosecution should proceed. It is then for the court—we are dealing here all the time with the rule of law—to weigh the evidence that has been produced in the light of all the circumstances that have to be revealed to it. That is a perfectly fair and, indeed, the only sensible manner in which to treat this aspect.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Does the right hon. Gentleman not agree that the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland is in an unusually bad position to judge whether, to use the Secretary of State's words, the evidence of the supergrass is credible and cogent, because the DPP does not interview witnesses in any way? I understand that all he is presented with is statements by the witnesses and opinions formed by police officers and others of those statements. Does he not agree that if there are to be trials based on the evidence of supergrasses a new procedure must be introduced whereby, at a preliminary stage and before charges are brought, proper procedures are followed to assess, having seen the witness, whether he is credible and cogent?

Mr. Hurd: I do not see the need for that. We have a perfectly normal and defensible procedure—the police, the independent Director of Public Prosecutions, and then the court, who are in full possession of the facts. That procedure works well, sometimes to the satisfaction of one party and sometimes to the satisfaction of another. I do not believe that a case has been made out for changing it.

I shall move on to the next point, which is the question of the Diplock single-judge court. It will not come as any great surprise to the House when I say that I cannot see at present any way that we could, in the circumstances, return to jury trials for the worst offences of terrorism in Northern Ireland. But that in no way precludes progress in taking an increased proportion of trials out of the scheduled non-jury procedure by means of the certificate issued by the Attorney-General, to which I referred earlier.

Finally, Sir George dealt at some length with the police complaints procedure. He was right to do so. A clear and trusted system for handling complaints against the police is an important safeguard for the citizen, and indeed in the long run for the police. This is particularly important where the RUC is having to police a divided community. It is too easy for complaints that are not properly made or investigated to fester or be used for propaganda purposes by those whose aim is not justice but the discrediting of the police.

By fortunate coincidence the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 is bringing about a substantial reform in England and Wales. There is a new police complaints authority which has the new duty of supervising the investigation of complaints against the police. The independent element thus comes into play at an earlier and crucial stage. I am carefully considering and consulting interested parties to find the best way of introducing similar changes in Northern Ireland. If we can find the right procedures and the right people to work them, this could be a big step forward.

At the heart of this question lies an unbalanced proposition that the House must face. The security forces and the Government are bound by the law, and the terrorists are not. There is a price to pay for that lack of balance. I hope that hon. Members will accept that it means that a soldier or a police officer sometimes finds himself in peril of the courts over the degree of force used in operations against terrorists who know no such constraint. It means that terrorists can walk free if their friends can intimidate key witnesses. It means that terrorists can walk free once they have completed their sentences, even though the security forces and their neighbours may have reason to suppose that they are returning to their old ways. Those are facts and there is no sense in attempting to disguise them.

Voices are sometimes raised in the Province against that imbalance. It is sometimes argued that those who struggle against lawlessness should be freed in some way from the constraints of the law. As I indicated earlier, I am sure that that would be wrong. Nothing would do more to increase support for the terrorists in the Province and abroad than a suspension by us of the rule of law, or a failure by us to understand the importance of individual liberty and decent behaviour.

We are determined to support the security forces, the prison service, and the judiciary, both with the necessary resources and with our voices. They all in different ways serve as champions of the people of Northern Ireland, of their human rights and of their liberty to go peaceably about their daily lives. In turn those servants of the public suffer ferocious propaganda attacks. A mistake, a momentary misjudgment by an individual, alleged or actual, is exaggerated and turned against the institution as a whole.

Right hon. and hon. Members are rightly jealous of the duty of this House to protect individual rights. They rightly probe the details of individual cases, and no Secretary of State should resent such zeal. We must ensure that proven instances of wrong-doing do not go unpunished, but I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will understand the danger of endorsing the propaganda campaigns of those who are interested not in the liberty of the individual but in the discrediting and overthrow of the institutions of the rule of law. The dupes of Sinn Fein campaigns are no friends of freedom in Northern Ireland.

In return, the House and the people of Northern Ireland can require something of the Government. We must make sure that the rule of law is a reality and that the differences in Northern Ireland law intended to take account of the different circumstances of the Province are kept to the minimum. We must make sure that where there are complaints, there is the machinery for dealing with these complaints as quickly and fairly as possible. We must make sure that the institutions of the Province are so designed, administered and staffed that they serve and are seen to serve the genuine interests of all those who live within the Province. I can give the House the assurance that we are working diligently to that end, and I commend this motion to the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

5.22 pm

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'regrets the Government's delay in responding to the Report of Sir George Baker; and affirms that law and order are best served by methods of law enforcement which are seen to be fair, compassionate and non-discriminatory.'.

This debate is long-awaited and long-promised. In our discussion on the renewal of the Emergency Provisions Act on 5 July, I traced the history of the calls that had been made in this House since 1979 for a review of the Act. On 22 July 1982, the then Secretary of State finally responded to those calls with an announcement that there was to be a review. There was a further nine-month delay before he announced who was to undertake it. Then the general election caused a further delay.

Sir George Baker reported in March this year, about nine months after he began work. There was no delay on his part. That is a tribute to his enthusiasm for his task and for his appreciation of the urgency of the matter. In that time, he listened with his customary courtesy and attention to all those with something to say. He produced a careful and thoughtful report. It did not compel universal agreement. We on the Opposition Benches do not endorse all that he said—I shall elaborate upon that later—but it deserved better than it has received at the hands of the Government.

We tried to exercise patience. We did not expect a debate at once. We hoped that the Government would read the report and consider it carefully, but as month succeeded month we began to wonder whether perhaps the Government were slow readers. On 24 May I asked the then Secretary of State whether he would discuss the possibility of a debate with the Leader of the House. He replied:

"I regard Sir George Baker's report as an important document that the House will wish to debate. I hope that in due course time will be made available for such a debate".—[Official Report, 24 May 1984; Vol. 60, c. 1235.]

On 28 June, in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), he said:

"All these matters will be relevant to next week's debate and perhaps to a discussion of the Baker report in due course."—[Official Report, 28 June 1984; Vol. 62, c. 1149.]

On 26 July I asked him again and he said:

"I expect this item will come up for debate soon after we return. It is a matter for the Leader of the House but I believe that that is the understanding."—[Official Report, 26 July 1984; Vol. 64, c. 1224.]

On 29 November, I asked the Secretary of State again, and he replied:

"Obviously, it is for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to say when the debate will take place. I hope that that debate will not be delayed too long."—[Official Report, 29 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 1075.]

So, Mr. Deputy Speaker, arise; the long, long night is over; we have our debate. And, would you believe it, the Government have provided a debate on the Thursday before Christmas — the day before the House is adjourned, in a week when, as no doubt the Government hoped, the House was to be occupied with uncontentious business, and when hon. Members would wish to be in their constituencies for various Christmas events connected with the elderly, the handicapped, and other local groups.

Mr. Hurd: The House is sitting.

Mr. Archer: The House is sitting, as the right hon. Gentleman says. If the House had not been sitting, no doubt we should not have had our debate at all.

However, the week has not worked out quite as the Government expected. Indeed, few things these days seem to work out quite as the Government expect. But the debate is not as well attended as it would have been if the Government's business managers had accorded it a higher priority. If the people of Northern Ireland are told that the attendance is thin, it is an indication not of how seriously hon. Members take Northern Ireland business, but of how seriously the Government take it.

I do not say that as a personal criticism of the Secretary of State. He does not arrange the business of the House. He cannot insist on a higher priority for his subject than the Government as a whole are willing to accord it. But if the Government cared, they had no better opportunity to demonstrate their concern than by providing a debate in prime time. Now we know the rating of Northern Ireland business in the Government's book.

Of course, the Government's response to the report is the responsibility of the Secretary of State. It is a poor thing, but it is his own. I cannot help feeling that the House will be left with a feeling of profound disappointment. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman paid tribute to Sir George Baker, as we would expect. The debate on 5 July enabled his predecessor and myself to offer a personal tribute to Sir George who, unhappily, did not live to hear this debate.

This is not the occasion to repeat all that I said at that time, but this commission was a fitting conclusion to a lifetime of distinguished public service by a man who numbered among his many qualities the capacity to listen and to assess what he heard as objectively and fairly as possible—a quality not universally shared among people concerned with Northern Ireland. Sir George was in the tradition of distinguished judges who have reported on various aspects of the situation in Northern Ireland. If I find that I differ from his conclusions, I nevertheless recognise the mark of a seeker after truth. He did not make recommendations lightly. His proposals were restrained —some of us believe that they were too restrained—but they were proposals that the Government could have accepted at once, without opening any floodgates or imposing any danger for security.

There are many people in Northern Ireland who are anxious to know the Government's reactions and to be assured that the Government appreciate the strength of feeling on the subject. The Secretary of State, very fairly, emphasised the need to preserve the standards of the criminal law. He announced that the Government had consulted widely on the recommendations, although I am not wholly clear of the need for that, because Sir George himself had already consulted. He said that he was disposed in favour of some — most, I think — of the recommendations, but that he wished to reflect further. As I understand it, he said that there will not be any legislation on the subject in this Session. That response—I say this without any joy—is not only bland and unimaginative, but uncomprehending and incomprehensible.

To set the Opposition's position in context, I hope the House will forgive me if I repeat some of what I said on 5 July. First, we have no sympathy with lawlessness. We believe that any political cause, worthy or unworthy, is degraded and distorted when it is pursued by individuals who take upon themselves the right to deal with opposition by killing or terrorising those who disagree with them. In particular, we denounce the indiscriminate violence that kills and maims without distinction all those who happen to be in a particular place at a particular time. That has been said by us so often that there is no need to elaborate.

Secondly, we appreciate the difficult task of those who have to enforce law and order. We do not underestimate the extent of the tragedies brought about by violence. We appreciate the dangerous conditions in which they work and the necessity for taking decisions quickly under pressure.

I echo the Secretary of State's tribute to the police force. As he said, the police are not universally without blame, and to suggest that they are all perfect would be as silly as suggesting that they are all petty tyrants devoid of any redeeming features. But they are entitled to ask that we bear in mind their difficulties when we discuss these matters.

Opposition Members believe that the strongest base from which to maintain law and order is a community which supports law enforcement and opposes law-breaking. That is achieved by demonstrating that those concerned with law enforcement display constant respect for the rules and that those rules are manifestly fair. Law-breakers cannot be dealt with by risking injustice to those who are innocent, and the myth that is spread by many law-breakers—that they are engaged in a war—cannot be destroyed by encouraging the authorities to adopt the slogans of war — such as "Shoot on Sight" — or the practices of war by claiming to identify the enemy before he has been convicted.

We believe it would have been better if Sir George's terms of reference had not begun with the words,

"Accepting that temporary emergency powers are necessary".

When someone is appointed to conduct an inquiry, it is better not to begin by telling him what his conclusions are to be. The question is about what departures from normality are necessary. If they are not necessary, they are counter-productive and if they are not required to protect, they serve only to alienate.

In that context I turn to the question of trial without jury. That procedure singles out Northern Ireland from the rest of the United Kingdom. In Great Britain the right to trial by jury is a long established and cherished safeguard for any individual who is accused of a criminal offence. Attempts to curtail that safeguard, even marginally, are properly resisted. In Northern Ireland the right to jury trial has been curtailed for 11 years.

I was a member of the Standing Committee on the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill in 1973. I have recently read some of the proceedings to remind myself of how the position appeared at that time. According to the Government of the day, people were being acquitted who, because they were guilty, should not have been acquitted and it was said that those people were terrorists. The Opposition agreed that if that was the case it was unacceptable. Our position was that, fundamental as the right to jury trial is, it is not totally inviolate in all circumstances. We said that, if people who were guilty were being acquitted, there should be concern. But we also said that if the Government sought to curtail that position the onus was upon them to establish that major terrorists were escaping conviction and that they were likely to be convicted by a different form of tribunal. We said that, to justify the introduction of the Diplock procedure, the Government should establish first that the conviction rate was too low under the jury system. I recollect that my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North said that that was inconsistent with what had been said shortly before the debate by the then Prime Minister. The Prime Minister had spoken of arrests that had been made since the beginning of the year and said in May of that year that "since the beginning of the year . . . there were 157 convictions for specific criminal offences relating to terrorism."

He added:

"These figures speak for themselves." — [Official Report, 28 March 1973; Vol 853, c. 1323.]— and Opposition Members agreed with him.

It has not always been the Government's own case that the conviction rate was too low under the jury system. The Opposition said that, even if that was established, the Government would have to show that if the conviction rate was increased under the Diplock procedure the right people would be convicted. It is no answer to terrorism to risk convicting innocent people. The Opposition asked the Government to produce their evidence. They said that terrorists were probably escaping conviction for two reasons that had been discussed by the Diplock committee in chapter 5 of its report. They said that the Diplock committee had considered the possibility that jurors had been or would be intimidated. They did not cite any instances of intimidation, but believed that that might be happening. As evidence of the need to deny jury trial to accused people, that seemed less than persuasive. The committee considered the danger of partisan juries. It pointed out that juries were composed predominantly of Loyalists, because of the property qualification then in operation. It said that it was not greatly troubled by the possibility of perverse convictions of Nationalists, as it believed that that practice could be avoided by a fair judge, but it was more troubled about perverse acquittals, which also troubled the Government of the day. That could only mean perverse acquittals of Protestant paramilitaries, which was what the debates in 1973 were predominantly about. My right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) and my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) were both members of the Committee, and there are other right hon. and hon. Members who will remember the debates.

Those, in essence, were the arguments of the Diplock committee and the Government of the day for introducing the Diplock procedure. The Diplock committee actually said:

"It is fair to say that we have not had our attention drawn to complaints of convictions that were plainly perverse and complaints of acquittals which were plainly perverse are rare".

On Second Reading the Opposition officially abstained because we wanted to hear the Government's arguments in greater detail in Committee. We declared that we were not persuaded that the Government had made out their case for containing jury trials. I believe that we were right.

It is true that, when the Diplock procedure had been operating for a few years, I heard from people in both traditions that our anxieties had perhaps not materialised. There were few reports, if any, that the Diplock judges were convicting in cases where a reasonable jury might be expected to acquit. Indeed, there were some cases the other way. Of course, that might be another way of saying that the Diplock procedure had not achieved its stated objective to increase the conviction rate. But at least there were no complaints at that time of unfair convictions. As there seemed little evidence of dissatisfaction——

Mr. McNamara: There were many complaints about unfair convictions, particularly when people were being convicted on old, uncorroborated confessions which might have been obtained by violence or threats of violence, though less than torture or degrading or inhuman treatment. I shall develop the point later.

Mr. Archer: I wonder whether my hon. Friend and I are speaking about different periods. I am speaking about the period immediately after the Diplock procedure was introduced. If he heard complaints during that period, I am bound to say that they escaped me. Either of us could be right or wrong. I am explaining only why during that period I at least did not call for an end to the Diplock procedure. I believe that the situation has changed in the past two or three years. There have been reports of convictions which some at least profess to find surprising. I was not present at those trials, and I have not had an opportunity to read the transcripts, so I do not presume to make a judgment. I say only that there were such reports, and they coincided with the substantial fall in the acquittal rate in the Diplock trials. That rate was 57 per cent. in 1973. By 1979 it had fallen to 35 per cent. and by 1981 to 33 per cent.—all at a time when the acquittal rate in jury trials in Northern Ireland increased substantially. So the Diplock procedure was achieving its stated purpose of producing more convictions, but there were doubts whether they were merited convictions.

Sir George Baker discussed whether the judges might be becoming case-hardened. If that is said, it should not be construed as in any way offensive to the judiciary. It is because that process is virtually inevitable that trial by jury has been considered an essential safeguard of individual liberty for so long. Sir George said that he found that the judges themselves were very mindful of the danger, which does not necessarily mean that it neutralises the danger. Admittedly, it may be more difficult to sustain the suggestion as applicable to all judges, after the outcome of the Gilmour trial.

I have been driven to conclude that the time may have come to restore for all offences the trial method which was normal until 11 years ago. If there is then a spate of clearly perverse acquittals, we may have to think again, but it would be an important contribution to persuading people in both traditions that the Government recognise the widespread feeling that civil liberties in Northern Ireland have been steadily eroded over the past few years, and that they were prepared to consider the whole situation with an open mind.

But perhaps we can make the experiment on a more limited scale among some of the offences which are now scheduled. Sir George Baker did not go as far as that, but he recommended, in paragraphs 130 to 151, that there should be a much wider discretion in the Attorney-General to certify out of the schedule. That seems to me to be a step—albeit a hesitant one—in the right direction.

A robbery, an aggravated burglary, need not necessarily be associated in any way with terrorism. It may be carried out purely for purposes of good old-fashioned selfishness. In his study for the Cobden Trust, Mr. Dermot Walsh found that 40 per cent. of those tried by the Diplock procedure had no observable connection with terrorism.

I note that in paragraph 151 Sir George suggested that if it was thought that his proposals were too radical a judge could be given power, where there had been any attempt to intimidate or interfere with a jury, to discharge that jury and continue the trial sitting alone. That would be a possible safeguard if the Government decided to be even more radical and to begin all trials as jury trials.

On Tuesday, the Standing Advisory Committee on Human Rights made public some of its recommendations to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): My right hon. and learned Friend raised a point a moment ago on which I have been reflecting as it has an important bearing on what I want to say later. He said that 40 per cent. had not, observably, been involved in terrorism. On what basis were the accused dealt with under the Diplock procedure, which is based on that section of the Act defining terrorism, when it is claimed—or, if it is the other way round, when the prosecution claim—that they were involved in terrorism? How does that 40 per cent. arise?

Mr. Archer: They were brought before the courts because they were accused of the specific offences in the schedule. Anyone accused of those offences is, normally, brought before the courts under the Diplock procedure.

Mr. Rees: All the bank robbers?

Mr. Archer: As my right hon. Friend says, all the bank robbers. Yes, that is the position.

As I was saying, the Standing Advisory Committee on Human Rights has concluded that it is not yet possible to return to jury trial in all cases, contrary to the suggestion that I made a few moments ago. But it recommends a substantial reduction in the number of scheduled offences and enlarging the power to certify out. I am pleased to learn that the Minister is at least considering those proposals sympathetically, as I understood him.

Contrary to Sir George Baker's recommendation, the committee also proposes that, where jury trial is not used, the judge sitting alone should be replaced by a bench of three judges. When the Minister winds up, perhaps he will give us the Government's reactions to those suggestions.

[Mr. Archer]

The second matter considered by Sir George Baker was the length of time during which people in custody await trial, particularly those awaiting trial under the Diplock procedure. The Cobden Trust found that, in 1981, 60 per cent. of those they studied had been on remand for more than nine months before being sentenced and almost 10 per cent. for more than 15 months. The problem is particularly acute in relation to those awaiting trial on the evidence of supergrasses.

Most of the defendants discharged by the Lord Chief Justice this week in the Gilmour trial had been in custody since August 1982. We have heard of a number of cases where someone being held in custody awaiting trial on supergrass evidence has been told that the prosecution was not proceeding. Then, almost before the news has time to sink in, he has been rearrested to await trial on the evidence of a different supergrass.

In our last debate, I cited a letter which I had received from a lady who said that her son had been arrested and rearrested on the evidence of five successive supergrasses. She added:

"My son has been held since February 1982 and has been told that he will not get a trial until '85 or '86."

I understand that that young man is still in custody, awaiting trial in 1985 or 1986. Last month his application for bail was considered by the Lord Chief Justice, who said that he was unable to grant bail on the present criteria, and is reported as saying that it is not the courts who make policy, nor could they override the law. That, of course, is a matter for the Secretary of State.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman realise and agree that the time that that young man has spent in custody — bearing in mind the provisions for remission in Northern Ireland prisons—is virtually the equivalent of a six-year prison sentence?

Mr. Archer: I am most grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman for pointing that out, as it is certainly true. At the risk of pointing out the obvious, the young man has not been convicted of any offence. There is no question about whether the court would have imposed a custodial sentence because he has not been convicted of any offence. He may be guilty, or he may be wholly innocent. We shall not know until he is tried. If he is acquitted, he will have spent the equivalent of a six-year sentence in custody—not because he has committed an offence, but because someone has alleged that he has committed an offence.

There are two ways of approaching the problem. We can reduce the delays in bringing cases to trial. We can try to ensure meanwhile that those awaiting trial are given bail unless there are considerations which fully justify keeping them in custody unconvicted. Those approaches are not mutually exclusive. We can and we should be examining both.

Sir George Baker addressed himself to both approaches in paragraphs 173 to 187. He considered the delays in bringing cases to trial, particularly the supergrass trials. He made a number of recommendations, which I hope that the authorities will consider. I was pleased to learn today from the Secretary of State that the Lord Chancellor has approved the appointment of a further judge.

Sir George made two proposals on bail. In paragraph 81 he recommended that section 2(2) should be redrafted to provide that the onus of showing why bail is not granted should be on the prosecution, if they object to it, with a wide discretion available to the judge. As I understood it, the right hon. Gentleman said that we do not need to do that because the courts already consider bail in that way. If they already approach bail in that way, why not amend the statute book to accord with reality?

In paragraph 185, Sir George Baker proposed that any prisoner who has been in custody for more than 12 months should be entitled to bail as of right. That seems a moderate enough proposal. I hope that the Government will implement it. They cannot justify allowing this situation to drag on as though it did not matter. In a country that boasts of its freedom, that situation is quite unacceptable.

Time will not permit me to consider in detail all the recommendations by Sir George. He referred to section 8 of the Act. Subsection (2) provides that confessions by an accused shall be excluded if they are adduced by torture or inhuman or degrading treatment. There is nothing in that provision about abuse, threats, keeping someone in custody hour after hour or refusing him access to a solicitor. Detention in conditions falling short of inhuman or degrading treatment is not excluded. What is wrong with the test which applies in England and Wales, that confessions are to be excluded unless they are made voluntarily? Sir George recommended a somewhat lower standard. He proposed that the section should be redrafted at least to exclude cases where a confession is adduced by violence or the threat of violence. I hope that we shall hear in the course of this debate how the Government react to that.

Section 12 provides for detention without trial. That has been discontinued since 1975, as the Secretary of State said. Sir George recommended that, as section 12 is not used and ought not to be used, it should be repealed. He made that recommendation "without qualification".

The right hon. Gentleman says that he does not like section 12. He says that there is no evidence of the need for such powers, but that he would like to leave section 12 on the statute book in case one day the situation might justify it. That is not the proper approach to emergency powers. Emergency powers in a civilised country should not outlive the emergency which brought them into being.

Then what becomes of the power of arrest under section 11? It is clear from the Act that the power under section 11 was intended to be a prelude to detention under section 12. There is no need to provide a power of arrest for other purposes. It already exists under the Prevention of Terrorism Act. If use is no longer to be made of section 12, what is the purpose of section 11? Sir George recommended that the powers of arrest under the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act and the Prevention of Terrorism Act should be brought together under one Act. He looked at section 11 which provides that:

"Any constable may arrest without warrant any person whom he suspects of being a terrorist."

He concluded that the power was too wide. The Act says nothing about the grounds of the constable's suspicion. There may be no grounds for it; it may be wholly unreasonable. He recommended that any power to arrest without warrant should be expressed to be where the constable "reasonably so suspects", leaving the court to decide objectively whether the suspicion was reasonable.

The Cobden Trust survey found that 90 per cent. of those arrested under emergency legislation failed in the end to be the subject of any charges, and that 72 per cent. of those held under such legislation were not even questioned about specific offences. The Trust asked whether those powers were not used just for the purpose of a general information-gathering exercise. We are all in favour of the police gathering information, but that it should be done by arresting and holding people about whom there is no reasonable suspicion is entirely unacceptable.

The European Convention on Human Rights provides, in article 5, that no one shall be deprived of his liberty unless lawfully arrested and detained "for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence".

The Government apparently believe that all their practices in Northern Ireland are fully consistent with the European convention, since in August they withdrew their notices of derogation from the United Kingdom's obligations in respect of Northern Ireland.

The Committee on the Administration of Justice has been in communication with the Home Secretary asking him to explain how the Government reconcile article 5 with either the wording or the use being made of section 11. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that this is not something which can be left until the next legislative Session. It is a matter on which we are already in breach of our international obligations under the European convention.

A further matter in which we have found ourselves unable to share Sir George's conclusions relates to the supergrass trials. I gave my view on that in the debate on 5 July, and in the interests of brevity I shall not now elaborate on the subject. But it has caused great anxiety, and may indeed be the most important single factor in the widespread feeling of frustration and dissatisfaction—I shall avoid the word "alienation" if the Prime Minister does not like it—with the administration of justice in Northern Ireland.

I do not say that prosecutors should never rely on accomplice evidence. That is a characteristic of most jurisdictions. But aspects of its use in Northern Ireland in the past few years have given rise, rightly I believe, to serious anxieties. First, there are the numbers of people tried together on one indictment. I realise, as the Secretary of State told us, that the police are anxious to avoid the delays involved in a succession of trials. But I do not believe that it is possible to try a vast concourse of people on one indictment without the risk that someone may be tainted by a piece of evidence which in logic is not relevant to his case.

Sir George Baker recommended that indictments be confined to a maximum of 20 defendants. That figure is startling enough, and I hoped that the authorities would consider it too high. Any lawyers in the House would surely agree with me. But the Gilmour trial before the Lord Chief Justice, which ended on Tuesday, involved 35 defendants. Whatever other considerations may have led to their acquittal, I do not believe that it can be right to prosecute such a number on one indictment.

Secondly, for reasons which are well known, an accomplice may have an incentive to falsify his account. In England and Wales a judge will emphasise that danger to the jury, and will warn them that they should be very reluctant to convict on the evidence of an accomplice in the absence of corroboration. But we are speaking, for the moment at least, of trials without a jury. However conscientiously a judge may try to keep that principle in mind, the effect cannot be the same as when a jury hears it from the lips of a judge.

Thirdly, it is of great importance that an accomplice who gives evidence should have nothing to hope for and nothing to fear from telling the truth. I say nothing about the considerations which were ventilated in an intervention earlier today by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North, but if the accomplice is to be given immunity from prosecution, that should be made clear before he gives evidence, and it should be in no way conditional on the evidence which he gives. If he is not to be given immunity, he should be tried and sentenced before he gives evidence. We all agree on that; so far as I know, it is not in dispute. But the time that the person in question has to serve is still largely under the control of the authorities, and nothing can be done to eliminate that element.

When it is announced that someone who has given evidence as an informer is to be released substantially earlier than would usually be expected, inevitably public confidence in the fairness of the system will be jeopardised. I believe that if supergrass trials were discontinued, the gain in terms of restoring confidence among the community would substantially outweigh the possibility of convicting some people against whom there is no other evidence.

It is not a matter for the police; if they have reason to suspect someone, they must bring their evidence to the Director of Public Prosecutions. It is not a matter for the director. If he has admissible evidence about which it is reasonable to project a conviction, it is difficult to see why he should not place it before a court. It is not a matter for the judges. If evidence is brought before them, they can only consider it on its merits in an individual case. I believe that the time has come for the Government to introduce legislation providing that no one may be convicted on the evidence of an accomplice in the absence of corroboration. Of course the comments of the Lord Chief Justice in the Gilmour case are welcome, and we await the judgment on the appeal in the Bennett case, which I understand will be delivered next week. But the remedy is in the hands of the Government.

I hope that when he replies the Minister will have something to say on another matter which has been ventilated today and which I believe makes a great contribution to the sense of frustration and dissatisfaction. If people are to feel an obligation to observe the law, they must have a sense of assurance that the law is not only something which constrains them but something which protects them. That entails those charged with enforcing the law being seen to observe the legal limits on their powers.

In its ninth annual report, the Standing Advisory Committee says that the law governing the circumstances in which members of the security forces may fire weapons is "one of the most controversial aspects of the security situation in recent years."

Of course those forces operate in conditions of great danger, and sometimes their members have to make decisions at a moment's notice when they cannot be sure of all the facts. It is right that all those considerations should be taken into account when assessing responsibility for the death of a civilian at the hands of the security forces. This is not a matter which is central to the discussion on the Baker report, and I might be out of order if I were to pursue it at great length today.

I commend to the Secretary of State the suggestion of the Standing Advisory Committee that when a case involving the killing of a civilian has been investigated, so far as possible the facts should be made known to the public. That does not happen when they have been considered by the Director of Public Prosecutions, and properly so; the director cannot make public his investigations. But a wall of silence is bound to breed suspicion. Then the commission suggests that the yellow card rules should be published and made available to the public. It also proposes a review of the whole law relating to the use of force by the security services.

The Committee on the Administration of Justice suggests examining the rules governing coroners' inquests so that there may be a feeling that the real issues have been investigated. There is great concern about this matter, and we will pursue it; ignoring it will not mean that it will go away.

Mr. Harold McCusker (Upper Bann): I have listened for almost half an hour to the right hon. and learned Gentleman expressing, quite properly, concern for people in Northern Ireland who may be innocent. However, in his consideration for their civil liberties, he is clearly making it more difficult for the security forces to deal with terrorism; no doubt that is a factor which he has thought about. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give some indication of what consolation I can offer my constituents and of whether I can tell them that a real effort is being made to protect them in the next 12 months, when no doubt another 50 or even 100 people will be killed by terrorists? As well as concerning himself with the civil liberties and rights of potentially innocent people, will he also consider ways of defending the basic civil right of all people in Northern Ireland—the right to life?

Mr. Archer: Perhaps I have not made myself as clear as I thought I had. I said at least three times that it is a matter that the Opposition have very much in mind. It is one of those matters that we must balance.

I can give the hon. Gentleman a message for his constituents—the most effective way in which we can enforce law and order is to ensure that the people of both traditions are squarely on the side of law and order and against law-breakers. I thought that I had already said that the way to achieve that would be to give a complete assurance that the rules were fair and that they would be observed by all concerned. If we can achieve that and put an end to the alienation, we shall go a long way towards protecting people from violence. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will tell that to his constituents.

Mr. Christopher Murphy (Welwyn Hatfield): I have listened to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's arguments with great care. The amendment that he advocates seeks to delete from the Prime Minister's motion the phrase

"accepts the continuing need for temporary emergency powers."

Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman really saying that there is no longer any need for temporary emergency powers, given the current position in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Archer: I thought that I had been discussing most of the emergency powers which exist. If the authorities already have powers on the statute book to do what is necessary, we do not need emergency powers. I am quite prepared to discuss the emergency powers one by one to determine which of them are required. The Opposition have been essentially pragmatic about this matter and essentially mindful of the need to preserve law and order. I am inviting the Government to look at each of the powers to see whether they are really necessary.

No one is calling for the Secretary of State to press a magic button and relieve all public anxieties at a stroke. It is inevitable that, in the current position in Northern Ireland, there will be disputes about the balance between maintaining proper security and retaining that respect for individual liberty that our ancestors won and which I hope the British people will never cease to cherish.

It is inevitable that there will be allegations of injustice as part of a propaganda campaign. It is inevitable that there will be errors of judgment. There can be no end to the problems until there has been a resolution of the political questions that beset Northern Ireland. That is why it is so important that the Government are seen to have the will to make political progress, and why it is important that the Prime Minister makes an effort to guard her tongue when she is dealing with sensitive issues.

But part of creating that atmosphere for political progress is to remove the sense of grievance and the feeling that things are not being done fairly. The Government must be seen to be listening to complaints, to be assessing them honestly and to be making an effort to reconcile security with justice. Without that, there can be no political progress.

It is because we are not persuaded that the Government are according the subject the urgency that it merits that we have tabled our amendment and will divide the House tonight.

6.3 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): The emergency provisions legislation has been on the statute book since 1973. It was introduced at a time when terrorism in Northern Ireland was rampant and the House recognised that something had to be done to provide the authorities, the security forces and the judiciary in Northern Ireland with the weaponry to combat the terrorist threat. It was styled emergency legislation and made subject to a review by the House at six-monthly intervals.

The then Secretary of State said on the Second Reading of the Bill:

"It is the Government's intention that none of the provisions of the Bill, if it is passed, should continue in force a moment longer than it is needed."—[Official Report, 17 April 1973; Vol. 855, c. 278.]

Indeed, the then Attorney-General declared that the measures were draconian. The legislation was never intended or desired to become a permanent feature of the legal process of Northern Ireland, but I regret that it is still necessary today, and I say that as a representative of Northern Ireland.

The House may blink its eyes at the facts. I resent what the Secretary of State referred to as the "favourable trend" in security matters in Northern Ireland. But for the intervention of providence, during the past few days there would have been carnage in Hollywood, the Campbell family in Londonderry would have been annihilated and seven Ulster Defence Regiment men would have been in their graves. I cannot say that that is a favourable trend.

The fact that the legislation is necessary is a savage indictment of the security policies of successive British Governments. They have refused to face the problem of terrorism in Northern Ireland and have utterly failed to deal effectively with the IRA and the INLA by resonant action on the ground. Had they done so, the need to debate this legislation would have ceased long ago.

In 1984, 11 years after the legislation was first enacted, the men and women of Northern Ireland continue to be subjected to a vicious sectarian campaign of butchery and bloodshed at the hands of the IRA and its friends. There are new victims of violence—innocent men and women cut down to satisfy the lust for blood of the Republican terrorists. We have to comfort and console widows, orphans and broken-hearted parents.

The intervention of the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) was most timely. What do we say when we visit people who shed tears over the victims of violence? There is no doubt that there is still a need for such legislation. We are still faced with the shattering of family circles and the isolation of Protestants in the border areas who live in daily fear of murder by IRA murder gangs. That is the reality of the position in Northern Ireland, and it is something that the Government have long refused to face or to take action to bring to a swift and effective conclusion.

During the past two weeks we have seen the effect on the ground of measures which my party has advocated for a long time. I wish to take this opportunity to commend and pay tribute to the security forces for the efficient manner in which they dealt with terrorists caught red-handed in the act of murder or attempted murder. No tears will be shed over dead IRA men by anyone from the Protestant population, which has had to bear the burden of atrocity after atrocity at the hands of that evil organisation. Terrorism can never be appeased or accommodated. It must be put down and eliminated. While it exists, we recognise and accept the need for emergency legislation. The vast majority of the people of Northern Ireland are demanding that the Government adopt a strategy which takes the initiative away from the terrorists and which will ultimately restore peace and normality to the Province.

We have heard that if we had a political settlement, all would be well. How far removed that is from the truth. If we had a political settlement tomorrow, the IRA would engage in even more violence, more bloodshed and more terrorism. When the south of Ireland had its political settlement, the worst page in Irish history was written. There was a civil war, when Irishmen fought Irishmen, and committed the most atrocious of murders. It was only when Kevin O'Higgins ruthlessly put that down, without apology, that peace was restored. We need to face that today. A strategy for the restoration of normal legal practices and traditions would be rendered unnecessary and we would not be debating this matter today, if we had a security settlement. All hon. Members could vote happily for the repeal of the legislation if we were not facing the present circumstances.

Those hon. Members who want confirmation of the true nature of the relationship between Sinn Fein and the IRA could do no better than read Sir George Baker's report. All hon. Members will be grateful to him for the way in which he handled that part of his inquiry. The facts are there. Northern Ireland representatives have presented those facts to the House again and again, but the House has rejected and opposed them, and thrown them out.

In his report Sir George Baker lays the truth on the line. What is Sinn Fein, and what is its relationship to the IRA? Paragraph 46 states:

> "There cannot be any reason or indeed possible doubt that Sinn Fein is not only a political wing but also a complete accomplice and partner of the PIRA, that both intended to continue using violence, and that the identity of the murderers and the other perpetrators of grave crimes is widely known."

Sinn Fein is the IRA under a different hat. Membership is clearly interchangeable. The House needs to take cognisance of that. The public statements of their spokesmen demonstrate the same evil murderous thinking as that of the IRA.

I regret that, having clearly shown the fusion of Sinn Fein and the IRA, Sir George Baker stopped short of recommending Sinn Fein's proscription. Sinn Fein is not a political party in any true meaning of the term. Members of the Government of Northern Ireland have rightly refused to meet Sinn Fein members who are public representatives. However, they should carry that policy to its logical conclusion and forbid contact between Sinn Fein and Government Departments and all others.

Every right thinking person in Northern Ireland utterly abhorred the action taken by the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) when he brought into the House Linda Quigley, who has been convicted as a member of the IRA. She said that she supported the IRA's view that the British Government were a legitimate target. Therefore, she supported the bombing at Brighton, when an attempt was made to murder the Government. It must be utterly abhorrent to all people that an hon. Member brought such a person into the House. I am glad that the Labour party took action about that. I wish to put it on the record that that was appreciated by the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): My impression is that the hon. Gentleman is saying that Sinn Fein should be proscribed. Is that what he is saying?

Rev. Ian Paisley: The hon. Gentleman should listen.

Mr. Flannery: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that Sinn Fein should be driven underground? Is it not a fact that a large number of people voted for Sinn Fein and, therefore, that it has mass support? The hon. Gentleman says that he will drive Sinn Fein underground. Has he ever had any contact with the para-militaries who support his general viewpoint?

Rev. Ian Paisley: Sinn Fein should be proscribed, no matter how many votes it receives. That is not the issue. The issue is that Sinn Fein says that there should be violence and that a campaign of murder can be justified. I have always denounced and rejected murder. So-called Protestant para-militaries have fired bullets into my home because of my stand on those issues.

Mr. Flannery: Answer the question.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I have already answered the question.

Mr. Flannery: What about on the hillside and on the marches?

Rev. Ian Paisley: That shows how little the hon. Gentleman knows. I trust that he will make himself aware of the facts before he asks such foolish questions. If I deviated from the law, the Government and Opposition Front Benches would call for my blood. Their difficulty is that I do not deviate from the law and they cannot get anything on me to shut me up. They have tried it before and failed. They will try it again and they will fail because I act within the law, and I shall continue to do so.

If an attempt is made to subvert the democratic wishes of the people of Ulster, which were made known through the ballot box when they voted to remain within the United Kingdom, there will be resistance in Ulster. Ulster will fight, and Ulster will be right. The hon. Members for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) and for Foyle (Mr. Hume) know my views about that. The hon. Member for Hillsborough wishes to divert me from what I want to say.

The report states:

"It is the duty of the Government to govern, and it is fundamental to that duty that it should do everything within its power and the law to protect the right to life of every citizen including members of the security forces."

It is not the duty of the Government to set up security forces to be shot by the IRA. The security forces are entitled to protect themselves. The idea that they must be shot at first, and are lucky if they are not hit, before they can take action cannot be right. Security forces must act promptly to deal with terrorists.

I entirely agree with the statement that the duty to defend and protect the people of Northern Ireland lies with the Government. It is time that they faced that duty and ensured that Sinn Fein was not permitted openly and brazenly to encourage and incite the murder of members of the security forces and the Protestant population.

In December 1983, following the Harrods outrage, the then Secretary of State for Northern Ireland said that the Government were considering imposing sanctions against Sinn Fein. Nothing has happened. It is time that that nettle was grasped. The Secretary of State needs to apply his heart and mind to that matter.

The report states that the time is not ripe for the return of jury trial for scheduled cases. I wish that it were ripe. I opposed the abolition of juries. However, it would not be right to say that we can now abolish the Diplock courts and reintroduce juries. It would be impossible, because juries would be intimidated. I agree with the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) that at the time we did not have proper facts on which to base our judgment. I was perfectly entitled at the time to vote against the abolition of jury trials. My vote was justified. Indeed, the matter was carried by only one vote in Committee.

The Democratic Unionist party is realistic enough to believe that it is not possible at this juncture to reintroduce jury trials for serious terrorist cases, because of the danger of intimidation of jurors. However, I regret that we have had to go down that road, and I look forward to the return of jury trials for all criminal offences as soon as possible. Trial by jury is much preferable, and we do not delight in the denial of British legal rights to the citizens of Northern Ireland.

My party has suggested that the Government should consider seriously the proposal that scheduled cases be heard by a panel of three judges, not by one judge sitting alone. Judges in Northern Ireland do a tremendous job in the most difficult circumstances, as do magistrates. Members of the judiciary have been attacked and murdered. It is not right that one judge should have to bear the tremendous burden of trying serious terrorist cases in which there may be 30 or 40 defendants. Some say that the Diplock courts should be abolished immediately, but that cannot be done. If it were done, the IRA would rejoice, for it would help the Republican campaign.

I welcome the recommendation in the report to deschedule some offences. Many offences of a purely domestic nature could satisfactorily be left to judge and jury, as could many cases of robbery and aggravated murder. Sir George has recommended greater flexibility in the cases that are certified out — treated as non-scheduled offences—and my party agrees with him. A case should go before the Diplock courts only when it is necessary. Wherever possible, a defendant should have the right to go before judge and jury.

A matter that causes great anxiety across the divide in Northern Ireland is the excessive periods that many prisoners are forced to spend on remand in custody. Remand is the worst sort of imprisonment. Prisoners are held in their cells for 23 hours a day and are let out for only one hour. That has become commonplace in Northern Ireland. Remand prisoners pray for quick trials. Although they may not be released, they would prefer to serve proper prison sentences. Those prisoners have not been convicted of any crimes, but some of them have been held for more than two years on the word of an accomplice or informer who has himself carried out some dastardly criminal deeds. Those prisoners are innocent until proven guilty, and it is intolerable that they should be held for so long before their cases are heard.

I appreciate the many difficulties with court administration, the police and legal personnel. However, it is vital that every effort is made to avoid long delays between arrest and trial. Paragraph 173 of the report states:

"Justice delayed is justice denied."

It is a total injustice for a man to spend two years in custody on remand and then to be acquitted. He will have served the equivalent of a four-year prison sentence without having been convicted of an offence. His family and work life are destroyed. The result is that the man leaves prison completely embittered, whether he be a Roman Catholic or a Protestant, because of his treatment. Those of us who know about such matters want to avoid at all costs the release on bail of those charged with murder merely because of delays in bringing their cases to court. The solution would be to get them to court much more quickly. A person facing a murder charge could skip over the border if he got bail, and it would be extremely difficult to get him back. There is no assurance of extradition. The Government must take on board that urgent problem.

I regret the fact that some people have given a blanket endorsement to the supergrass system in Northern Ireland. It would be entirely wrong for the House to believe that opposition to the system comes from only one side of the religious divide. It does not. I voiced opposition to it a long time ago, when the supergrass system was starting. Apart from reducing the number of defendants to 20 or fewer, and criticising the delays in starting such trials, Sir George saw no injustice in such cases. I see a great injustice in the system. There are some people in prison in Northern Ireland now who would never have been convicted in a court on this side of the Irish sea. It is a well-known principle of English law that an accomplice may give evidence for the Crown, and that the judge must warn the jury that it is dangerous to convict on his uncorroborated evidence unless the jury is certain of the truthfulness of that evidence.

There was a debate on this matter in the Northern Ireland Assembly, and members of the Official Unionist party and of my party were instrumental in passing a resolution. In the debate I quoted Lord Justice Lawson, who warned that the Director of Public Prosecutions should consider carefully the statement of Chief Justice Hale, who said:

"The truth is that more mischief hath come to good men by these kinds of approvements by false accusations of desperate villains than benefit to the public by the discovery and convicting of real offenders."

In another case Lord Justice Lawson said:

"Nothing of a similar kind must happen again. Undertakings of immunity from prosecution may have to be given in the public interest. They should never be given by the police."

In the supergrass cases, the promises were made in the first instance by the police.

I emphasise the words:

"Undertakings of immunity . . . should never be given by the police."

Lord Justice Lawson also said:

"The Director should give them most sparingly and in cases involving grave crimes it would be prudent of him to consult the law officers before making any promises."

Northern Ireland law must be in line with the law in Great Britain. I was talking to an hon. Member today who said that supergrasses are acceptable in England. But they are different supergrasses from the ones in Northern Ireland.

This is a serious matter, because we are talking about ruthless men who have committed many crimes but who have had dangled in front of them the carrot of complete immunity, a new life somewhere else and sums of money. They know perfectly well that if they get out of prison there will be someone waiting for them who they do not wish to see, so all that they must do is to drop in his name. Recently I examined the affidavit of a supergrass who had mentioned the name of a high-ranking police officer. Had that officer not been able to prove that he had a perfect and watertight alibi, he would have been in court on the word of a supergrass. We should remember that the evidence has not been corroborated by other witnesses. It is the sole word of a man who has committed serious crimes and who has been offered immunity and inducements by the police. If a person wishes to turn Queen's evidence, he should be tried by the court and sentence should be passed on him. If the court wishes to take into consideration the fact that he has co-operated with the Crown, it can do so, but the court must have the final decision.

It will be interesting to see the result of the Bennett appeal; we have already seen the result of the Gilmour case. Whether we like it or not, it discredits the courts and the police in Northern Ireland. I have often said that that appeal could be taken to Europe. If something happened there, the authority of the courts and the police in Northern Ireland would be undermined. The Secretary of State needs to think carefully about this matter. Nobody in Northern Ireland believes that these are converted terrorists who have suddenly had a change of heart and are prepared, from the best of motives, to give evidence. I do not think that the people who are handling the matter believe it either.

I took a stand in the House against internment, and I was justified, because internment did not and could not work in the circumstances. Any Government have the right to have the power of Executive internment in an emergency, but it must be Executive internment only, and not a quasi-judicial system, such as the one where men stood behind a blanket and showed their feet and gave evidence in an attempt to put a legal gloss on something that was an act of the Executive. If an Executive wants to put people away because of an emergency, it should have the legislation to do it properly.

In criminal cases where an informer or an accomplice has been given a substantial inducement to give evidence the court should not convict unless there is corroboration by other evidence implicating the accused. That is only fair and just. People ask me why I want to retain the Union. I do so because I believe in the system of British justice and in the British legal system. I do not want that system destroyed. It is one of the most precious things that we have.

My hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), if he catches your eye, Mr. Speaker, will have other matters to bring before the House. My point is that I want to see the IRA and its cohorts put down once and for all. I support the reintroduction of capital punishment and the effective action taken by the security forces in the past fortnight, but when it comes to court cases we cannot allow basic standards of British justice to be eroded or done away with.

6.32 pm

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): I welcome the report. I regret the death of Sir George Baker. I notice that I am in the report as being a sort of adviser. I did not realise that that was what I was doing. Like other former Secretaries of State, I was talking generally, but if I was an adviser, I am glad to have been so. I add a word of praise for Frances Elliott, who as the secretary will have done much of the detailed work.

The last review of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act was in 1974 with the Gardiner report, and as a result of its recommendations the Act was amended in 1975. It is very important that investigations like Gardiner, which was on a large scale, or like this one by Sir George should take place from time to time, because when the law is derogated against to such a degree as in the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act the matter should be reviewed in depth from time to time.

One of the recommendations in the report with which I disagree is the recommendation that when the new legislation has been passed it should be examined only every 12 months. When I was Secretary of State I felt that a review should be every six months, and I feel that now. When the law is derogated against in part of the United Kingdom, Parliament should examine the matter at least every six months. Twelve months is too long. The Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act for the United Kingdom is less of a derogation from the normal rule of law.

The need for an emergency provisions Act arose out of the violence in Northern Ireland, which still goes on. The Secretary of State was wise not to make any comparisons that are invidous to the relatives of those who are killed now. Secretaries of State are liable—we have all been guilty of it—to say that things are better, but over 2,500 people have died in Northern Ireland as a result of terrorism. The proportion on this side of the water would be 70,000. Some 30,000 people have been injured in Northern Ireland and we can do the arithmetic as to the amount of carnage that there would be here on a proportional scale.

[Mr. Merlyn Rees]

Therefore, is it surprising that normal political activities and discussions do not take place in the Province? The Secretary of State properly concentrated on the activities of the Provisional IRA and some of its running mates. They are the predominant para-military groups in terms of killing and murder, but these things happen on the other side of the political fence as well. For people on the outside there is no difference between a Loyalist murder and a Republican murder. Both are morally and politically wrong. A Secretary of State has to deal with both sorts.

It is not surprising that in the Province the two sides are polarised even more. The hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) spoke of South Armagh, which at one time was part of his constituency, and the way that people there feel about the Orange hall incident, about which I remember. The hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) is not here, but such things happen in Catholic areas as well. For example, I remember the butcher of Shankill who, oddly enough, had a Catholic Irish name.

There is violence in Northern Ireland, and no Government can sit back and say that they can do nothing about it. Therefore, there is a need for emergency powers. With my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), we are looking at whether there should be any changes in the emergency powers. It is right for Parliament to do so. There may be a better way of looking at parts of the changes rather than to-ing and fro-ing across the Floor of the House. The nature of the violence in Northern Ireland has to be understood. I get easily irritated these days when I meet people who have never been to Northern Ireland who tell me that it is something to do with Marxism or the Libyans. It is Irish to its very bones, whichever part it comes from. In one form or another, it has been showing itself for a good many years.

The nature of the para-military organisations must also be examined, to pick up a point made by the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley). There is the Irish National Liberation Army, the Ulster Freedom Fighters, the Ulster Volunteer Force, and the Red Hand Commandos, and a list of about 30 para-military organisations. They say that their aim is war and they have captains, brigadiers and all the paraphernalia of armies, with volunteers and so on. When they are killed there are little paragraphs in the newspapers referring to them in para-military terms. It is a different place from this side of the water. It is in the United Kingdom, but it is different in this respect as in many others, and I do not say that to draw any other conclusion than that we have to try to understand it.

The Provisional IRA broke away from the official IRA in 1969. I have met members of the Provisional IRA on a number of occasions and they told me firmly, "We want none of that Marxist rubbish." That is why they broke away from the official IRA. They were nationalists—republicans pure and simple. The old IRA members are the lineal descendants of the 1920 and 1922 organisations. The Provisional IRA said that, in the Lower Falls, when they wrote "IRA" on the walls, it meant "I ran away" from the trouble. Out of that arose the Provisional IRA. The nature of terrorism leads on to the nature of Sinn Fein and the political groups.

The report talks about the definition of violence. This is the only legislation where a definition is attempted. However, "killing with a political aim", or whatever the words are, is not necessarily the right definition. The Orange hall terrorists, the killing by the butcher of the Shankill, the killing of the mentally retarded boy and the woman collecting the census returns some years ago who was shot in the throat were not political killings. We fall into a trap with a definition of terrorism. Perhaps we should not have one. It gives credence and an acceptability.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West said that 40 per cent. of bank robberies were dealt with by the scheduled courts, but to some extent it is better if such crimes were not dealt with in the scheduled courts. In the old days, it meant that one could be considered a special category prisoner, with all that that involved. Now it means that one can be appreciated in a certain way by one or other side of the community. A mother says, "My son was not just robbing the bank. He was doing it for the cause." We should look carefully at the definition of terrorism which was taken from the Diplock report and inserted in the early legislation.

Until today I had not realised all these implications of terrorism, but I did see its effect on compensation. In my day—this shows that sometimes Secretaries of State are hamstrung — the easiest way of obtaining money in Northern Ireland was to get one's old car, which had been imported from somewhere else in the United Kingdom, stolen, and then blown up. One then claimed that that was done by a politically motivated person and therefore received replacement money. I did not succeed in doing anything about that, but I concede that something should be done about it.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): The moral of that is that the Northern Ireland Office never changes.

Mr. Rees: The moral is not that the Northern Ireland Office said anything—the moral is that a new piece of legislation was needed. The moral is that that would open up legislation and then one would not know what would happen with the other provisions thereby affected.

Of course, members of Provisional Sinn Fein are involved in violence. I learnt that also when I de-proscribed UVF when I first went to the Province. I was told that the UVF members wanted to go political and did not have a political wing. They then went on an incredible murdering rampage. The UVF was later re-proscribed.

The Committee on which four hon. Members who are present today sat, including the hon. Member for Antrim, North, had views on juryless courts, detention and a number of other matters. The hon. Member for Antrim, North was right to say that we had a view on proscription. When I went to the Province, however, I saw the need for proscription. It was invidious for people to call themselves captains, majors and other titles and to prance around the Province in the open. This did not mean that the proscription charge had much use. It is a charge that is added to all the charges of the courts. I strongly believed —I still do—that it was right to de-proscribe Provisional Sinn Fein. One need not be starry-eyed about this. I and many others know about the activities of the leader of Provisional Sinn Fein which believes in the Armalite in support of politics. The Provisional Sinn Fein is at war, and I understand that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) rightly said that the Provisional Sinn Fein receives votes in Northern Ireland. I am sad that people this side of the water forget that in the south there is the Labour party and Dick Spring, the Fianna Fail and Fine Gael, and in the north there is the SDLP and the various Unionist parties. The Provisional Sinn Fein is not representative of the people of Northern Ireland or southern Ireland. It is a minority group. I am sad when people from my area cavort with Provisional Sinn Fein and ignore the SDLP.

The other day I received a green card and two Loyalist para-militaries came to see me for a chat. I was surprised to receive that green card from Protestant para-militaries. I have received a Christmas card from a Loyalist para-military organisation. Perhaps that explains something about the nature of terrorism in Northern Ireland.

Mr. McNamara: It does not tell us much about my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Rees: It does not tell us much about anything except that I talked with a variety of people in Northern Ireland because it was my duty to talk with them.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): The right hon. Gentleman did not talk to murderers.

Mr. Rees: Of course I did not talk to murderers, but sometimes one does not know what people are. I was surprised to note that, during the Ulster workers' strike, Loyalist politicians cavorted with para-militaries on the Loyalist side. One day, Loyalist politicians came into the castle to speak to us. They were accompanied by armed guards. They had minders alongside them with guns. Violence comes from both sides, and it is important to consider that fact in understanding Northern Ireland's future.

A fifth of the funds of the Provisional IRA come from abroad and four fifths come from home. Friday used to be bank robbery and post office robbery day. Why are not all the funds of the Provisional IRA sequestrated, as the funds of the NUM are? If the Government of southern Ireland moved half as quickly to sequestrate the funds of the Provisional IRA as our judiciary did to sequestrate the NUM's funds and the money of many of my constituents, we might get somewhere. That is a thought.

Mr. Molyneaux: They are all Tories.

Mr. Rees: I am told that they are all Tories. I do not care what people are.

Mr. McCusker: The right hon. Gentleman raises an interesting point which was touched on by Sir George Baker in another regard. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that any IRA money is promptly lodged in the account of Provisional Sinn Fein? To sequestrate those funds, one needs to proscribe Sinn Fein.

Mr. Rees: I do not believe that the NUM is proscribed in this country. My point is that the funds of the para-military groups buy the weapons. Although my point about NUM funds may not be relevant, I point out that the funds need to be examined.

I was a little worried about the way in which the Secretary of State dealt with internment. It took 18 months to end internment. I did not receive the support of the then Opposition. Week by week, fortnight by fortnight, I let people out of prison on the basis of the Gardiner report. The Labour party ended internment by December 1975, but that was not done with the approval of both sides of the House. I still watch what is happening in Northern Ireland. I have heard stories—when I was Secretary of State I knew that most stories were wrong, but now I do not know what stories are wrong—that discussions are occurring between the Government of the South and the British Government about the reintroduction of internment on the border. That would be wrong.

I know that many politicians in the South believe that Mr. Faulkner got it wrong in 1971. Internment was carried out in a hamfisted way at that time. If one could not get the right man, one got his brother or uncle. The figures were all wrong. The South of Ireland has a history of internment. I do not care what that history is — internment is wrong. People should be put before the courts with evidence properly collected. I agree with those hon. Members who have said that the internment provision should be taken from the statute book.

Mr. Maginnis: The right hon. Gentleman has expressed his opposition to internment. Does he see justification in holding in prison someone who has served a term for committing a serious terrorist offence, who is due to be released from prison and who, during his imprisonment term, has shown neither remorse nor a desire to break away from his terrorist connections? Does the right hon. Gentleman see any justification in introducing internment from that end?

Mr. Rees: Frankly, I do not. I understand how it sounds to someone who lives in the border areas where constituents, relatives and friends are shot and killed in a way we do not understand here. It would be self-defeating to reintroduce internment under any guise.

In 1973, when the Committee considering the emergency provisions legislation discussed juryless courts, there was talk of intimidation. I recall that the intimidation was carried out by Loyalists. Whatever the arguments about a fair trial, whenever I appear on television to discuss this subject—I have not done that for a long time—I receive the usual spate of letters, one lot calling me an IRA lover and the other a Loyalist lover. Whichever way it goes in Northern Ireland, the people are even-handed in interpreting what one says. Their interpretation depends on how they look at these aspects.

There is intimidation of jurors in Northern Ireland. In no circumstances would I be a juryman in Northern Ireland. There would be threats to the life of a juryman whether he be Protestant, Catholic, Loyalist, or Republican or whatever else. I shall not develop this point further, but it is something that I believe strongly.

I should like to finish by suggesting how the matter should be dealt with and by asking some questions. The Secretary of State will consider the report with his staff and the Law Officers, but legislation in this way is not the answer. As a former Home Secretary, I am worried about informers, corroborative evidence, the role of the police and the difference between what goes on here and what goes on in Northern Ireland.

The role of the police should be studied by a judicial inquiry. I do not know what form it should take. It could be done by a Select Committee calling evidence. I ask the

[Mr. Rees]

Secretary of State not to come to the House at first with a new Bill. We go to and fro on the Floor of the House and in Committee we divide on party lines. The Government generally obtain what they want, because of their majority. The matter deserves a proper examination. There will be no legislation this Session, so there is plenty of time for the matter to be studied.

I noticed that the report contained a section about public order. In her speech at the Guildhall the other day, the Prime Minister said that the Home Office would complete a review of public order in 1985. It has taken much time because the review started in 1979 when I was at the Home Office. That shows how difficult the matter is. The Prime Minister suggested that the review would relate to current disorders.

I have studied carefully section 5 of the Public Order Act 1936. The rest of the Act deals with marches and uniforms and so on. If we are to have new public order legislation arising out of the events of the past year, let us have a full investigation and incorporate Northern Ireland in the legislation. I am usually keen on keeping Northern Ireland separate. I do not mean that the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 should be discussed in this way—but there is much else that is relevant.

I know that Sir George Baker was probably bombarded by those people in Northern Ireland who disagree with the 50 per cent. remission scheme which was introduced in my time. It would be a mistake to change that.

What about Maghaberry prison? Maghaberry, which has taken nine or 10 years to finish, was thought by the Labour Government to be a replacement for Long Kesh or the Maze—whatever one chooses to call it. We were going to get rid of detention and special category status. We were going to have proper accommodation. The H blocks were a short-term solution. They were copied from Low Newton prison—as it was then called—a then new prison in Durham. The H blocks were built quickly by the Army to begin the process of having normal prison accommodation. We know what happened when the special category status ended. Is Maghaberry to be used as a replacement prison? Has the policy been changed? Will we continue with the Maze? What has happened to Maghaberry? I ask that because it was a gleam in our eye. We thought that we were doing the right thing, but I rarely hear anything about it now. It may not even be finished.

My next point is an intriguing one which I put from time to time in passing to the Minister of State. I have been looking afresh at the 1969 Downing street declaration. It dealt with the position of Northern Ireland in the United Kingdom. The first paragraph of the declaration listed some of the people who had attended the meeting with some Cabinet Ministers and included Major Chichester-Clark, the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland, the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Andrews, Mr. Porter and the Minister of Development, Mr. Faulkner. There was a six-hour discussion. The second paragraph said:

"the GOC Northern Ireland will with immediate effect assume overall responsibility for security operations. He will continue to be responsible directly to the Ministry of Defence but will work in the closest co-operation with the Northern Ireland Government and . . . the Royal Ulster Constabulary. For all security operations the GOC will have full control of the deployment and tasks of the Royal Ulster Constabulary."

By 1977-78 when I was last involved, the primacy of the police had begun and the role of the Army was declining. I doubt whether there are now more than 7,000 soldiers in Northern Ireland, and when one considers the normal resident battalions, one realises that dealing with terrorism is now largely a policing-UDR operation. People tell me that it is a colonial matter. It is a funny colonial matter when the whole population can be kept down by 7,000 soldiers who have their wives and families with them. That suggestion is utter nonsense.

I always thought that the Downing street communiqué that I have quoted was of doubtful legal propriety. It does not matter whether it was or it was not because things did not happen as expected, if the Army was not there in support of the civil power. It was the other way round—the RUC was in support of the Army. By 1976-77 that was changing and that change has continued. That statement, which must have been believed to have the force of law, has never been rescinded.

Should it not be, the quicker that there are fewer soldiers in Northern Ireland the better. We have depended upon them over the years, particularly four of five years ago. Matters are best handled by the RUC using normal policing methods, but changes are needed on the border. In the short term, one needs the Army on the border.

We need legislation. The House should put its mind to how the existing legislation should be altered. Important matters need to be considered, but I agree with the point made by the hon. Member for Antrim, North—it is perhaps unusual to agree constantly with the hon. Member—that if there were a political solution, and there is none at present, the violence would continue. There is no way of ending it. It has become a way of life. We know how it was ended in the South of Ireland, but when people talk of a military solution they are wrong, and when they talk of a political solution they are wrong.

As long as Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom, we have a responsibility to work with the people of Northern Ireland to start a movement towards a political solution. That is what the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 is for. The Act is not the way forward; it is part of the way forward. It must be changed, which is why I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West, but we need special legislation to deal with special circumstances.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): When the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1973 first came into force in August 1973, based largely on the Diplock report of late 1972, no one would have chosen to believe that its provisions would still be necessary in 1985.

The amending Act of 1975, based on Gardiner's recommendations, and the further consolidation Act of March 1978 have reflected, as Labour and Conservative Governments have recognised, a continuing need to try to provide some additional legislation to allow the police and judiciary in Northern Ireland to deal with the special difficulties inflicted on our community by terrorists.

It was right for the Government in April 1983 to invite Sir George Baker to carry out a further examination of the operation of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1973 to determine whether the legislation struck a proper balance between safeguarding the liberties of the individual and providing the security forces and courts with adequate powers to enable them to protect the public from current and foreseeable terrorist crime.

It is there that I found difficulty in understanding the matter raised by the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), when he said that it was objectionable to have terms of reference for Sir George Baker which began:

"Accepting that temporary emergency powers are necessary".

We remember that the emergency legislation was invoked in the first place to deal with the terrorism which was still current when Sir George was asked to carry out a study and make a report. In those circumstances, the terms of reference were natural. Sir George submitted his report to the Government in March 1984 and it is sad that we have had to wait until today, when the House has virtually disappeared for the Christmas recess, to debate its findings and recommendations. It is less than a worthy tribute to the efforts and dedication of the late Sir George Baker that that should be the way in which the House deals with a matter affecting the lives of everyone in Ulster. However, it is appropriate that we should debate the report before the House decides to renew the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 for a further six months later this evening.

I know that the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West will approve of the debate, for I recall that when the House was asked to renew the Act in July he sought to justify leading 70 of his parliamentary colleagues in a Division against the proposition as a protest against the Government's failure to consider the Baker report sooner. We sympathise with his reasons, if not his action, and take considerable consolation from the fact that later tonight he will be able, in the light of Sir George Baker's in-depth investigation and subsequent recommendations, to vote for the renewal of the Act. To abstain would be to show a lack of courage and concern for the needs of a community which is under threat from terrorist killers and their fellow travellers, as was recognised by Sir George Baker. To oppose the renewal would be to capitulate to the lunatic fringe, which wants so much to bring the law, the House and the country into ridicule.

That lunatic fringe is typified by the likes of the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), who can mock those who have been killed and injured at the hands of terrorists, including hon. Members and their families, members of the security forces and members of the law-abiding British public in Great Britain and Ulster, by bringing terrorists to the House. Many of us recall the services that were given to Ulster by those like the right hon. Members for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) and for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason). We find it difficult to equate that responsible face of Labour politics with the recent actions of the hon. Member for Islington, North.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) rose——

Mr. Maginnis: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment. I note that his pen portrait in the parliamentary year book states that he likes animals. I am not one lightly or irresponsibly to use the analogy that I am about to offer to the House, but the IRA members whom the hon. Gentleman brought into the House are animals in the worst possible sense of the word. I understand his pen portrait rather better now that I know that he brings such people into the House. It has been forgotten already that he brought Gerry Adams into the House.

Mr. McNamara: Gerry Adams is entitled to be here.

Mr. Maginnis: The hon. Gentleman chooses to bring to the House those such as Adams, Quigley and McLaughlin. They are murderers.

Mr. Corbyn: Is the hon. Gentleman seriously suggesting that those who come into the House as visitors should in some sense be restricted? Is he suggesting further that there should be controls on those who come through the doors of the House? Is he saying that Members of this place do not have a right to talk to people from Northern Ireland, or anywhere in Britain, about conditions in prisons and their particular political views? Does he accept that the newspaper reports of last weekend were deliberately blown up to avoid the vile nature of the strip searches of women prisoners in Armagh and other prisons being brought to light?

Mr. Maginnis: The hon. Gentleman should consider, as should any other hon. Member who contemplates such irresponsible action, that people have lost their lives at the hands of those like Adams, Quigley and McLaughlin. If he did not hear me make the comment a short while ago, I repeat that those people are murderers. They have killed my constituents and constituents of my colleagues from Ulster.

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): That is right. They are vermin.

Mr. Maginnis: They have killed people in Great Britain, including members of this place. The hon. Member for Islington, North should not attempt to justify his irresponsible actions.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): Is my hon. Friend aware that one of the guests of the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) stated that members of the Government are legitimate targets to kill? That is the type of guest that we had in this building.

Mr. Maginnis: I am aware that that sort of guest was brought here by the hon. Member for Islington, North. I am aware also that those who entered the House as his guests would have taken advantage of the invitation to see everything that might be useful to a terrorist coming into the House with the intention of killing an hon. Member or hon. Members.

Mr. Corbyn: The hon. Gentleman seems to be going into a rather lengthy flight of fantasy. Does he agree that this building is a public place, that it is owned by the public and paid for by the public? Does he agree further that any member of the public is entitled to go through St. Stephen's entrance and to enter the Palace after passing through the screening process? If anyone wanted to obtain a plan of this building, he would be able to buy a history book in any bookshop in this country, or anywhere in the world, which would show him the layout. I believe that the hon. Gentleman is trying to stir up some non-story and non-issue as a way of avoiding the real causes of the problems in Northern Ireland and the real and serious violations of justice in Northern Ireland, of which apparently he approves.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Airey Neave was murdered within the precincts of this building.

Mr. Maginnis: I do not think that someone with the irresponsibility of the hon. Member for Islington, North will be convinced by my argument. However, it is important that it is said in the House that, irrespective of whether people can obtain plans of the Palace or whether they have to pass through a security screening process, we do not want guests of the sort that the hon. Gentleman brought to the House. As my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) said, Airey Neave was killed within the precincts of the House. We remember that the wife of the Government Chief Whip was killed a short time ago, along with other members of the Conservative party, while attending a conference at Brighton. I believe that such action is morally wrong, irrespective of what the practical implications may or may not be.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. McNamara rose——

Mr. Maginnis: I give way to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), not the hon. Member for Islington, North.

Mr. McNamara: I do not seek to doubt the hon. Gentleman's sincerity, and I do not question the right of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) to bring who he wishes into the House. Every Member is entitled to bring guests to this place. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) said a short time ago, he spoke in this place to convicted Loyalist prisoners who came to see him.

Mr. Maginnis: The right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South did not say that. They were not convicted murderers. The right hon. Gentleman is more responsible than that.

Mr. McNamara: At any rate, my right hon. Friend gave the impression that he knew something about them. Does the hon. Gentleman think that the antics of the press over the past weekend were wise and informed, in that basically it gave the Provo IRA a victory by suggesting that Parliament was scared? Surely it gave the IRA a bloodless headline. The press decided to blow up an incident which had taken place two months earlier, of which it already had knowledge, and about which it had been informed. When the press was informed it did not consider the matter to be worthy of comment, yet it was within a fortnight of the dreadful happenings at Brighton.

Mr. Maginnis: The hon. Gentleman has some of his facts wrong. He implied that the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South brought convicted terrorists to the House.

Mr. Merlyn Rees indicated dissent.

Mr. Maginnis: I know that the right hon. Gentleman did not do so. I am trying to make it clear that he did not behave in that irresponsible way.

Perhaps the Baker report summarises majority feelings in Ulster, in the House and in the country as a whole when it states:

"In my analysis of the powers I tried to be as objective as possible remembering, when striking the balance that my terms of reference required, that there are human duties as well as human liberties,"—

I repeat, human duties as well as human liberties—

"on the one hand to equate with powers needed in a civilised community to protect its members on the other."

That is certainly a justification of the need to continue to renew the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act.

The report was not based simply on some establishment perspective. Sir George carefully considered the stated intention of the IRA and quoted often from its newsheet An Phoblacht. He was also quick to point out that the paper emanates from 51/53 Falls road, Belfast, an address which will find Gerry Adams, head of the Provisional Sinn Fein. Here and elsewhere Sir George saw, as I do, the inextricable links between Sinn Fein and the Provisional IRA. Having given examples of that in paragraphs 35 to 47, Sir George concluded in paragraph 50 that "current and foreseeable . . . incidence of terrorist crime is such that there is little room for manoeuvre . . . it would be irresponsible to give up emergency powers."

I hope that when hon. Members vote they will remember that that was the conclusion drawn by Sir George Baker.

Sir George made some useful recommendations on bail. He stated the need to add to section 2(5)(c) of the Act the words

"or of the Royal Ulster Constabulary or Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve".

That needs to be done, and I should like to take a little time to deal with the matter.

In Ulster, several policemen in different incidents have come into contact with known terrorists. Believing that their lives or the lives of the civilian community which they had to protect might be in danger, they opened fire, killing the suspected terrorists. That happened on two occasions, and the suspected terrorists who were killed were found to be unarmed. Probably to placate public opinion, or the opinion of a section of the public, the Director of Public Prosecutions decided that those policemen should be brought before the court so that a decision could be made on whether they had acted rashly and committed a murder or were guilty of manslaughter. There were those of us who believed that they had not acted rashly, knowing the history and involvement of the people who were killed.

However, what disturbed us more was the fact that those policemen were remanded in custody in the same prison as para-military murder suspects. When their families went to visit them, they were subjected to abuse and threats from members of families of the para-militaries at the prison. I, along with my friend the late Edgar Graham, who was murdered by the IRA, went to see the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott), to discuss the plight of those members of the RUC. One must give credit where credit is due, because the Minister acted speedily, recognising the difficulty, and provided for the policemen to be remanded in police custody. That immediately raised a hullabaloo from Sinn Fein supporters, who suggested that that action had been taken for some partisan reason. Sir George recognised the difficulty and suggested the amendment to the Act that I mentioned. I should like to see that done.

I should like to expand a little more on that matter. I should also like to see any member of the security forces who is charged with a serious crime arising out of a duty that he is doing being remanded into either police or military custody. In Ulster, five members of the Ulster Defence Regiment are presently remanded in custody in Crumlin road, where their families are subject to abuse and threats when they go to visit them. Because they were alleged to have gone off duty to commit the crime and then gone back on duty, they were not remanded into Army custody. That is unfair—it is a double standard. It is stirring around in the pot to see whether a reason can be found to prevent those men being remanded in military custody. They were officially on duty when the alleged crime was committed. They have been in custody for over a year, and might be for the most of another year. They should also be catered for when the Act is amended to deal with the RUC and the RUC reserve.

I shall not mention some recommendations in the section dealing with bail, because they involve purely legal argument and I do not feel competent or qualified to speak on that. However, one does not need to be so qualified to see the merits, in scheduled cases, of adopting a 28 or 30-day remand in custody in lieu of the present seven days, which is meaningless and, worst of all, a waste of the courts' time. Any anomaly that that would have created in the past no longer exists, Sir George tells us, because under sections 59 and 9 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982, that can be done with the accused's consent. Baker admits, and I recognise, that terrorists are unlikely to be so co-operative, but it should be possible to adopt a process that would save the courts' time and, ultimately, the accused would at least benefit from having his case brought to court more quickly.

On young offenders, I find a substantial ally in Baker. The House will not want me to repeat the arguments that I used in a debate during the first week of this Session, when I spoke on SOSPs—those held at the Secretary of State's pleasure. I appeal to the Secretary of State to think this question out in the same spirit as Sir George did when he said—and it is worth hearing—

> "I am not sentimental, but there is a case for compassion and the giving of a hope of release at however distant a date. I recommend that the Secretary of State should consider making a statement of policy about such cases and indeed all who became caught at a relatively early age in communal violence and are serving indeterminate sentences."

I am grateful for the answers that the Under-Secretary has given me on that subject in the past few days, but I again urge a more radical and compassionate approach to those who were inveigled into terrorist crime at a time of communal strife when they were so young.

Baker recognises the reality of terrorism when he says that the time is, sadly, not ripe for the return of jury trial for scheduled cases. He spends much time deliberating on the merits and demerits of the single judge and of a plurality of judges, but concludes that the latter would simply not be practical in terms of the limited number of judges available. While that may be an unfortunate, if necessary, conclusion, there is no doubt in my mind that the compromise of lay assessors or resident magistrates sitting with the judge would create more problems than it would solve. I shall not go into the details, as the difficulties are spelt out by Sir George in paragraphs 127 and 128.

The Secretary of State has suggested that he may find a way to certify certain offences out of the scheduled category. I note that the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) and others have advocated that today. That would certainly be welcomed if it would speed up the judicial process without creating loopholes in the law which could be exploited by terrorists. Rather than taking that step all in one go, I suggest that the Act should provide —the Minister may tell us that it already does—a means whereby an application can be made for certain offences to be certified out. It could then be left, like the granting of bail, to the discretion of a High Court judge. When we have experience of that, more permanent provision could be made in the Act.

I cannot agree with Baker's recommendation that the length of time for which a suspect can initially be held for questioning should be brought into line with the 48-hour period provided for in the Prevention of Terrorism Act. Let us remember that we are dealing with terrorists and that the RUC has to deal with people trained to hinder and frustrate the system. Among other things, it has to deal with documentation and medical examination and conduct inquiries to compare fingerprints, especially in cases of refusal to disclose identity. The RUC also needs time to conduct the necessary interrogation. It may have to make inquiries in the Irish Republic or in Great Britain. All those things take time, but none takes more time than the medical examinations which people held for questioning have the right to demand. If the person is co-operative and innocent, he is often released before 72 hours have passed, but if he is a terrorist it is necessary to invoke the Prevention of Terrorism Act, which enables the police to apply to the Secretary of State for extensions up to five days.

There is much to be said for Baker's idea that powers of arrest for scheduled offences and offences under the emergency provisions Act and the Prevention of Terrorism Act should be dealt with in one Act, but the question of the 72-hour initial holding period should not be dodged. It may often mean that there is no need for an extension, whereas a 48-hour limit would inevitably lead to applications for extensions in the majority of cases. We must seek to assist and not embarrass the police in these matters.

With regard to propaganda against the security forces, we all want to see the rule of law hold sway for citizens in Ulster, as I believe from experience it does. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North does not have that experience and perhaps absolves himself in his own mind from showing concern for anyone who is not a member of, aligned with or in some way involved with terrorist crime. I often wonder about that.

Mr. McNamara If the hon. Gentleman made that statement outside the House, it would be defamatory. Is he suggesting that I have at any time, or in any way, ever supported terrorist methods in Northern Ireland, or anywhere else, or that I have ever done anything other than support absolutely the rule of law in the Province? That is what I am concerned about—the maintenance of the rule of law.

Mr. Maginnis: I can put the hon. Gentleman's mind at rest at once. What I have said, and what I have seen in the House—I am prepared to say this outside if it gives the hon. Gentleman satisfaction — is that the hon. Gentleman has constantly shown himself to be concerned with people who have been involved in crime.

Mr. McNamara: Name one of them.

Mr. Maginnis: Perhaps I should clarify this so that the hon. Gentleman does not misunderstand. He has shown himself to be concerned, for example, about the two young people who were shot in Londonderry and the reason why they were shot. He has shown himself to be concerned with people involved in incidents of that kind rather than with the victims who, week in and week out, are murdered by the IRA.

Mr. McNamara: The hon. Gentleman must get his history right. In view of the tradition from which the hon. Gentleman comes, I remind him—he may be surprised to hear this, but my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) will recall the fact —that I was the first Member in the parliamentary Labour party to speak in favour of understanding the Ulster Unionists and the Loyalist position, at a time when they were perhaps the most reviled sect in the rest of the United Kingdom. The hon. Gentleman should bear that fact in mind.

Is the hon. Gentleman saying that one should not be concerned about the deaths of young people shot by British troops and equally about the deaths of people murdered by terrorists? One should be concerned about anyone's death, and the circumstances in which it occurs, if one is attempting to find a remedy for the situation in Northern Ireland. The hon. Gentleman's problem is that he is myopic on his own side. He cannot be objective about the situation as a whole and about the whole community—both sides of it.

Mr. Maginnis: The hon. Gentleman is getting quite excited about this. I am speaking of my experience of his interventions in the House. He has just repeated that he is concerned about the two people shot in Londonderry. No doubt he is prepared to use the argument that we have already heard. If the police knew that they were coming, why did they not line up on both sides of the road and arrest them when they walked into the trap? The hon. Gentleman cannot be so naive as to believe that terrorists operate like that. If there is any undue police activity, the terrorists simply bide their time and come back a week later when the police and security forces do not expect them. Then, as in the Mountain Lodge incident, four or five people may be killed. Is that the kind of action that the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends wish to see? Do they want to give the IRA not just the chance to fire the first shot, but the chance to get away and bide their time so that they can kill again at a later date?

Mr. McNamara: I do not want the IRA to get away with anything, any more than I want the UVF or the UDR to get away with anything. I want to establish whether, if the police had reasonable suspicion that those two people were about to commit a crime, any attempt was made to arrest them before they arrived at the scene of the crime, which they had not actually attempted to commit. All that we know at present is that there will never be any trial, so we shall never be able to test the evidence. That being so, what the British Army did in that instance may have given yet another victory to the Provisional IRA, just as the Daily Mail and The Mail on Sunday did when they took on my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) last weekend.

Mr. Maginnis: First, I resent the fact that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North has coupled the UDR with the IRA and the UVF. The UDR is a law-abiding, law enforcement agency, which has served for 14 years in Ulster with credit and a great deal of personal sacrifice. It is less than honourable to couple that body with terrorist organisations.

The hon. Gentleman has annoyed me so much by that remark that I have forgotten what the question was.

It is not for me to tell the Secretary of State what changes to make to the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Acts or to the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts or to tell him what new Act, if any, should replace them. The Secretary of State will bring such proposals to the House, they will be debated here and we will have the opportunity to amend them.

Like Sir George Baker, the Secretary of State and the Ministers should bear in mind the dangers facing law-abiding citizens. Many hon. Members will forget about those dangers. Many other hon. Members who speak in this debate will forget about the dangers faced by members of the security forces. It is to them, rather than to our biased minority, that I direct the attention of the House. Before the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) jumps to his feet, I must say that I am not thinking of Roman Catholics, many of whom are law-abiding and decent citizens and who are, as much as any of us, the victims of IRA terrorism. It is to the law-abiding citizens rather than to the vocal fellow-travellers of the IRA that the Secretary of State owes the first consideration, if and when he amends the emergency provisions legislation in line with Sir George Baker's recommendations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Paul Dean): Order. We are making very slow progress. Many hon. Members who wish to speak will be disappointed unless speeches are considerably shorter.

7.32 pm

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): I am grateful for the opportunity to join a former Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in paying tribute to the late Sir George Baker and in acknowledging the work done by Frances Elliott.

Even if all one's views were not accepted by Sir George Baker, it was a very pleasant experience to appear before him. I found Sir George shrewd and sympathetic, and a delightful as well as a distinguished personality. His report may be unique among state papers for its robust and racy style. The report can almost be read for pleasure as well as for information. The Secretary of State described it as a good read—a colloquial comment upon a colloquial report.

I have a few somewhat critical observations to make on the handling of proceedings in terrorist cases. First, I agree with what the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) said about the possibility of a compassionate approach to young prisoners, particularly those serving indeterminate sentences. Secondly, I echo what was said by the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley). I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman is a lawyer, and I certainly am not, but I agree with him that justice delayed is justice denied. There is great concern in all parts of the House about the delay in bringing alleged terrorists, or persons concerned in terrorist offences, before a court, especially when they are in custody and not on bail.

Next, I warmly agree that discretion should be given to the Director of Public Prosecutions to certify cases out of schedule. Here again, there is assent in different quarters of the House today.

Concern has been expressed about the Diplock courts. It is said that the burden upon one judge is great and terrible. If it were possible to provide assessors, that would be a great gain. The Secretary of State says that a new judge has been appointed in Northern Ireland. I hope that when the Under-Secretary replies to the debate he will say something on those matters.

I would defend the Diplock courts as a regrettable necessity where—as in Northern Ireland—courts cannot function properly because jurors cannot perform their duties without fearing for their lives, their property or their families. I think that the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) said it all when he said that he would not be a juryman in Northern Ireland. I think that would be the answer given by any hon. Member who was asked to serve on a jury in Northern Ireland. It was because jurymen are in danger if they do their duty that the special criminal courts were set up in the Irish Republic. Sir George Baker paid considerable attention to those courts. He quoted Diplock as saying that:

"A frightened juror is a bad juror".

There are vivid words in paragraph 99 of Sir George Baker's review. Referring to a Standing Committee which sat in 1972-73, Sir George says that:

"According to Sir Elwyn Jones the AG gave a 'vivid and grim account of particular cases of intimidation of jurors by IRA and UVF men . . . ' . . . An example which is clear in the recollection of one witness is of a large and powerful juryman shivering with fright and pleading to be discharged after a night of threats by telephone. The LCJ had been obliged to discharge that jury. A senior barrister remembered the trial of a 'loyalist': the subtle but effective intimidation was the intermittent beating throughout the trial of a Lambeg drum at a distance from the court but so that the sound was clearly heard by the jury."

Diplock courts are a painful necessity. However, even in the Diplock courts the central principles of our justice are maintained. The trial takes place in open court with the calling and cross-examination of witnesses. The onus is on the prosecution to prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt. The accused has the right to take legal advice and to be represented by a lawyer. If necessary, he receives legal aid. The Diplock courts conform to the European Convention on Human Rights which in article 6 provides, among other things, that hearings should be public, that the defendant should be presumed innocent until proved guilty, and that he should have the right to legal aid and advice and the right to cross-examine witnesses.

There are further safeguards around the Diplock courts. The right of appeal against conviction or sentence is unfettered, whereas in general in the case of a trial by judge and jury the accused has to obtain prior leave from the Court of Appeal or the trial judge. There is, moreover, the most important protection that, if a confession is admitted in evidence and the defence gives prima facie evidence that it has been extracted by ill treatment, the onus is on the prosecution to disprove that evidence.

It has recently become apparent that trial by jury does not always give satisfaction, even on this side of the water. Too much is sometimes claimed for it. In the summer of 1980, Lord Fitt, who was then a Member of this House, and I espoused the cause of the late Joseph Conlon, which was brought to my notice by a distinguished Unionist. We were convinced, as was Lord Fitt, Mr. Conlon's parish priest, Father McKinley, and Cardinal Hume, that Mr. Conlon was wrongly convicted at the Old Bailey after a long trial for possessing nitroglycerine for the purposes of terrorism. Guiseppe Conlon, as he was known, is dead, but we want his name to be cleared for the satisfaction of his relations and of justice. We have brought the case to the notice of more than one Home Secretary, none of whom has seen his way to recommend a royal pardon, although the conviction was made on forensic evidence and the expert shares our misgivings.

The relevance of the Conlon case to the debate can be revealed by quoting a few words which I uttered in the House in the early morning of 4 August 1980 on the Consolidated Fund Bill. I said:

"I have compressed into a few inadequate words a complicated case resting almost entirely on forensic evidence, difficult for the non-scientific mind to grasp. The jury's task was hard and uneviable. I cannot help wondering whether this was a case less suitable for the Old Bailey than for one of those maligned Diplock courts of Northern Ireland, where terrorists are tried by a judge without a jury. Those courts are familiar with the methods of terrorism and with such matters as innocent contamination."—[Official Report, 4 August 1980; Vol. 990, c. 386.]

The case rested on the fact that he had evidence of explosive material on his fingers. I should not have described the trial of Mr. Conlon as exhibiting a jury as the cherished safeguard of which the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) spoke. Such words would be a mockery to the Conlon family.

When my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General addressed the American Bar Association in the summer, he said:

"in combating terrorism in Northern Ireland, the principle is that a balance must be sought to ensure that justice is done, both in the sense of justice in providing a proper trial for those accused of terrorist offences and justice to the law abiding citizen in ensuring that terrorism does not defeat the very means by which the security of the public and the process of law can be assured".

The right to live in safety under the law in Northern Ireland can, alas, be preserved today only by the limitations that Sir George Baker investigated and which the House is discussing. My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General was speaking of the use of evidence of accomplices.

Speaking at Darwin college, Cambridge, the Lord Chief Justice, Lord Lane, said in November 1983 that he had never understood the objection to the use of informers of which supergrasses are only one example. Perhaps I might say with the greatest diffidence that Lord Lane might not have had the situation in Northern Ireland fully in mind. We are all aware of the great danger of abuse of the system of supergrasses. The size of supergrass trials is a factor which has given rise to anxiety and which, I suppose, Lord Chief Justice Lord Lowry had in mind in a recent case. There is a responsibility to ensure that the system is not abused. A recent case, which might have shocked and upset many people on both sides of the water, shows that the judiciary in Northern Ireland is determined to ensure that proper standards of justice are maintained.

Sir George Baker went into the logical case of proscribing Sinn Fein, meaning Provisional Sinn Fein. He sometimes says just Sinn Fein when he clearly means Provisional Sinn Fein but not official Sinn Fein.

Mr. Hume: It has changed its name.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. Sir George Baker cited what the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) said in the Daily Telegraph of 20 December 1983—

"as one newspaper neatly put it Sinn Fein is the IRA in drag".

To plain men, it is difficult to understand why the hon. Member for Belfast, West has not already been arraigned under the law of sedition or otherwise. I should like to quote two distinguished Irishmen of the Republic. It is the view of the Chief Justice of the Republic, as set out in paragraph 423 of the report, that this is "an evil and dangerous organisation whose object was to overthrow the state and its institutions if necessary by force".

[Sir John Biggs-Davison]

Dr. Conor Cruise O'Brien, as Minister of Posts and Telegraphs, when banning broadcasts by proscribed organisations, said:

"The propaganda activities of Provisional Sinn Fein in support of Provisional IRA are in our view a danger to the state."

Sir George Baker comes to no conclusion about whether Sinn Fein should be proscribed. I notice that the Ulster Unionist party and the Democratic Unionist party have come to a conclusion and that there is an early-day motion on the subject which has attracted some support on this side of the House. As I understand it, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not fully made up his mind. It is significant, however, that the demand for proscription of Sinn Fein comes from the front line—those who live in danger such as the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone. The point made by the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) about sequestration is interesting and important.

I wonder whether, in due course, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will come to a different conclusion. I can recall a time when not even the Provisional IRA was illegal in Great Britain, as distinct from Northern Ireland. I argued that it should be and was shot down at the party conference at Blackpool in 1973 by the then Secretary of State, my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Whitelaw. In 1974, however, the Provisional IRA was proscribed in Great Britain. I dare say that there will be a change of line in regard to Sinn Fein.

A short time ago, private Ian Thain of the First Battalion Light Infantry was sentenced to life imprisonment for a murder which was perpetrated during a disturbance. I shall not comment on the case as I think that there is to be an appeal. This is a most significant event. It is distressing but it refutes any assertion that the Armed Forces of the Crown have licence to operate beyond the law. The rule of law is being upheld. The Government's acceptance of the main recommendations of the Baker report is some testimony to that. There is always a temptation—and a provocation from terrorists—for the security forces and the authorities behind them to resort to excessive use of police and military power. Such action would suit the terrorist propaganda purpose.

Every effort must continue to be made to keep the sword of justice unsullied. At the same time, the theme of the Baker report is that there is no shred of evidence that the courts and the security forces would be able to combat and eradicate terrorism without the limitations of the ordinary law that we have been discussing.

Sir George's inquiry led him firmly to the conclusion that emergency powers must be retained, not for the sake of one side of the community, but for the sake of everyone in Northern Ireland. Sir George said:

"It is utterly unrealistic to believe, as some do, that the main powers given by the Act can be repealed tomorrow or in the near future."

It was unclear to me whether the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West accepted the necessity in present circumstances for the continuation of emergency powers. When some of my hon. Friends asked him to answer that question, he failed to do so. Perhaps we shall get some clarification from the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) who is to wind up for the Opposition.

The amendment of the Leader of the Opposition insinuates that law enforcement in Northern Ireland is not characterised by "methods . . . which are seen to be fair, compassionate and non-discriminatory."

That is a defamation not only of the Government, but of the security forces who dare and endure so much for us. The Opposition pay lip service to law and order in Northern Ireland, but to make such an assertion in their amendment and to vote for that amendment is a gross disservice to law and order in Northern Ireland.

7.52 pm

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): It is disappointing that, eight months after the production of the Baker report, the Government are not yet able to give their considered reply. The Secretary of State said that he wanted to consider the views of the House, but all that he had to do was to read the debates of six months ago and those of six months before that. The views of the House have not changed. As my views have not changed since my speech on this subject 12 months ago, I shall not delay the House for long.

The debate is about law and order in Northern Ireland and about law and order for the entire community. Death and murder in Northern Ireland are non-sectarian, and more than half the civilian population killed in Northern Ireland have come from the Catholic community. We are all concerned with law and order and how to obtain it. We differ about the means.
